Tarbell, died in service, Oct. 9, 1864. Of the 60 soldiers furnished during the war, 34 enlisted for three years, 12 for one year, and 14 for nine months. Six of the number re-enlisted.

From the foregoing table it will be readily seen, that this town, with its rural population, engaged almost exclusively in the cultivation of the stubborn soil, furnished one soldier out of a fraction less than every eleven of its inhabitants. That the rebellion must be conquered and the nation preserved, was the united expression of the people, and to that end the town gave liberally of its means, and fathers, mothers and wives gave their sons and husbands to do, and if need be to die, for the preservation of that goodly heritage bequeathed to them and theirs by their forefathers. Besides all this, a great number of her native sons, who, previous to the war had removed to other towns and states, cast aside their implements of honest toil and enrolled themselves as volunteers from the several towns and states in which they then resided, and helped swell the ranks of that grand army of citizen soldiery, who, for four years fiercely struggled and bravely fought for the maintenance and vindication of the supreme majesty of the law, and the perpetuation of the Union of States, as designed to be by the fathers of the Republic, "one and inseparable."

Her sons shrank from no duty; evaded no responsibility. True to their manhood, true to the heroic demands of justice and right, to them was the struggle and to them the glory. The triumph of freedom and the growing greatness and glory of their country, is a full and complete recompense for every sacrifice offered.

THE DEXTER FAMILY.

David Dexter, senior, was one of the early settlers of Dover (then Wardsboro). He came from Rochester, Mass., the place of his birth, and settled in the wilderness, at the extreme north part of the town, having then purchased a large tract of wild land for a song. He made a clearing with his own hands, built a log hut, and commenced life in the wilderness with only his hands and the aid of a true and heroic wife. He had seven children, six sons and one daughter. The father died in 1854, at the advanced age of 94. The mother died about twenty years prior.

The names of the children were: Charles, Polly, Nathan, John, David, Daniel and Silas, all of whom are gone, but one, David, who still survives at the age of 80. David married Chloë Hazeltine, daughter of Daniel Hazeltine of Wardsboro, and both are living in Wilmington, Vt., owning and cultivating a farm of sixty acres, are in full possession of their physical and mental power, and receive only small assistance in managing their affairs. Mrs. Dexter, now 79 years of age, is sister of Judge Abner Hazeltine, of Jamestown, N. Y., an eminent lawyer and jurist, who once represented his district of Western New York, in Congress. Of this marriage, two sons and two daughters were born. One daughter died when 13; the other, Laura Ann, is the wife of F. W. Jones, esq., of Wilmington, Vt.; the oldest son, Laban, resides in Springfield, Mass.; the youngest son, D. Gilbert, so well-known throughout Vermont as a writer of prose and poetry and contributor to many of our most prominent journals, was born in Dover, March 29, 1833, and is now 37. He resides in Cambridge, Mass., is a member of the board of aldermen of that city, holds prominent positions in several of the most eminent literary organizations in Cambridge and Boston, is president of the Young People's Christian Association, Cambridge, and is esteemed as a wide awake working man in its full sense. He is the successful financial manager of the house of Milendy, Dexter & Co., Boston, wholesale dealers in boots and shoes.

ATHENS.

BY HON. FREDERICK C. ROBBINS, OF LUDLOW.

Athens is a town of about 7,628 acres, 43° 7', bounded on the N. by Grafton, E. by Westminster and Rockingham, S. by Brookline and Townshend, and W. by Townshend. It was granted March 11th, and chartered May 3d, 1780, to Solomon Harvey, John Morse, Jonathan Perham and associates. The first start towards a settlement was made in the fall of 1779 by Jonathan Perham, Seth Oak, Joseph Rosier, James Shafter, and Jonathan Foster, who chopped a few acres, erected a log hut, but all left. February 25th, 1780, Jonathan Perham and Ephraim Holden came on with their families from Rindge, N. H., soon followed by Seth Oak and family from Winchendon. The snow being four feet deep when they arrived, they beat their path for eight miles through the woods. A small yoke of oxen was all the animals they took with them. The women all moved into the hut which the first settlers had built. The next May Mrs. Oak was delivered of a daughter, the first child born in Athens. The same month, Samuel Bagley, from Sterling, Mass., and Micah Read, from Westmoreland, N. H., arrived, and during the rest of the summer built, in company, a saw mill, and the next year a grist mill, for which they received from the proprietors 168 acres of land near the centre of the town. Simon Evans, Ezra Chaffee and Jeremiah Pinkham began improvements the same year. September 18th, 1780, Isaac, son of Ephraim Perham, died—the first death. November 25th, following, two men at work in a remote part of the town, alarmed by whoops and savage yells, spread the alarm. The people hurried away as fast as possible, expecting from each tree they passed to be met with an Indian tomahawk or scalping knife. Jonathan Perham's family decamped with such haste they left their oven heating and their oxen chained to a tree. The report spread with the greatest rapidity through the neighboring towns that Athens was destroyed by the Indians. The country was immediately roused. Some spent the whole night in preparing their guns and ammunition, and fearful apprehension chased sleep from every eye. The hallooing of a hunter, aided by imagination and the fears of the Indians, amounted in a few hours to the destruction of a fine settlement and the massacre of the inhabitants.

Athens was organized March 4th, 1781. William Beal was first town clerk, and Abel Mattoon representative. The religious denominations (1842) were Baptists, Christians, Congregationalists, Methodists, and Universalists. The M. E. church was formed in 1801. Several distinguished itinerant preachers have labored here, among whom were Jonathan Nichols, John Broadhead, William Fish, and H. Gurnsey.

The surface of the township is uneven, but not generally abrupt. The soil produces well, though it is better adapted to grazing than tillage. There is but one stream of consequence, and that heads in a pond about 30 acres of area, in the westerly part, and falls into Saxtons river in Rockingham. Lily pond, another small body of water in the southwestern part, derives its name from its quantities of white lilies.

The town is divided into three school districts, a schoolhouse in each. There is one saw mill on the site where the first mills were erected.—Thompson's Gazetteer.

On account of the statements in Zadock Thompson's History of Athens, as well as similar statements in the History of New England by A. J. Coolidge and J. B. Mansfield, that the first beginnings towards a settlement in this town were made in the fall of 1779 by Jonathan Perham, Seth Oak, Joseph Rosier, James Shafter, and Jonathan Foster, I here insert a copy of the "first covenant and subsequent records of the first adventures and proprietors to the Township of Athens, in the County of Cumberland, and State of Vermont," that students of history may be careful how they accept statements as truth before they inquire into the sources from which all true history comes:

"Anno Domini 1779, November 24th. We, whose names are hereunto subscribed, being undertakers, professors, and occupants in a certain tract of land lying in the County of Cumberland and State of Vermont, adjoining the towns of Putney, Westminster, Thomblingson, etc., do covenant, promise and engage severally, as follows, to wit: That we, and each of us, will meet at such times and places as a majority of us, the subscribers hereunto, shall agree to, being on said land, for the purpose of choosing a moderator and clerk, and appointing such departments of trust as may be found necessary, and appoint persons to fill such departments; and we further promise and engage to comply with and fill such orders and regulations as we shall or as may hereafter be proposed by the major part of the subscribers hereunto, for the purpose of surveying and lotting out said land, and in acquiring a legal title to the same; and also to pay our several parts or proportions of the charges which shall necessarily arise from the prosecution of the measures herein mentioned; and also pay our several proportions towards making such roads as are necessary, and to observe such rules and orders as shall be prescribed relative to acquiring possession and property in and unto said lands. Dated Nov. 14, 1779."

The list subjoined is different from the original, for the reason that numbers of the first adventurers disposed of their right in the township before the charter came out to those whose names are now in it. The previous and original proprietors were: ward, Benjamin Pierce, Jr., Jonathan Moore, Peter Wilson, John Perham, Timothy Walker, Samuel Bailey, Silas Thompson, Philip Goss, John Alexander, Nehemiah Hoskins, Riverius Hooker, Joel Perham, Jonathan F. Holmes, Reuben Alexander, Edward Houghton, Hezekiah Haven, Ellis Thayer, Ephraim Holden, Jeremiah Tinkham, Daniel Ashley, William Beals, Daniel Hooker, Leonard Perham, Asa Alexander, Elias Taylor, Andrew Barber, Israel Chapman, Azei Hooker, Jabez Walcut, Jesse Walcut.

Solomon Harvey, John Moore, Jonathan Perham, Seth Oak, Joseph Rosier, Micah Read, Abial Whitman, Samuel Norcross, Nathaniel Oak, Calvin Oak, Joshua Warner, James Shafter, Nehemiah Pierce, Timothy Bullock David Darby, Noah Wood-

The rest in the charter did not come into connection with those in covenant till the first of March, 1780, whose names will be found in a list subjoined to the record of their public acts on said 1st of March.

Dec. 1779. The undertakers, possessors, occupants, etc., of that tract of land mentioned in the foregoing covenant, agreeable to the directions therein contained, met at the house of Capt. Seth Oak, on the land mentioned in the foregoing covenant, and for the first time proceeded to act according to the interest of their covenant.

"Chose to the following offices the following persons: Solomon Harvey, moderator; David Darby, clerk; Seth Oak, James Shafter and Joseph Rosier, a committee to survey and lot out the land referred to in the covenant. David Darby, surveyor to the above committee.

"Voted, That the aforesaid committee and surveyor should designate such of the pitch lots as ought, in justice, to have an allowance in land to make them equal one with another.

"Voted, That Solomon Harvey, Micah Read and Noah Woodward be a committee, with the aforesaid committee, to manage the prudentials of the society in the absence of the undertakers; to act with discretionary power.

"The procuration of title to the land aforementioned was committed to the care of the committee last mentioned; and the calling a meeting of the undertakers was left discretionary with the town committees above-named.

"Then the meeting was adjourned by vote. 'Test, SOLOMON HARVEY, Moderator."

Dec. 6th, 1779. Solomon Harvey, Micah Read, Noah Woodward, and James Shafter, a majority of the undertakers' committee, relative to that tract of land since called Athens, in the County of Cumberland, State of Vermont, met at the house of Micah Read. Chose Solomon Harvey chairman and clerk of said committee.

"Voted, That a request be sent in the name of the committee to the inhabitants of the lands on Grassy Brook (the present town of Brookline), to invite them to join with us, (the undertakers of Athens), in our endeavors to procure title to the land mentioned in the aforesaid covenant, and desire them to join two of their inhabitants as committee men with us, to assist us in the management of our affairs, and that any three of said committee be a quorum.

"Voted, That Micah Read be the treasurer to the committee to receive and pay all such moneys as are raised to defray necessary charges, and that Solomon Harvey be clerk of the treasury; after which the meeting adjourned.

'Test, SOLOMON HARVEY,
Chairman and Clerk of the Prudential Committee"

On the 13th day of Dec., 1779, Micah Read, Joseph Rosier, James Shafter and Solomon Harvey, a majority of the Prudential Committee as above, met at the house of Micah Read.

"Voted, That $100 in Continental paper currency be paid into the treasury by the middle of January next; after which, as there was not more than fifteen persons who had undertaken as covenantors, the committee admitted in as undertakers, Silas Thompson, Jeremiah Tinkham, John Alexander, and all those persons formerly of the town of Winchester whose names are in the charter, except James Shafter, who was one of the first undertakers." In like manner were all the subscribers to the covenant admitted in, except the first fifteen, by the Prudential Committee, at several subsequent meetings of the Prudential Committee. The meeting was adjourned as usual by vote.

"Test, SOLOMON HARVEY,

Chairman and Clerk of the Prudential Committee."

"On Dec. ye 31st, 1779, we, whose names are affixed to this return, report as follows: That on the day of the date hereof in conformity to a vote of the Prudential Committee, at their meeting at the house of Micah Read, on Dec. 6th, last past, we held a conference with sundry of the inhabitants at Grassy Brook, relative to coming into connection with the subscribers to the foregoing covenant, and the said inhabitants proposed to take the matter under consideration for a time.

P'r us, MICAH READ, SOLOMON HARVEY."

"On Jan. 31, 1780, Seth Oak, Micah Read, James Shafter and Solomon

Harvey, of the Prudential Committee aforesaid, met at the house of Micah Read.

"Voted, To substitute Jonathan Perham as Prudential Committee in the room of Noah Woodward, whose absence made it necessary; also admitted in as settlers, a number of which never came into connection, notwithstanding, therefore shall mention their names, except Nehemiah Hoskins, from Winchester, who was admitted at this meeting, and not on the 13th of December, 1779, as was mentioned.

"At a meeting of the inhabitants of a place called Grassy Brook, in ye State of Vermont, and County of Cumberland, and not yet incorporated with any town, on March ye 1st, 1780, at the house of Wm. Skinner, on said land.

"1st. Wm. Skinner was chosen Moderator to govern said meeting. 2d. Chose Solomon Harvey, Clerk, to record the proceedings. 3d. Voted that the undertakers relative to the North part of the tract of land above mentioned, have liberty to come in and join our society for the future, saving the privilege to each party of raising and appropriating their own money.

"4th. Chose Solomon Harvey for a committee man to act in their behalf in preparing and supporting a petition to the General Assembly for a title to the lands on which we live,—see statute 1808, page 454.

"5th. Chose Mr. Elisha Ayer as a Prudential Committee to assist the Committee of the other part of the society in the management of the affairs relative to the whole of the undertakers on the tract of land above said.

"6th. Voted that Solomon Harvey above named be empowered to set our names to the petition above referred to.

"7th. Voted to refer the prerogative of calling meeting of this part of the society to the town prudential committee men above named.

"8th. Voted to receive Mr. Benjamin Fletcher as a settler on the land above mentioned.

"9th. Adjourned the meeting by vote.

"Samuel Skinner, 3 years' residence; Elisha Ayer, 3 years' residence; Eliphalet Skinner, 3 years' residence; Wm. Hartwell, 3 years' residence; Jonathan Boyden, 1 year's residence; Abraham Derry, part of a year; Fairbanks Moore, Jr., 1 year; Fairbanks Moore, 6 months; William Moore, 1 year; Tim Wellman, 1 year; Tim Wellman, Jr., 1 year; Darius Wellman, 1 year; Abel Mattoon, 6 months; John Crawford, 10 months; Ezra Ormsbee, part of a year; Benjamin Fletcher came Feb. 1st.; Cyrus Whitcomb, 3 years; Cyrus Whitcomb, Jr., 3 years."

It is seen that constant meetings were held by the settlers in the town of Athens ever after the 24th of Nov., 1779, and that not only were there in the town Solomon Harvey and Jonathan Perham, but Micah Read, Seth Oak, and James Shafter were there, Seth Oak and Micah Read both having houses where the meetings of the settlers were held as often as once a week nearly all the winter of 1779-80. The first town meeting was held in the house of Seth Oak. The second and third meetings being held in the dwelling house of Micah Read on the 6th and 13th days of Dec., 1779, and the fourth and fifth meetings were also held at Micah Read's dwelling house, Dec. 31st, 1779, and Jan. 31st, 1780, which clearly appears from the above record. Whether all of the names affixed to the covenant were actually on the tract of land at the time the covenant was adopted cannot now be determined, but it would seem that they were either there during the year 1780, or were fully represented, as they fully bind themselves to pay the quota of taxes assessed to them by the settlers on the tract of land afterwards called Athens.

In collecting the facts relative to the individual history of the early settlers in the town of Athens, the writer wrote to all the families whose residence could be found, and has waited till quite a late date, hoping that the Porter family, Shafter family, Tinkham family, Davis family, Balch family, Wells family, Alexander family, Oak family, Holden family, and Perham family would furnish sketches of their early history in Vermont.

[We here insert a narrative by Mrs. Betsey Robbins, mother of the Hon. F. C. Robbins of Ludlow, Vt., who was daughter of Ezekiel Perham, and moved into Athens, as the narrative discloses, in 1795. Ezekiel Perham was a cousin of the Jonathan Perham who was one of the first proprietors of the town.]

In March, 1795, my father, who then resided in Townshend, Mass., started with his wife and four children for the then new State of Vermont. We came with an ox team, consisting of one yoke of oxen and two yoke of steers, one cow and one sled, onto which was loaded what household furniture was necessary for immediate use, consisting of one chest of drawers, one desk, beds and bedding, together with such cooking utensils as were deemed absolutely necessary. My father drove the ox team, and my oldest brother, Asa Perham, rode the horse, and my mother, myself, and my two younger sisters rode on the ox sled. We only traveled as far as Rindge, N. H., the first day, and there stayed with a friend over night, my father having lived there at the time I was born, in 1789. The next day it was snowing, and we only drove to the middle of the town in Jaffrey, where we stayed with Judge Parker, who married a sister of my mother, and who was the father of Judge Joel Parker, formerly of the Supreme Court of New Hampshire.

On the next day, the air being mild and pleasant for a March day, we drove on through Keene to Westmoreland, where we again put up for the night, near a ferry across the Connecticut river known as Robbins' Ferry.

The morning following we crossed the Connecticut river in a ferry boat, and were then in the town of Putney, Vermont.

From Putney we came through Westminster West Parish. The road leading from Westminster to the south part of Athens at that time, passed through the premises of a Mr. Colton, who lived at the first house south of the farm where David Hitchcock lived in 1830, thence running westerly to the top of the mountain east of Athens Hollow, coming out to where Sylvanus Mattoon then lived, and where George Skinner afterwards lived. Along this rough road we came slowly with our ox team and household goods, and arrived in the town of Athens March 20th, 1795.

The highway coming into Athens from Westminster then passed on over the hill where Daniel Fuller, Esq., then lived, thence to where William Beals then lived, the same place afterwards owned by Major Timothy Whitney, thence crossing the brook south to where Amos Ball now lives, across the farm now owned by Merrill Powers, up onto the hill where Nelson Oak formerly lived, thence westerly up the brook (running from the Shafter Pond) to where Nathaniel Oak once lived, where stood, at that time, a large, unfinished one-story building, then used to hold town meetings in.

David Eveleth then owned the farm now owned by Merrill Powers. Arriving in Athens, my father purchased the farm of Mr. Eveleth where Merrill Powers lived in 1875.

The names of some of the earliest settlers were Jonathan Perham, who lived on the Nathaniel Powers farm, near the east line of the farm lately owned by Oscar L. Perham, but owned the whole of the Ivory Mack farm; Ephraim Holden then owned the farm now occupied by Edward Ball; James Shafter owned the farm known as the Shafter place, but more lately owned by Amos Davis; Samuel Balch lived where Austin Hitchcock now lives; Silas Powers lived on the farm more lately known as the Abner Powers place, but was first owned and occupied by Silas Chapman, the grandfather of the Hon. Clark H. Chapman of Cavendish; David Robbins was then the occupant of the grist mill that used to stand near where Dustin Ball now lives; Stephen Farrington then lived on the farm since owned by Nelson Oak; Ethalston Bagley's father occupied the farm now occupied by his son Ethalston; Leonard Perham, son of Jonathan Perham, owned the farm now occupied by Lyman Alexander, who, with others, made up the town of Athens in 1795.

Jonathan Perham, James Shafter and Seth Oak seem to have been the most prominent men, and their location in the town seems to have resulted in the permanent settlement and organization of the township.

THE SHAFTER FAMILY.

[Judge Wm. R. Shafter, about ten years before his death, gave a paper on James Shafter, his father, and himself and family for Athens.]

Paper on HON. WM. R. SHAFTER.

Townshend, April 14th, 1857.

Impressed with the importance of leaving some record of the origin and genealogy of our family, for the benefit of those who may succeed us, and who may have curiosity or interest enough in the subject to examine it, and learn from whence they came, I have collected and leave on record the few historical facts that I have been able to collect.

It seems that our paternal ancestors came from the west of England. On the mother's side is inherited pure Welsh blood. Our great grandfather, with his wife, emigrated to this country, landing at Boston. They either brought two children with them, or they were born in due time after their arrival—as they lived but a few years, and left no other issue. As they had expended all their substance in getting here, of necessity their orphan children were left dependant upon charity, and were sent to the almshouse, where it seems they remained a few years before they were of sufficient age to be otherwise disposed of.

A farmer from the town of Framingham, Mass., visited the almshouse for the purpose of procuring a boy to assist him in his business. The Shafter boy was recommended to him, and he decided to take him on trial. When they attempted to separate him from his sister, who was his only associate and relative, the evidences of attachment were so strong as to become overpowering, and the benevolent feelings of the good man, silencing all consideration of pecuniary loss, he charitably concluded to take them both. So James and his little sister Molly went to Framingham, though we have no knowledge of dates. The man with whom they went to live (we never learned his name) was satisfied with them. They lived with him until they were both married. James at the age of 19 or 20 married a young woman, Esther McMellen. He continued to reside with his guardian until he became of age, and afterwards remained in the same vicinity, where most of his children were born, Simon, Lois, Molly, Esther, and Lydia. At this period he gathered up his little property and removed to Richmond, N. H., purchased a lot of land and commenced improvements. Here he had three more children born to him, James, Prudence, and Charity. He was a man of medium height, closely knit together, of high temper and indomitable perseverance. He continued the improvement of his farm as his means would allow for seven or eight years, keeping his large family together. At this time he was killed by the falling of a tree, leaving his family dependent on their own exertions. The eldest girls were then put out to places where they could support themselves, and Simon remained at home and took care of his mother and some of the younger children. He remained steady until he was about 19, when he became excessively fond of dancing, wrestling, and other kindred sports. About the age of 24 he joined the Continental army, holding the rank of captain. He died at Valley Forge of small-pox.

Molly, the orphan sister, married a man by the name of Chubb, and is supposed to have removed to Vermont.

Lois, the eldest daughter, married John White, and settled in Weathersfield, Vt. She had three sons and several daughters, one of whom married a Mr. Haskell, and lived near what was called Weathersfield Bow.

Mollie, the next girl, married Ellis Thayer, and settled in Brookline, Vt. Subsequently they removed to Newfane, Vt.

Esther married Benjamin Thrasher and settled in Athens.

Lydia married Enoch Phylips and settled in Essex, N. Y.

Prudence married Jeremiah Bowers and settled in Richmond, this State.

Charity married Jabez Whipple and settled in Athens.

The writer of this was well acquainted with his aunts, and knows them to have been possessed of much more than an ordinary share of intellect, of unrivalled energy, and a perseverance that knows no discouragement.

The elder James Shafter and wife were buried in Winchester, Mass. Thus it appears that up to the third generation there was only one male child to perpetuate the name, bearing the name of his predecessor, James. As such, he alone would transmit to posterity, hence it becomes more important that a more particular and extended account of him and his family should be left on record for future generations, whereby they may be able to trace their family name to the same common origin, for it is not improbable that, years hence, this brief and simple narrative, trifling as it may seem in the day of its nativity, may be found copied into the genealogical records of many a family, who otherwise would have been unable to do so.

At the dispersion of the family at the death of their father James (the fifth child) was put to live with Mr. Dodge, who it seems proved to be a hard, unfeeling man. He was a tanner by trade, so he clothed James in sheepskin clothes, which was perhaps the best he could do for him, and not particularly injurious to the boy, as in the coldest weather he was not allowed to come near the fire, but was compelled to sit on the lowest round of the ladder. Short allowance of food, and that of the most simple kind, together with constant employment in the most servile drudgery, considering his age (only seven years) and his unprotected state, aroused the sympathies of the surrounding inhabitants. The result was, they took him away, and placed him in the family of Deacon Jewett, who proved a kind protector, guarding his helplessness and giving him such counsel as his age and circumstances required. Subsequently he went to live with Mr. John Alexander. He kept a public house in Winchester. James remained with him till he was of age. Mr. Alexander was an easy, inefficient sort of a man, and preferred sitting in his chair and playing with his thumbs to engaging in any more active employment. His wife, however, possessed unusual conversational powers, which she not unfrequently exercised for the special benefit of her husband, who would sit for hours apparently unmoved under the storm of words that would make a common man's hair stand on end. James' diligence and activity gave entire satisfaction to madam, so that he became an especial favorite with her, and in time became the efficient substitute for the old man in all the business transactions of the concern. At the age of 17 he was drafted into the New Hampshire Militia, and ordered to the defence of his country at Bunker Hill, but with his companions, arrived too late to participate in the memorable transaction of that important event. How long he remained enrolled I have no knowledge. He afterwards took an active part in the Battle of Bennington, and discharged his musket sixteen times before the enemy gave way, stormed and scaled the breastworks, behind which the Hessians were ranged, and drove them from the ground, and afterwards, in company with a few volunteers, fought and kept at bay 500 of them until the darkness of the night compelled them to quit the field. He was at the battle of the Cedars of Lake Champlain, but owing to the cowardice of the commanding officer the little troop were surrendered prisoners of war to the British and Indians, who stripped and robbed them of everything that was of any value. James had two crowns in his pocket which he was unwilling to part with for the benefit of the victorious yellow-skin. Watching his opportunity, and taking advantage of the general confusion, he crept carefully down into the cellar and covered them over with dirt in an obscure corner. At this point, turning his eye to the stairway, he beheld a stalwart Indian with his tomahawk raised, peering into the darkness. James, satisfied by his manner that he did not see him, suppressing his breath and keeping as much as possible in the shadow of the wall, approached as near his sable majesty as he could, then with a catamount spring, bounded by him, giving him at the same time a thrust in the stomach, whilst the click of the tomahawk against the wall possibly reminded him that his gait upstairs was in fact a "stitch in time." He was kept a prisoner for fourteen days, and, with others, was exchanged and furnished with guns. After his return to Winchester he continued in his former employment until he was 21 years of age, which was September 15, 1780.

There were several travelers put up there over night whom we may subsequently have occasion to mention. The minor, having now become a man, like other young men wishing to provide a home for himself, had intended to start the next morning for Otter Creek or the West side of the Green Mountains. It being cloudy in the morning, with strong indications of rain, he concluded to postpone his departure until fair weather. About nine o'clock, however, the vapors dispersed, and he shouldered his axe and his small wallet, and bade adieu to all the home he had, with a determined purpose to find and prepare a place for himself in the then wilderness of Vermont.

Being young and active, he overtook the elderly gentlemen who started in the morning, and very naturally fell into conversation with them, as to their destination and objects. He learned that they were from Winchendon, and were going to examine a gore of uninhabited land lying between Grafton (then called Tomlinson) and Westminster and Townshend. They persuaded him to join them, which he at last consented to do. Learning the name of the last settler on the route (where they intended to stop) he went ahead. On his arrival at the place agreed upon (the house of Mr. Ellis), about two miles N. E. of the present "Cambridge Port," he found him engaged in building a stone chimney for a small log house. He cheerfully went to work to help back stone (as they had no team), and worked for his board till the rest of his party came up, when they all started for the promised land. After rambling over the territory, which was an unbroken wilderness, they concluded to stick their stakes and make their pitches; preference being given to seniority. Jonathan Perham (called after, Governor), being the eldest, had the first right. He chose a lot on the West line of Westminster, covering a handsome lot of meadow, also a number of acres of dry, sandy knolls, which proved valuable for its adaptedness to the growth of Indian corn. Samuel Bagley took the next lot West, which made one of the best farms in town. Seth Oak took the third lot in the same range, which was also a most excellent piece of land. He was the first justice of peace in town. Jonathan Foster took the next lot West, which made four in the same range. He died about 1795, and the lot was divided and fell into other hands. Eighty acres of it are still owned by the heirs of J. Shafter. James Shafter, as he was the youngest of the pioneers, came in last for his turn. He chose the next range due North of the "Foster lot." It was a good situation, covered with hard timber, and the depth and richness of the soil gave assurance of a bountiful harvest.

They procured the assistance of a man from Westminster by the name of Hooker, who was the fortunate possessor of a compass, with which, and the accompaniment of an elm bark chain, they were enabled to separate and designate claims. James commenced chopping, and felled about three-fourths of an acre, when a dry limb fell upon his shoulder and so disabled him that he returned to Winchester and remained all winter. The next year he returned, enlarged his operations, built a small house, sowed a nursery of apple trees, etc. In 1783 he was married to Miss Abigail Johnson, by Seth Oak, Esq. She came to Athens with Capt. Ezra Chaffee from Old Woodstock, having lost her parents when she was a child.

From the Letter of Mrs. Mary Shafter, Edminster, with the paper by her father:

Oscar died in Florence nearly five years since. My brothers, James McM. Shafter and William N. Shafter, are residents of this State. I wrote my sister, who lives in Galesburg, Mich., (Mrs. L. S. Ransom). She is the eldest of the family, and I thought she might furnish some items.

Rev. Edmund Shafter, of Boston, a few years since got up a genealogical account, and visited us in Townshend. He, as well as my father, thought the original name was Slaughter, abbreviated for convenience, and that in after years it appeared as Slafter and Shafter; they came to the conclusion that they were second cousins.

My father represented the town many times, and was one of the judges of the courts. I cannot give you dates, but you can ascertain them from the records of Newfane.

FAMILY RECORD.

James Shafter, born September 15, 1759; married Abigail Johnson.

James Shafter, died January 9, 1816, aged 57 years. Abigail Shafter, his wife, died March 14, 1830, aged 78 years. On the 10th of January, 1784, their eldest child was born, and was christened Atalanta, after the noted vessel of that name. She married Caleb Hall, and died in Springfield, Vt., June 28, 1862, aged 78 years.

Wm. R. Shafter, born January 30, 1786; died March 1, 1864, aged 78 years.

John L. Shafter, born September 2, 1787; died February, 1868, aged 81 years.

Mary Shafter, born 1792, died at Grand Rapids, Mich., September 29, 1855, aged 63 years.

There were two other children born between John and Mary; both died in infancy.

As James had obtained some military skill, growing out of his experience in the war of the Revolution, he was promoted to the rank of major in the militia of Vermont. He was also a strong and devoted politician of the school of 1800, and denounced the war of 1812 as unnecessary. He was a prominent business man in all town affairs, and represented it for about twenty years in the Legislature of the State. He was the father and grandfather of the present Shafter generation, giving the name to all such as claim it, although it is spelled differently.

(End of Judge Shafter's paper).

JAMES SHAFTER

was one of five men, an advance party, who first came into the wilderness here to prepare the spot, a little before moving in their families. He helped to clear the first acre. He ever after made his permanent home in Athens. He lived many years, and died there. He was a man of large energy, courage and capacity. In the war of the Revolution he fought at Bunker Hill, Bennington and Saratoga, and for eighteen years represented his town in the Legislature of the State.

HON. WM. R. SHAFTER

was successively farmer, merchant, and County judge several years. He came of a patriotic stock, and "was a man of much force of character and large influence with his neighbors" in a wide neighborhood. "In religious faith and connections he was a Methodist." His wife is said to have been a woman of rare intelligence. The biographer of Hon. O. L. Shafter, their son, before the California Bar, speaks of her as "a woman of superior endowments, majestic in form, with a countenance of infinite expression, and possessing rare conversational and social qualities." She was also a member of the Methodist church. She died many years before her husband, while her son Oscar was but a boy. Judge Shafter removed from Athens to Townshend. He died in Townshend.

Judge Shafter was representative in the State Legislature for 1844 and in 1849, member of the Constitutional Convention in 1836, Judge of Windham County Court, candidate of the Liberty party for Governor in 1840, more than quadrupling the vote of his party, and also held various town offices.

IN MEMORIAM.

An Extract.

OSCAR LOVELL SHAFTER, L. L. D., late Associate Judge of the Supreme Court of the State of California; born in Athens, Vt., October 19, 1812; died in Florence, Italy, January 23, 1873; funeral at the First Congregational church, Oakland, Cal., March 24, 1873.

"Energy, endurance of labor and a kind of mountainous good sense that sees men and things as they are and goes free of all cant, were eminent in him. In his statement of principles, he could have had few superiors. He had that appreciation of the unity and generalization of truth that gives dignity to the intellect, and the perspective of moral grandeur to all principles. When theories of deep human interests were touched, his mind kindled along its summits with fine enthusiasm of poetic feeling and right. It sometimes lay calm, silent, sullen as the sea and rolled with sleepy strength, and in all the manifestations of his intellectual activity, there was something of that repose which is the measure of reserved power and background of all greatness. He was a pleasant companion and good talker. A man with wide discourse of reason, unimpassioned, yet of fine sensibility, his whole nature, by the eternal weight of moral gravity, surging toward the truth. Thus I understood him.—Rev. Dr. Stebbins.

"Eminent among the higher order of minds stood the late Judge Shafter, a type of the time, he ran through the progress of the age in his own experience. His father was a man of much force of character and large influence with his neighbors. His mother was a woman of rare intelligence. At an early age death deprived him of her counsels, but he cherished her memory with a deep and tender reverence. At about fourteen he was placed at a Methodist Academy in Wilbraham, Mass. He completed the course in his school, and finally graduated at the Methodist University at Middletown, Conn., studied law at Cambridge, and commenced practice in Vermont, where his powers soon placed him in the foremost rank of his profession. His coming to this State (California) in the Fall of 1854, the immediate recognition of his abilities, his law partnerships with the first legal talent of this State, his firm stand as an anti-slavery man, his self-consistent adherence to this stand through all the exciting scenes that had followed, his election to the Supreme Bench of the State in 1863, his unimpeachable and even unsuspected integrity as well as ability in that position for four years, then the sudden failing of his health, compelling his resignation, his efforts for recovery, the hope growing fainter till the final word flashed under the sea is well known. As a judge, his impartiality commended a confidence that was well nigh perfect. The suspicions of a bribe never rested on him. There was something in the man corruption dared not approach. He was also merciful. He gave without ostentation, but liberally and continuously. One who had the best opportunity to know, writes of him: 'I know personally of tens of thousands of dollars disbursed by him without any hope of return.' He was severely logical in his mental processes, but along with this went an endowment of the keenest sensibility. When thoroughly roused in his own utterances, the golden ingots of his logic would melt and flow in streams of burning emotion. There was a large measure of that 'sort of religious sensibility' which is said to have marked the speeches of Webster's prime. But it was in his own family that these tender qualities showed themselves in their fullest power. I think we may truthfully add, also, that he crowned his other virtues by walking humbly with his God."

The body was taken to the Oakland Cemetery and deposited in the family vault. Among those present, beside the family friends, were a very large number of the San Francisco and Sacramento Bar.

FROM MEMORIAL SUPREME COURT.

"He completed his law studies under Judge Story at the law school of Harvard University; commenced practice at Wilmington, Vt., in 1836 or 1837; became a member of the Legislature; was the candidate of his party for Representative in Congress, Governor and United States Senator; married to Miss Sarah Riddle in 1840; six children survive.

Judge Shafter arrived at San Francisco November 13, 1854, without his family, and immediately entered upon the practice of his profession, in connection with the leading firm of Halleck, Peachy, Billings & Park. During the next ensuing year, until the arrival of his family, he kept a journal, in which he entered his impressions of the climate and the scenery of California, his views of the society and of the practice in the court, many current events, some biographical sketches and notices and analysis of the books which he read; but more especially was this brief diary remarkable for its manifestations of his deep affection for his family and other relations, for his diffidence of his own ability, and for the gradual growth of a self-confidence that he was equal to contend with the foremost of the bar. It was during this period that he received intelligence of the death of two children within the period of one month. [An only son of seven years, and an infant daughter that he had never seen.]

It was sometimes said of him while at the bar, that he was slow in the preparation of his cases. As a consequence he was very successful at the bar, and his decisions were rarely questioned. While at the bar nobody was more scrupulous than he in the respect with which he treated the judiciary, both in language and bearing, and when he came to the bench he magnified his high office in the same spirit.

He was very successful in gathering the material rewards of his professional labors, and by their judicious investment accumulated an opulent fortune.

He was an ardent student of nature, and loved to be a boy again, amid mountains, forests, fields and waters. And on such occasions he showed an apt familiarity with the best poets of the English language, which caused it be said of him: 'He was a learned lawyer of an older school.'

Hon. John W. Dwinelle.

LAMENT.

[Written upon receiving the letter communicating the death of his two children. Poets and Poetry of Vermont, 1858.]

BY OSCAR L. SHAFTER.

I left them in their mountain home,
One sad, sad day—
I clasped them to my yearning heart,
Then tore myself away.
What cheered me in that hour of gloom?
What hope illumed the sea,
As o'er the boundless deep I sped—
The boundless of the free?
And when the far-off bourne was reached,
What gave to purpose power
To whelm me in the strife of men,
And gild each lonely hour?
The hope that when the strife was done,
The labor and the pain,
To clasp them, in my mountain home,
Unto this yearning heart again.
That hope's no more! My baby died,
Like flower upon its stem;
And now my boy—for him has pealed
The solemn requiem.
Oh! when across the wide, wide sea,
The winged death-knell come,
Then on my lips' high altar stone,
Grew dim the vestal flame.

The filial hope the heart possessed,
To cheer his parents' age,
To stay their footsteps toward the tomb,
Their dying pangs assuage.
My son! my son! my only son!
My joy, my hope, my pride!
Oh! life was severed from its ends,
And darkened when he died!

He's gathered to our early dead
In his exultant morn,
Before the mid-day strife came on,
Or rose disclosed its thorn;
The lust of gold—the heart of pride,
Ambition's fitful dream,
The monumental woes that rise Above the ills between.

The broken hope, the exile's pain,
Temptation's trial hour,
And all the waste and wreck of life
And sin's destructive power,
By early death he's rescued from—
By early death set free;
And can I know the gain to him
And mourn the loss to me?
Father, console Thy smitten ones,
Forgive the tears that rise;
Our children—angels round Thy throne—
But win us to the skies.

POWERS FAMILY.

BY N. W. POWERS.

First, the substance of what a gentleman related by consanguinity, wrote in a manuscript to me in 1864, about my father's family and our genealogy.

The first Powers we trace back to came into England with William the Conqueror in 1066, Sir Roger Le-Powers, who helped subdue old England. He then did considerable fighting in Ireland, being a fine commander, where I learn he stayed for life. He had a numerous posterity. The name is quite plenty in Ireland. Most likely we have the English, French, and Irish blood in us. All the Powers family in England, Ireland and America are said to be descended from this Sir Roger LePowers. Three of his descendants, brothers, are understood to have come to America in 1660. One of these, I am told, put B on the beginning of his name instead of P, to see which name would increase the fastest, making his name Bowers. There has been a good chance to see. The name Powers is a hundred to one of the name of Bowers. The christian name of the one that changed into a Bowers I have not learned; the names of the other two brothers were Walter and Thomas. Our branch of the name, I am told, descended from Thomas.

CAPTAIN JOSIAH POWERS, Great grandfather of the Athens Powers's, lived in Greenwich, Mass., in 1754, and was a rich farmer. He had a large family. One son, Benjamin, was a surgeon aboard of a man-of-war in the Revolution, and died at sea. He was reputed a very learned man, and was writing an arithmetic, of which I have some of the manuscript.

SILAS, the oldest child in this family, had come to Athens a while before the family came.

JOSIAH, second son of Captain Josiah, was a Revolutionary soldier, and came to Athens almost 100 years ago, with his sons, Nathaniel and Stephen, and five daughters, from Chesterfield, N. H., where these children were all born. He became lame by freezing his legs in the war. He got lost in the woods in a snow-storm, when sent to carry despatches to some other part of the army. He once saw a Briton taking aim at Gen. Washington, and drew up his own musket and shot him down, as related by one of his nephews. He helped to throw up the intrenchment on Bunker Hill, and, I believe, fought in the battle. He was in the battle at Bennington, and a grand-daughter of his says that she has often heard her grandmother say that he was at the taking of Ticonderoga.

He lies with Mercy, his wife, in the South burying yard in Athens. He died in March, 1808, aged 62 years. He was in many battles and skirmishes, but, as he says, "through the blessings of God not a bullet touched him."

My friend, Francis Volney Powers, of Waterford, Vt., informs me he obtained much of his information of Nathaniel Powers and family, of Athens, and from his grandfather, Isaac Powers, who was first cousin to Nathaniel.

NATHANIEL POWERS

was considered as a brother to his numerous cousins, who always spoke of him as Uncle Nathaniel. He was born at Chesterfield, N. H., Nov. 29, 1774, and married Esther Johnson, of Phillipston, Mass. He died in Palmyra, Wis., August 13, 1846, aged 72 years, 8 months and 14 days. His wife was born June 8, 1778, and died June 27, 1848. He commenced in the world without any outside lift, and when a child was without any shoes and stockings in winter. His Grandfather Robbins carried him home in winter, once or more, upon his back, when he had to stick his feet into his grandfather's coat pockets to keep them warm. He in turn took care of his grandmother in her old age, his grandfather having died when he was a youth. He was so poor, when a boy, that he had to wear tow trousers to school in winter, his father having become a cripple in the war, and having lost all his property through the Continental money. His grandmother had to spin and weave to keep the family alive, and he to learn to cypher without slate or arithmetic. The teacher set the scholars their sums on paper in those days, but he became quite expert in figures. His first business appears to have been getting out flax with his brother Stephen on one-tenth shares. When sixteen years old he had to go sixteen miles on foot to muster, and find his own equipments, besides having no spending money. He and his brother Stephen took care of an invalid father, a mother, and the younger children to a great extent from boyhood. As a Vermont farmer he became well off. He owned a good farm of 200 acres, cattle, horses, sheep, a good two-story house and out-buildings, with four miles of wall upon his farm, and had $1000 at interest, when the Episcopalians claimed that his farm was glebe land in Westminster. He fought them at law for 13 years, and proved his title clear by a re-survey of Westminster by a committee appointed by the Legislature, and proved his farm to be in Athens. Meantime he had been twice a year 50 miles to court with several witnesses, making $2000 cost. He lost his beautiful farm at last, through an Episcopal judge, who said it belonged to the Episcopalists, and that it was foreordained so from all eternity. The person who is now writing this was present at the last trial.

At the first trial, the third year, when the Judge gave the case to the jury, they gave the case to Nathaniel Powers without a dissenting voice. It had to be called up for trial again, and the next time the judge was not so careless, but decided it himself. Nathaniel also owned a saw and grist mill besides the property here referred to, but the lawsuit about ruined him. His family, which was quite large, was as follows:

EDITH, the oldest child, was born October 30, 1801, and married Warner Coss September 30, 1824.

ROXANA was born July 7, 1802, and married Warren Richmond December 2, 1824.

BETSEY was born May 10, 1804, and married William Patridge, a farmer, June 25, 1827.

NATHANIEL WHITCOMB was born February 23, 1806. He married his first wife, Selina F. Murdock, October 6, 1839, and his second wife, Jane Lowe, December 29, 1872. He is a self-taught clock and watch maker, and can make a town or mantle clock, one that will tell the time of day in every capital at the same time. He also got up his own patterns.

SAMUEL RANDALL was born on November 1, 1807, and married Hannah Kimball, of Sanbornton, N. H., in December, 1838. He worked on a farm until he was 21 years of age, and then learned the machinist's trade. He earned $3,000 at his trade while working in Lowell, Mass., from which place he went to Wisconsin and built a flour mill in company with his brother David, giving the name of Palmyra to the town he settled in. He was the best read in history of any man ever raised in Athens. He died of cholera July 9, 1847. He was quite wealthy, and the widow, only son, and grandchildren occupy his homestead now, 1876.

JOSEPH was born May 9, 1809, and married Jane Petty for his first wife and Lucretia Huntington for his second wife. He was a machinist of reputation, and made several important inventions. In 1832 he made the first revolver known in history, and sold it for $10. He was a member of the Wisconsin Legislature in 1864. Mr. Powers was a poet of no mean gifts. Two hundred men have earned money enough while in his employ to buy themselves homes, and in 1876 he kept one hundred men constantly employed.

LEVI was born February 11, 1811, and on November 11, 1838, married Caroline Kipp. He worked three years of his early life in a cotton factory, and then a short time as a machinist. Later he went to New York, where he was a merchant, then to Whitewater, Wis., and afterwards to Madison, Wis., where he accumulated wealth and retired from active business.

ESTHER POWERS, born August 24, 1812, married first Philetus Ranney, second Thomas Churnel, April 25, 1857; died of small-pox, in Wisconsin.

DAVID JOHNSON, born June 3, 1814. Was in 1865 an inventor of and dealer in agricultural implements and in merchandise; a dealer in landed property. He has been the means of two pretty villages springing into existence, has been secretary of the Wisconsin State Agricultural Society, president of a Madison, Wisconsin, fire insurance company, and a representative in the Wisconsin Legislature, and since 1864 has become a noted lawyer. In patent right suits he is regarded the best help in Chicago, as he understands the patent laws completely and nearly all the mechanical devices of the day. He has taken out more than a dozen patent rights himself since 1864 (now 1876) and has a son at La Crosse, Wis., 36 years of age, machinist, who has taken out ten patent rights—D. J. Powers. He has been commercial agent for the State prison in Illinois, to dispose of their manufactured goods. He married Flora Harris, of New Hampshire, December 11, 1837.

AMERICUS WINDSOR, born January 14, 1816, married Hannah Fuller first, Mary Rockwood, second. Was a merchant first, and afterwards studied and practiced medicine with great success in Wisconsin; he also practiced dentistry. He now lives in California.

MELISSA ORETT, born June 15, 1818; died Dec. 13, 1839.

ENOS LOVELL, born February 23, 1820. He was a jeweller and engraver of the nicest kind, also silver plater and spoon maker. He died December 24, 1843, in Newark, Ohio, where he had established himself in his trades. He was never married.

SILAS POWERS, brother to Nathaniel and Seymour, and uncle to these latter, went to Minnesota first. He married Widow Sarah Chapman, daughter of Deacon Dunham, of Westmoreland, N. H. She was married the first time at the age of 14.

After so long a family paper, let me tell you an anecdote out of the family.

Nathaniel Oak wanted a certain lass for a wife; Amariah Rockham wanted the bewitching beauty too. They had many quarrels over the matter, till, at last, the neighbors decided that they should fight for the prize, and that the one that whipped should have the fair maiden. Amariah, being a very spry man, gave the other, who was slow and clumsy, a sound thrashing, but was so good-hearted, withal, and satisfied with his triumph over Oak, that he said, "Go and take her," and Oak went and lived with her long enough to twice claim a silver wedding.

MRS. POLLIE CARPENTER

lived in Athens when a child. She was a daughter of Jonathan Perham, one of the first settlers, and afterwards lived some time in Belvidere, and some times in Athens. She was mother of quite a family of children. She found herself in 1816, the cold year that no corn was raised, short of hay. She was then about 45 years old. She had a cow but could get no hay to winter her, hay being $20 per ton. What does this unconquerable woman do but go to work and gather grass enough by hand and carry it home in a bag. She gleaned it by the sides of the highway and round the woods, in this way getting enough to winter her cow. She was a widow at this time—the widow of a soldier of the Revolutionary war, and drew a pension in the last days of her life. She lived to be quite old.

I was ten years old in 1816, and remember every event of that year, and although no one starved to death many shuddered for fear.

MARIA GRISWOLD

was born in this town, but went to work in the Lowell cotton mills. About 1837 she married John Jackson, a machinist, and soon after the company which owned the factory selected them to superintend the taking of machinery to Mexico for a cotton factory, which they did, selecting fifteen married couple as operatives to take with them. The Mexican war, in 1846, destroyed their plan of building up a manufacturing city. The Mexicans, being suspicious of them, they had to flee. Maria had two children, one born before her emigration, and the other in Mexico—a babe at the time of her flight—which she brought off in her arms, riding a mule over the mountains 300 miles. Mr. and Mrs. Jackson afterwards went to Houston, Texas, where she died suddenly, leaving five small children.

In closing, I am reminded of an anecdote of Stratton, the most mountainous, bleak town in the county. A great, bloated fellow, who was passing through Stratton, inquired of an old lady at her linen wheel, "What are the products of this town?" "Babies and shingles," she answered.

I married for my first wife Selina L. Murdoch, of Townshend, cousin to Alphonso Taft, the present United States Attorney General, and for my second wife, Miss Jane Lane, of Townshend. I wrote 600 pages for a man in Chicago, who left Windham County at the age of sixteen. At the end of forty years he called on me to post him up, and tell him what had become of all the heads of families that he had known forty years before.

Nathaniel Whitcomb Powers.

March, 1877.

TIMOTHY H. WHITNEY was one of the leading men of the town. He was a major in the war of 1812. He was the representative of the town fifteen times from 1810 to 1834, and was selectman and justice of the peace for many years.

Of the Perham's, who were among the first settlers, we are unable to get much that would be of interest. The descendants of this family now living in and near the town show that they were a hardy and energetic people, and of much benefit in the first settling of the town.

ALVAN PARKHURST was born in Westminster, but in early life moved to Athens, where, with the exception of a few years, he resided until his death, September 10th, 1887. He was a farmer, and was held in high esteem by his townsmen, who elected him to represent the town in 1874. He was chairman of the board of selectmen from 1868 to 1877, and was superintendent of schools at different times.

NIAL BEMIS was born in Westminster, and came to Athens about 1848, where he died February 7th, 1890, in his 71st year. He served the town in nearly all its offices, and although his education was very limited, he was an able financier, reckoning interest and all mathematical problems rapidly and correctly without the aid of pen or pencil. At the time of his death he owned twenty-seven farms, besides several hundred acres of pasturage. He was an active member of the Grange from the time of its organization until his death.

REV. JOSEPH BULLIN was the first settled minister of the gospel, and school teacher, and occupied the position for three years and a half. Under an agreement entered into between Mr. Bullin and the proprietors of the town, he was deeded, on March 7th, 1800, so much of the lot of land set apart for the first settled minister and school teacher as the inhabitants thought him entitled to. He was to have had a deed of 168 acres if he held his position for ten years.

From the earliest genealogical records of the Ball family we get the following: John Ball came from Wiltshire, Eng., to Concord, Mass., in the year 1640. From him has sprung, through his descendants, a numerous family. Abraham Ball, 2d, was born in Townshend, Mass., October 17th, 1786, and came to Athens with his father and mother when he was about eight years old. In December, 1807, he married Miss Hannah Edwards, of Athens, by whom he had fourteen children, five of whom are now (1891) living, two of them, Amos T. and Julia A. Ball, residing in town. Amos T. Ball is a shoemaker by trade, but for the past forty years has been a farmer. He has, during this time, been prominently identified with the interests of the town, being one of its selectmen during the stirring events of the civil war, and at numerous times since. He was for many years overseer of the poor, and has been a justice of the peace for more than thirty years.

JAMES BAYLEY was a prominent man in the early history of the town, being its representative in 1815 and 1825. He was town clerk from 1806 to 1831, and was one of the listers and selectmen for many years. Mr. Bayley was a merchant for a number of years, and it is said that he commenced his mercantile career when a boy by going on horseback to Putney, where he purchased a few small articles such as he could put in the old-fashioned saddle bags, and took them home to sell to his neighbors.

REPRESENTATIVES.

From Deming's Catalogue of the Principle Officers of Vermont.

Whitney, 1810, '11, '16, '17, '19 to '25, '27, to '31, '34; Thaddeus Chamberlain, 1814; James Bayley, 1815, '25; Abraham Ball, 1826; Lemuel Whitney, 1831; Joseph Tinkham, 1832, '33; Lyman B. Alexander, 1835, '36; Amos Davis, 1837; Comfort Thrasher, 1838, '39; Tisdale Porter, 1840; Mark Ball, 1841; John Austin, 1842; John R. Blake, 1847; Lyman Alexander, '1849.

Mark Ball represented Athens in the Constitutional Convention of January, 1850. From then until the present time the dates and names of the representatives are as follows: Mark Ball, 1852; Lyman Alexander, 1853; Amos Davis, 1855; Marvin W. Davis, 1856; Samuel B. Wells, 1858, '59; Charles Whitney, 1860; Solon N. Alexander, 1862, '63; Andrew A. Wyman, 1864, '65; Samuel B. Wells, 1866; Andrew A. Wyman, 1867; George N. Ober, 1868, '69; Jerome O. Kingsley, 1870, to the Constitutional Convention in June and to the Legislature in October; Andrew A. Wyman, 1872; Alvan Parkhurst, 1874, Democrat; Stephen C. Ranney, 1876; Othniel R. Edwards, 1878; George N. Ober, 1880, '86; Jerrie M. Powers, 1882, '90; Jerome O. Kingsley, 1884; Granville F. Bridges, 1888, Democrat.

SOLDIERS IN THE WAR OF 1861.

Ceylon J. Ball, John H. Wells, Geo. W. Skinner, Leroy A. Ball, Homer E. Ball, Phineas Bemas, Fred'k Shaty, Noah S. Crowley, Henry DePutrin, Phineas Bemas, re-enlisted, Benj. F. Derry, Noah Crowley, Ebenezer Oak, Jr., *John H. Austin, Franklin Oak, *Albert E. Cotton, Chas. C. Penniman, Bryant D. Skinner, Curtis M. Ball, John Wyman. Wm. Bridges, Jay Read, Lyman Cook, Edwin B. Dodge, Benj. H. Jenks, Oliver Dodge, Henry S. Leland, Chamberlain Dunham, J. V. McCartney, Curtis W. Davis, Solon N. Alexander, Gideon D. Stiles, Willard J. Burr, and one soldier with no name given.

Athens is strictly a farming town. The only manufacturing industry that is worth mentioning is the manufacture of scythe snaths, the business being conducted by Jerrie M. Powers, and the output being from ten to twelve thousand snaths per year. None of these are finished here, but are simply bent and planed and are then sold to another party who finishes them up for the trade. This gives employment to eight or ten men from six to nine months a year. We have one grocery store, W. C. Robbins, proprietor. We have neither lawyer, doctor, dentist, blacksmith or carpenter, and have but one minister, the Rev. Othniel R. Edwards, who is a Methodist. We have a very pretty church, in which service is held every Sunday.

BROOKLINE.

BY CHARLES P. STICKNEY.

DEDICATED

TO THE LEADING FAMILIES OF BROOKLINE,

Who Gave an Order for each Inhabited House in Town.

BROOKLINE,

OR "THE GRASSY BROOK REGION."

The town of Brookline comprises a valley six miles long, by two to three wide; and originally formed parts of Putney, Athens and Newfane, and contains nearly 17 square miles. Nearly three miles in length belonged to Athens on the northern part; the southern part, to Putney, and the southwestern part, on West river, to Newfane.

GRASSY BROOK,

which has one source at Lily Pond and one on Hedge-hog Hill in Athens, flows through the length of the town and falls into West river. It derived its name from the open meadows in the northern part, producing a large growth of grass where the pioneers of the region went to cut their hay.

The town is, geographically, a little to the east and to the north of the centre of Windham county and seven miles west of Connecticut river, about equal distance from Bellows Falls, north, and Brattleboro, south, and the township seems to have been separated from others by natural divisional lines; a range of hills, east and west; the highest point in the eastern range 1,100 feet from the valley, below. It is a picturesque valley with its fertile meadows, verdant hillsides, and primeval forests, so alluring to the early settlers; and settlements were made, it is supposed, prior to 1777.

THE FIRSTBORN.

The record of the first births are as follows: Martha Whitcomb, April 29, 1777; Jonas Negus, Dec. 12, 1777; Cyrus Whitcomb the 3d, March 17, 1779. It is a matter of conjecture who was the first settler.

CYRUS WHITCOMB,

a few years before 1777, settled upon the lands now owned by John B. Stebbins, on the southern boundary, originally of the town of Athens.

Other early settlers were: Ebenezer Wellman on land of J. B. Stebbins; Apollos Austin upon land of Charles P. Stickney; Ebenezer Harwood upon the farm of Elbridge Mason; Jotham Stebbins on the Rufus Stebbins' farm, and John Blandin upon the farm now owned by Allen O. Wellman.

LAMACH BLANDIN

who came here from Attleboro, Mass., is thought by some to have been the first settler. It is said he had his choice of all the lands for 20 cents an acre, and he made his selection upon the rise in the road a little south of Daniel E. Whitney's house. The wall of his cellar is to be seen at the present time.

Others who located early in this vicinity were: Timothy Wellman upon land now owned by Hiram Whitney; Jonathan Boynton and William Skinner on land of Andrew S. Rist, to the south of this farm. Daniel Bixby and Richard Whitney, and Rosebrook Crawford, on what is called Whitney hill; Francis Drake on Bemis hill.

Those who settled early in the south part of the town were: Abijah Moore on the farm of Wm. P. Stebbins; Wm. Robbins on land of Everett P. Wellman; Daniel Benson south of this farm; Peter Benson upon the farm of Jacob Bush. Those who settled on the borders of West river were: Benjamin Flint, on the farm of Oscar C. Merrifield, the beautiful meadows in the forks of Grassy brook and West river; Ebenezer Ober on the meadows of Timothy M. Albee; Christopher Osgood on land of Luther Osgood, northeast of his meadow; Luke B. Osgood on land of George E. Ware, and James Walden upon the farm of Charles A. Cutler; all of whom are supposed to have come to this valley prior to 1780.

From 1780 to 1790 settlers came in fast. The population during this decade was larger than at any other period in the history of the town. It is safe to say, there was one family or more to every 50 acres. It may be a conjecture to the young to-day, how did these large families live?

The wood was cut and burned in a kiln and from the ashes salts of lye were made, packed in wooden troughs taken on their backs over the hill to Putney, where there was a settlement on the Connecticut river, and exchanged for the little necessities of life.

MOVE TOWARD TOWN ORGANIZATION.

Prior to 1794, the settlers grew dissatisfied with the lack of political rights as townsmen, inconvenient to the town meetings in the neighboring towns and none of their own; unnecessarily oppressed they sought relief through the Legislature, and through an act of the session of Oct. 30, 1794, the south part of Athens and all that part of Putney lying west of an abrupt elevation of land, gave to the inhabitants residing therein, "all of the privileges and immunities" which the inhabitants of other towns have and enjoy, excepting electing and sending a representative to the Legislature and conventions; receiving to the freemen of said parts of Athens and Putney the right of meeting with and voting with the freemen of the towns from which they had been respectively severed in all freemens' meetings for choosing a representative to the General Assembly and other purposes.

THE FIRST TOWN MEETING.

Peter Benson was moderator; John Waters was chosen town clerk; Peter Benson, Lamach Blandin, Jotham Stebbins, selectmen; Abijah Moore, town treasurer; Thomas Walker, constable and collector; Ebenezer Bugbee, William Hills, John Blandin, listers; Benjamin Farmer, leather sealer; Ebenezer Wellmen, grand juror; Benjamin Farmer, Ebenezer Bugbee, tithingmen; Ebenezer Harwood, pound-keeper; Samuel Blandin, hayward; Jonathan Ellenwood, Benjamin Farmer, Cyrus Whitcomb, Ebenezer Bugbee, highway surveyors; Delvis Briggs, Jonathan Ellenwood, Joseph Root, fence viewers; and William Hills, sealers of weights and measures.

SCHOOLS—THE SABBATH.

To the organization of the town, 1794, there were no school-houses, or public place for worship. Schools were kept in dwelling-houses and such places as would best convene. The Sabbath was observed by groups gathered together with due solemnity, when the one most gifted would be appointed to conduct their worship.

PRODUCTIVENESS.

From the organization, 1794, to about 1824, the land had become cleared, the rich soil yielded bountiful crops.

Roads were laid out and more business carried on than at any other period of the town's history, at the junction of the roads, leading through the valley and over the hill to Putney, and westward to Townsend, which was the seat of her commercial business.

The road leading eastward was the thoroughfare for towns westward to Putney, Westminster and Boston.

Within this period the town contained 3 stores, 2 hotels, 2 blacksmith shops, 3 saw-mills, 2 grist-mills, 1 tannery, 1 potashry, 1 doctor, and 1 counsellor-at-law.

THE FIRST STORE.

Samuel Wheat, who lived in Putney, is supposed to have put in the first store, which was last occupied by Ephraim H. Mason.

Anthony Jones followed Mr. Wheat in the mercantile business, and Isaac Palmer, Mr. Jones Palmer; failed about 1817. He was arrested and put in jail, but broke the jail and never was seen here afterwards.

HOTELS.

The house of Walter S. Bennett is one of the oldest houses in town; it was built for a hotel. At this place there was a public house from the earliest date to about 1853. Isaac Taft is supposed to have kept the first tavern, and also a store, which was a little to the east of his house.

Luke Atherton followed Mr. Taft, and Samuel Churchill, Mr. Atherton, and Oats Haven, Mr. Churchill.

Those who followed Taft in the hotel were: Samuel Churchill, Benjamin Ormsbee, Edson Higgins, Franklin Walker, Thomas Gordon, and Joel Coddington, who took down his sign about 1852.

THE OLD TANNERY

was between the houses of Rufus and Samuel Stebbins, and managed by John Bixby.

SAW AND GRIST MILLS.

A saw and grist-mill was early put in below the bridge, by E. W. Bush's house, and occupied by John Benson.

A grist-mill was built on the meadow of William P. Stebbins, owned by William Moore.

A saw-mill was built upon the Blandin brook, by Jotham Stebbins, at an early date.

Elijah Davis of Athens, built a saw-mill and a grist-mill in the north part of the town, who was followed in possession by David Cotwell, Ben. Walker, D. E. Whitney, E. H. Mason, and Winchester Smith. In 1868, Lorenzo W. Bush bought the mill and moved it where it now stands. Three times the freshets in Grassy brook swept out his dam, but being a man of energy he has rebuilt.

THE FIRST DOCTOR

in town was Dr. William Perry, who came from Putney and settled here a few years before 1815. He first lived where Loren Ranney's house stands, but afterwards moved to the south part of the town. He was a successful practitioner and did much toward building up the business and prosperity of the town, and raised up a family of children who became useful citizens. He moved to Newfane in 1839, but is represented in town by his youngest daughter, the wife of Leverett K. Wellman.

HOLBROOK BENSON

practiced in town to some extent. He lived on the hill west of H. M. Whitney's. He was frozen to death about 1828; his house became unoccupied and was burned.

ANNEXATION.

Sept. 20, 1819, a town meeting for that purpose was held :

"Voted to receive that part of the town of Newfane, lying on the east side of Wantastiquet or West river, to be annexed to the town of Brookline, as a part of said town of Brookline."

There was no bridge over the river in this vicinity at this time, and when the river was high it was impossible to pass over by fording. In attending a town meeting in March, the men passed over in the morning on the ice; before night the river broke up, and there was no way to return, and their wives and children were doomed to a night of wretched fears.

On the 7th of October it was :

"Voted to receive the following persons now residing in Newfane, to be annexed to and become a part of said Brookline, viz : Luke B. Osgood, Jonathan Cutler, Lot Holland, William Bently, Elisha Flint, Harvey Osgood, Anthony Mason and Christopher Osgood."

THE GRASSHOPPER PLAGUE

In June, 1821, nearly destroyed all crops of that year. A few fields of grain were saved by drawing ropes across the fields two and three times a day. To represent what hay and grass was destroyed in the town on the fertile meadows of John B. Stebbins, only about 3 tons of hay could be gathered. Trees and all green vegetation were stripped of their foliage.

June 20, 1821, marks the day the most memorable for adversity in Brookline :

THE JUNE FRESHET.

In the morning the heavens were clear and sunshiny; a little past noon, around the summit of Lily Pond hill, the sky became dark and heavy, and soon terrific peals of thunder vibrated the air, and the rain came down in such torrents as to cover the ground with a complete sheet of water. Every bridge was swept away. The valley road in many places was completely destroyed, and many acres of the rich, loamy meadows made beds of stones and gravel. Huge stones were lifted up and carried like pebbles; nearly all growing crops in the valley were destroyed.

The people deeply felt the damage done; the thoroughfare across the hills ceased, the stores were closed, small farms were sold, and the hillsides being deserted the population decreased. The building of roads up West river helped also to bring about this result.

FIRST REPRESENTATIVE.

The town had now been organized 30 years without the right to elect a representative. In 1823, this right was granted; and in 1824 Benj. Ormsbee was elected as the first representative. At this free-man's meeting, the number of votes for representatives to Congress were, Phineas White, 74; Wm. C. Bradley, 6; showing a poll of 80.

THE FIRST TOWN OFFICERS.

William Perry, moderator; Benj. Ormsbee, town clerk; Thomas Crane, Benj. Ormsbee, Lot Holland, selectmen; Israel Whitney, town treasurer; Thomas Crane, Anthony Mason, Daniel Bixby, listers; Anthony Mason, constable; Asa Flint, John Blandin, grand jurors; John Blandin, Israel Whitney, Elisha Flin, fence viewers; Alvin Boyden, the pound-keeper; Isaac Wellman, Saml. Stebbins, Thos. Wells, Christopher Osgood, Daniel Bixby, Isaac Whitney, Zephaniah Perry, highway surveyors; Rufus Stebbins, sealer of leather; Samuel Stebbins, sealer of weights and measures; Christopher Osgood, Elisha Fairbanks, tything-men; Eben Pool, Willard Phillips, Joel C. Lee, Lewis Cady, Bradley Fairbanks, Ira Cutler, haywards; Eben Whitney, Jacob Burditt, grand jurors to court; Elisha Flint, Asa Flint, Amos Hale, Israel Whitney, John Phillips, Samuel Stebbins, petit jurors; Benj. Perry, Amos Hale, sextons.

A UNION MEETING HOUSE.

For a few years prior to 1836, the subject of building a house for public worship was discussed, but an endeavor to unite did not succeed. On March 18, 1836, a meeting was held for that purpose, Ephm. H. Mason was elected chairman; Asaph Coy, clerk.

"Voted that it is the minds of this meeting to build a union meeting house in this town.

During the season the union church was built by Methodists and Universalists. The names of those who signed the covenant of the society were: Timothy Walker, Israel Whitney, Sam'l Rist, Rufus Stebbins, Ephraim Mason, Barzillai Stickney, Hiram Whitney, Asaph Coy, Benj. Walker, Franklin Walker, Daniel E. Whitney, Joel Ranney, Luke Rist, David Walker, Liberty Harwood, Sullivan Pollard, Joel Harwood, Eben Harwood, Colton Evans, Charles Evans, Amos L. Rist, Eben. Whitney, William Rist, Timothy H. Whitney, David Skinner, William Ranney, Jr., Benj. Ormsbee, David Kidder, J. L. Blandin, Philip Bemis, Jr., J. S. Osgood, William B. Root, Jr., Christopher Osgood, Wm. Perry, Wm. B. Root, William Hulett, John B. Turner, Jacob Burditt, Samuel Butterfield, Geo. Harvey, Norman C. Marsh, Asa Flint, Otis Harwood, Joel A. Harwood, A. A. Flint. Rev. Wm. Hodges preached the dedication sermon for the Methodists, and Rev. Mr. Hemphill, for the Universalists, and both were pastors of the church for many years.

For the first 25 years the church was prosperous.

Rev. O. R. Edwards, for the last 20 years, has occasionally supplied the pulpit for this church.

BUILDING OF A BAPTIST CHURCH.

A Baptist church was built the same year; Samuel Stebbins, Samuel Cutler and Ira Outler contributed largely for its erection.

At the raising of the belfry, the wall being brick, the west bent of the belfry was raised and stayed and as the men commenced to lift the second bent, the supporters of the work gave way and precipitated 40 men a distance of nearly 20 feet below among fallen timbers and boards. The jar of the falling timbers loosened the stay of the bent that was raised and that started downwards, too; but seemingly by the hand of Providence, it was stopped by a projecting brick; had this fallen upon the men below, many would have been killed. Those who received injuries were Delius Wellman, Samuel Bennett, leg broken; Jasper Murdock, shoulder dislocated; Everett Wellman, struck in the back by a spike, and Ira Cutler and Benj. Derry, who received internal injuries. Although this accident seemed like a fatal blow, at first, in one week after the belfry was successfully raised.

From the advent of the two new churches to 1860, were years of general thrift and prosperity. Good schools and good society were sustained; Samuel Stebbins and Francis Merrifield took the lead in accumulating wealth.

When the Vermont and Massachusetts Western railroad was being agitated, these men took an interest in the enterprise and contributed to its building.

At the survey of the Vermont Valley railroad, a route was contemplated up West river through the valley of Grassy Brook and on to Chester. Had this been carried out as hoped, Brookline would have been the equal of her sister towns for business, and a village would have sprung up as a depot for the upper towns of the West River Valley.

IN THE LATE WAR

the patriotism of her sons was second to none; when the Union's call for volunteers was given, many young men of promise were in her borders, and they promptly responded. So free and large were the early enlistments that near the close of the war, her quota was nearly filled, and it lessened the trouble many towns had to furnish men.

Of her noble sons, two were killed in battle, Henry Bush at Fredericksburg, and Marshall Wellman at or near New Orleans.

Two died in camp, Alvan Higgins at New Orleans, Alonzo P. Bush at New Orleans.

John S. Barrett died of disease contracted while in the camp.

Hibbard Holden was so severely injured by a minnie ball at Fredericksburg, which passed through his body, as to remain infirm for life.

William W. Perry was wounded in the head by a missile from a shell and has never fully recovered.

Of these brave and noble sons who have honored themselves abroad, J. W. Stebbins is now a Methodist clergyman in Minnesota.

Albert H. Merrifield is a successful business man in Mendota, Ill.

Hibbard G. Holden is a railroad agent at Salem, N. Y.

W. B. Stickney, A. B., residence at Ann Arbor, Mich. Publisher of Johnson's Natural History.

E. A. Stebbins is a successful dentist at Shelburne Falls, Mass.

At the close of the war, the town had her treasury full and the expenses of the war all paid. But few towns have managed their financial business with greater success.

RAILROAD BENEFITS.

What had long been felt a necessity to bring her farmers to an equal position in the transaction of business was better communication to the outer world, and the advent of the Narrow Gauge railroad up West river and across her borders has secured her this position.

Though hotly contested to give aid through the capacity of the town, she had refused by a small vote; but two of her enterprising citizens, Luther Osgood and Oscar C. Merrifield, came to the rescue and furnished the sum of $1,000 more needed to complete the subscription.

BROOKLINE OF TO-DAY.

For the last half century the inhabitants of the town have been gradually going out and farms consolidated; the meadows retained for tillage and the other lands for pasturage, much of which has grown to timber. The valley of Grassy brook inclines gently to the south and is so protected by nature's barriers that violent winds seldom occur; and the soil is quick and warm and yields good crops to the faithful husbandman. There is a

upon the hillside in the south part of the town, about a mile from the valley road. It has strong properties of iron, and is much resorted to in the warm weather of the summer, and if properly developed would, doubtless, become a popular summer resort, as the scenery around is fine; just beyond from an easy carriage road to reach, is a point of land unsurpassed by any in the State for beauty of scenery; looking south, at the west is the valley of the Wantasiquet, deep and narrow, and at the east, the valley of the Connecticut with her broad, fertile meadows; at the west the high lands of the Green Mountains from Florida in Massachusetts, to Mt. Holly, with towering peaks at the north in this State. From this spot we survey Shatterack, Manickmung, Hay-stack and Saddle-back. At the east is seen the Connecticut valley from Holyoke to Ascutney and extending eastward over hill and valley, forest and meadow until the majestic summit of the Monadnock closes the view in that direction; thence to the north is seen the line of the blue Highlands and onward toward the White Mountains. The scenery to allure, the soil quick and productive, the valley of Grassy brook is one of nature's secluded spots wherein man can enjoy the fruits of his own labor.

EDUCATIONAL.

Schools were taught here at dwelling-houses in 1795. The first school teacher in town is said to have been Lucy Skinner, daughter of Samuel Skinner, one of the first settlers.

The first division of the town into districts was April 21, 1796, at a legal meeting warned and holden in Brookline, Peter Benson, moderator.

"Voted to divide the town into three school districts."

"Voted that Peter Benson, Richard Whitney, John Waters, Jotham Stebbins and Benjamin Farmer, be a committee for that purpose.

THE FIRST SCHOOL HOUSES.

The school house built in District No. 1, was located very near the foot of Whitney hill.

In District No. 2, a little south of the Round school house. In District No. 3, near the house of Samuel B. Higgins.

THE ROUND SCHOOL HOUSE.

The Round school house was built in 1822. "Old Thunderbolt,"* or Dr. Wilson, submitted the plan to the building committee, Dr. Wm. Perry and Samuel Stebbins, and it is the oldest school house now standing and is never forgotten by those who live in or pass through the town for its grotesqueness; yet many gifted sons and daughters have passed from this to other places to win distinction as moral and intellectual educators.

POST-OFFICE.

From the first settlement to 1837, there was no post-office in town, and

* See History of Brattleboro, page 63, supposed to have been an accomplice of the robber Lightfoot, who was hung.

our people were troubled sometimes, to find their mail at Athens, Putney, and Newfane.

Brazillai Stickney and Alvin Boyden became impressed that better facilities might be had, and applied to General Martin Field of Newfane, then one of the prominent men of Windham county, in their behalf, and in 1837, the following route was established: "From Bellows Falls, by Saxton's River, Cambridgeport, Westminster West, Brookline, Fayetteville, Williamsville, to Dover, Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays, 8 A. M. and 5 P. M., going; Tuesdays, Thursdays and Saturdays, 8 A. M. and 5 P. M., returning. Otis Bardwell, contractor; and the route started, Aug. 29, 1837.

Nov. 27, 1841, it was ordered to commence the route at Cambridgeport, Athens, Brookline and Dover to Wilmington. This route continued till 1850, when it was discontinued, and Brookline given a side mail from Fayetteville.

POST-MASTERS

for Brookline with date of appointment: Solomon Harvey, Aug. 9, 1837; Ephraim H. Mason, April 27, 1839; Joel Coddington, Dec. 24, 1840; Barzillai Stickney, June, 1846; Joel Coddington, Dec. 18, 1849; Barzillai Stickney, June 23, 1855; Walter S. Bennett, March 3, 1863; discontinued Sept. 14, 1868; Virgil W. Ranney, Feb. 27, 1880; Mrs. C. P. Stickney, 1891.

MILITARY RECORD.

A COMPANY OF MILITIA

was formed in 1801. A commission at hand shows the appointment by his excellency, Isaac Skinner, Esq., of John Blandin, captain in the seventh company, the third regiment, first brigade, and first division, of the militia of this State. Mr. Blandin was discharged in 1803.

This is the first company of which there is any account and may have been the one of which Francis Drake tells the story: "Where the officers had all been chosen and himself the only private left."

REVOLUTIONARY SOLDIERS.

Our settlers that were soldiers in the war of the Revolution were: Jathan Stebbins, Timothy Wellman, Jonathan Wooley, Richard Whitney, Daniel Benson, Ebenezer Harwood and Samuel Rist. Harwood and Rist witnessed the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown.

SOLDIERS OF THE WAR OF 1812.

Our soldiers in the last war with Great Britain were Maj. Timothy H. Whitney, John Holden, Lemuel Tyler Derry.

BLACKSMITHS AND SHOPS.

The first blacksmith in the town is supposed to have been Delius Wellman, one of the first settlers.

A blacksmith's shop was also built at an early day by Ebenezer Wellman, and occupied till washed away by the June freshet, 1821; and his son Isaac was a blacksmith in the south part of the town.

In 1820, Jacob Burditt came from Putney and built a shop, near the house where Mrs. V. R. Ford lives. He became a prominent citizen, and moved to Newfane about 1845.

Norman C. March, from Greenfield, Mass., in 1840; married Augusta Perham of Athens in 1843, and devoted the most of his time to blacksmithing, and has proved a useful citizen, holding the prominent offices of the town; representing it in the legislature in 1862 and '63.

EARLY REMINISCENCES.

The settlers of Brookline endured the numerous hardships and vicissitudes of life that accompanied the lot of those who first penetrated these unbroken forests; though the Indian's stealthy steps were no longer heard, there were the few cattle and the little flock to protect from the ravishing wolves, that on one of the prominent knolls in the southwestern part of the town, their favorite resort—used to collect, "and make night hideous with their howls," and the occasional meeting with and dispatching of bruin.

A black snake, about 8 feet long was killed by Alvin Boyden, on his farm in 1829; and was preserved in the zoology cabinet of General Martin Field, of Newfane—the only one of the kind ever seen in town.

About 1800, a boy by the name of Frye, in the employ of Josiah Taft, in attempting to ford West river on horseback with bags of corn, was swamped and drowned.

About 1823, Holdbrook Benson, son of Peter Benson, one of the first settlers, was frozen to death on the Windmill hill road.

In 1856, Elmore Fairbanks, a young lad of rather weak mind, fell upon an open jack-knife that he carried for self-defense; the knife entered his chest and ended his life.

In 1863, David Walker started for a trip to Dummerston; was frozen, and found dead.

In 1866, Andrew Blood was drowned while bathing in West river.

ROADS

were little known to the early pioneer; marked trees were his guide-posts. The first passways or roads lead across the valley east and west; three of which have long ceased to be. The earliest business transactions took the people to Putney, as merchandise could be boated up and down the Connecticut river; therefore these roads were first sought for. The first valley road that was built followed close under the hill upon the east side, and has been re-built at different times.

The Windmill hill road was surveyed in 1818, and the road that now leads westward from this point to Townshend, in 1819, and the country road, so called, was built in 1828.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

"Vermont is a good State to be born in; but one should emigrate young," as Stephen A. Douglass said, so it seems to be with the sons of Brookline; but her morals are of the first rank, and the home impressions that have been given are safe guides to honorable positions abroad.

Many of those who felled the first trees and sowed the first seed have left no other traces behind them. Among those who added largely to the prosperity of the early days were Daniel Bixby, Lamech Blandin, Rev. Isaac Wellman, Cyrus Whitcomb, Abijah Moore, John Waters and Peter Benson.

PETER BENSON

was justice of the peace for many years and moderator for town meetings and selectman. His opinions were often sought and his decisions were weighed with equal justice.

JOHN WATERS

was an active business man, and undoubtedly the best educated of any of the early settlers; he taught schools and was very ready with the pen. He was the first town clerk and held the office many years; was many years a justice of the peace and selectman; and was identified with the business of the town more than any other man.

Of those who settled here about 1780 and left descendants still living in town are:

EBENEZER HARWOOD, represented by his son, Joel Harwood, and grand-son, Otis Harwood, a worthy and respected citizen now 66 years of age, without children.

TIMOTHY WELLMAN, represented by his son, Daniel Wellman, who is now living at the age of 30, and grandsons, Leverett K. and Allen O. Wellman, and great-grandsons by Leverett: Arthur C. and George Wellman, and great-granddaughter by Allen, Helen B. Wellman.

DANIEL BENSON, represented by his son Daniel and granddaughters, Hannah Adams and Lucinda Flint, and great-grandsons, by Hannah, Ozro Adams; by Lucinda, John Flint.

BENJAMIN FLINT, represented by his son Asa Flint, and grandson Anson Flint, and great-grandson John Flint.

EBENEZER WELLMAN, represented by his son, Isaac Wellman, who was a deacon of the Baptist church many years and a prominent business man in town; and his grandson, Everett P. Wellman, also a prominent man, and his great-granddaughters, Abbie A. and Martha Wellman; the former was a very successful school teacher and married Judge Andrew A. Wyman of Athens.

RICHARD WHITNEY, represented by his three sons, Israel, Ebenezer and Timothy H. Whitney, and grandson by Israel and Daniel E. Whitney, who has held the principal offices in town; and by a great-granddaughter, Bertha Whitney, and grandson by Ebenezer; Erastus Whitney, a bachelor, 68 years of age.

THREE OLD HOMESTEADS.

There are three farms in town that with enlargements remain in the hands of the descendants of the original owners, the Rist farm:

THOMAS RIST

came from Sutton, Mass., in 1788, and bought of Jonathan Boyden the now so-called Rist farm.

SAMUEL RIST

a few years after the close of the war, came and took possession of his brother's farm. He raised up a large family of children. His son, Andrew S. Rist, is a bachelor, who is now 66 years of age.

JONATHAN CUTLER came from Fitzwilliams, Mass., in 1799 and bought of James Walden the now Cutler farm. He was represented by his son, Ira Cutler, who married a daughter of Iasiah Rounds, one of the early settlers. Ira in his prime was a strong, resolute man, and spent much of his time in winter in hunting. [See farther the geneology in sketch prepared by the family.] The Cutler family were prominent members of the Baptist church and added strength and wealth to the town.

CHRISTOPHER OSGOOD

settled on land now owned by his son Luther, about 1790. Luther married a daughter of Ephraim Park, and moved to the western part of New York state, with the intention of making it his home; but the declining years of Mr. Park brought him back to Vermont, when he took possession of the Park's farm, and of his father's, and bent his energies to build up a farm second to none in the valley of West river, and his broad fields of grass and well-filled granary indicate a successful farmer. He has taken an interest in the politics and prosperity of the town, and has held the chief offices of trust in the gift of the town. His sons are Ephraim P. and Fred L., and grandsons, Hermon and George.

THOMAS CRANE, ESQ., moved into Brookline from Richmond, N. H., about 1806, as the first generation of the settlers were passing away. He entered largely into the interests of the town; spent his winters in teaching, was town clerk six years; represented the town in the legislature; was selectman 18 years; died in his 57th year, 1836, from 1802 to 1830 held a leading position in the town; town clerk, selectman, the first representative to the legislature.

BENJAMIN ORMSBEE

WILLIAM ADAMS

was born in Dummerston, this county, in 1810. His father moved to Brookline in 1819. At an early age, William Adams entered into the politics of the town, and for the past fifty years has been closely connected with its history. He has been justice of the peace many years and qualified to draft legal papers which he has done for the people of the town. He has represented the town and has been town clerk 23 years.

BARZILLIA STICKNEY was born in Jaffrey, N. H., Nov. 12, 1792. He passed his early life in New Hampshire, Northern Vermont and Western New York. He moved to Brookline in 1827, married Sarah Perham, the oldest daughter of Jonathan Perham of Athens, one of the first settlers of Athens. He was a carpenter and mechanic and located here with the view of improving the waters of Grassy brook, to prosecute his business; but the volume of water did not meet his expectation during the summer season, and he turned his attention to farming. He interested himself in supporting the best of schools, and held those who held office strictly accountable in rendering their accounts. He died in 1882, at the age of 89.

FRANCIS MERRIFIELD

came to Brookline from Newfane in 1841, and bought the original Flint farm. He raised up a large family.

CHARLES P. STICKNEY

was born Oct. 10, 1840. His parents though in limited circumstances gave him time to attend school. He worked on his father's farm, taught school, and by industry fitted for college in 1861; but the war was then in progress and other causes arrested him in his purpose. In 1866 he went West, and was establishing himself in business when he was called to return to Vermont to care for those who had cared for him. In 1869 he married Frances A. Hastings; a son was born to them in 1882, Carrol W. Mr. Stickney has held the office of constable four years. (1883), and town superintendent of schools 13 years, and represented the town in the legislature, 1882 and 83. He is in the full vigor of life and enters with earnestness into whatever he undertakes.

TIMOTHY H. WHITNEY.

was born in Waltham, N. H., in 1777. His father, Richard Whitney, moved to Brookline soon after and settled upon the farm now owned by Otis Harwood. He made the first clearing upon the farm and built the house now standing. Timothy was an active boy and gained an education through the limited sources of those days, so that at eighteen, he taught school; (page 12.) At twenty he was elected constable and served several years, and has been town clerk and lister; in 1798, married Abigail Blanchard of Waltham, N. H., and settled upon the farm now owned by his son, Hiram Whitney. He was prominent in the business of the town, and rose from a private to a major in the militia, and enlisted in the war of 1812; was promoted colonel. In 1815 he moved to Athens, where he represented the town in the Legislature several years, was in the Legislature at the time Brookline was granted the right to elect a representative. He was judge of the County Court. He died at the age of 82 years. He is now represented in town by his son, Capt.

Hiram, a man of few words but to the point, and a much esteemed citizen. He was born in 1804, married to Fanny Perham in 1828, has represented the town at Montpelier, and held his share of its honorable offices with fidelity and honor.

HIRAM M. WHITNEY, son of Captain Hiram, and grandson of Colonel Timothy, was born in 1829; has represented the town, and been one of the selectmen 14 years. His daughter, Laurett, brings up the honors of the family. Few women are more capable in the performance of the duties of a household, or deft in cunning work that graces the wall of the hall of a county fair, or adorns more pleasantly the rooms of her home.

ARTHUR B. STEBBINS, son of John B. Stebbins, Esq., was born in Brookline, August 16, 1858. His minority was passed on the farm, gaining from his father the art of farming, and from his mother the culture for a noble manhood. He acquired a thorough academical education. In the spring of 1878 he was clerk in the store of his brother-in-law, in Rochester, Minn., and on account of the severe and prolonged sickness of his father and his family, he being the oldest son was called home. He at once returned and took charge of his father's business, and in the spring remodelled and constructed a new set of barns, and gave his father's business a new impetus. In the fall of 1880 he returned to Minnesota, as senior clerk of the same firm. While here he assisted one of the partners, unused to farming, in selecting stock for a farm he had bought out of the city. Arthur was often consulted about this farm. It gave him excellent opportunities for developing his genius in the Eden occupation. He made the herd books a study; was sent to New England in the winter of 1882, by some prominent herdsmen of Minnesota, to make a selection and purchase of thorough breeds. His selections met with such hearty success he decided to resign his position in the store and devote himself to agriculture.

He married Hattie Bell, daughter of Daniel Lyon, then of New York, Sept. 23, 1883. His father urged him to remain on the old farm, but ambitious to gain an independence by his own efforts, he and his wife left Vermont, Oct. 11, 1883, and upon the aired, fertile plateau of the Cumberland Mountains, Tenn., he bought a tract of land, known in the early history of the country as a favorite retreat of the red man, and in this delightful climate he had commenced to build up and beautify a home, and gain for himself a laudable notoriety in the agricultural world, but in the bud of his ambition he was in an instant cut down; Jan. 19, 1886, he and his brother-in-law, George Lyon, were at work in a wood near the house, when a tall, oak stub, standing some 30 feet distant fell, and struck Mr. Stebbins to the ground, breaking the spinal column at the neck. So quick and sharp the deadly deed was done without even rupturing the skin. This sudden death seemed strange to all who knew him.

His remains were brought home to Brookline for interment. He rests in the family lot beside his mother and brother.

JOHN BLANDIN.

BY CHAS. W. BLANDIN, RUTLAND, ILLINOIS.

An early settler of the territory later known as the town of Brookline, was John Blandin, born at Attleboro, Mass., in 1764, of French descent. He early identified himself with the general weal of the new settlement in all of its various efforts at advancement. Educational and religious interests received his especial fostering care. He early became a clerk of the Baptist church, and in 1802, was with his brother Lamech, ordained as deacon, at the time Amos Beckwith was ordained for the pastor, which office he held as long as he lived, until his death in 1835. In 1784 he was married to Sarah Gray, at Brookline, and moved onto an unbroken forest tract of land, that afterward became the "Blandin farm," on which he spent the remainder of his life. There were 11 children by this marriage, 10 of whom settled in life with families, all leading and useful members of society. Mr. Blandin buried his first wife in 1821, and in 1823 married Mrs. Sally Hubbell, of West Westminster, by whom he had three children, two of whom are living and take active part in life's duties. She died in 1855.

Probably but few families have exerted a broader or more salutary influence in moulding the general welfare of this community than that of John Blandin the subject of the portrait-frontisplate of this history, was the twelfth child of John Blandin, and the first by his second marriage, born in Brookline, Feb. 18, 1824. His mother's maiden name was Sally Holden, of Scotch-English parentage. He has resided for the last 30 years in Rutland, Ill. He is engaged in the retail drug and book trade, and is regarded as a reliable business man.

He was married to Miss D. A. Johnson, of Elmira, N. Y., in 1850. They have one child, a son, Fremont C. Blandin, who has received a liberal education, and is a prominent lawyer and editor at Streator, Ill.

REV. DENZEL MANSFIELD CRANE.

BY MRS. D. H. CRANE.

Denzel Crane was born in Brookline, Feb. 29, 1812, and died at his son-in-law's, Rev. I. R. Haskins, in West Acton, Mass, Sept. 4, 1879, aged 67. He was the third son of Thomas Crane, Esq. He early attended the district school of 10 weeks in summer and winter; but when old enough to labor was limited to the winter term. Under the instruction of his father, an experienced teacher, he acquired the elementary branches of an English education. His evenings were spent at home in the family circle. Thus was the period of his boyhood and early youth passed. When 15, he united with the Baptist church. At the age of 18, he was impressed with the importance of the gospel ministry. He commenced study with Rev. Phineas Howe, and subsequently studied at Franklin and Pierce academies and Brown university, preaching and teaching to meet his expenses.

He married Bathsheba H. Phillips of Newfane, March 1, 1837, and was ordained in his native town the following June. He was pastor, successively, in Brookline, Grafton and North Springfield, Vt., Northampton, Boston and Dorchester, Woonsocket, R. I., Greenfield, Mass., North Springfield, Vt., again, Winthrop and Northampton. In nearly all of these pastorates revivals were enjoyed, resulting in the encouragement and rebuilding of the churches. The most extensive revivals in connection with his labors were during his first pastorate of three years at North Springfield, when 84 were baptized into the church, and at Boston, in six years, 189. His longest pastorate was 12 years,—it was his first in Northampton—during which he was elected 10 times a member of the school committee and for six years he was superintendent of the public schools, and, while thus engaged, the honorary degree of A. M. was conferred upon him by Amherst college. There his remains were tenderly laid away, with his three sons, and only grand-son.

BAPTIST CHURCH HISTORY.

BY JOHN B. STERBINS, Esq.

THE BAPTIST CHURCH IN BROOKLINE was constituted in 1785, and belonged to the Leyden and Windham Association in 1853, and has never failed to make its annual report. For several years the church had no ordained pastor. From time to time some brother was appointed to conduct public worship. We notice was ordained pastor, June 2, 1802, and Bros. Lamech and John Blandin, deacons. The church having no house of worship, these ordaining services were held in Josiah Taft's new barn; and the record says "with decency, order and great solemnity." Bro. Beckwith's pastorate continued a year and a half, when again the church was destitute until Nov. 3, 1808, when was ordained pastor and Daniel Bixby deacon. Elder Wellman was pastor 12 years. His salary ranged from $40 to $75 per annum. His other source of income was an 80-acre farm which he owned and cultivated.

In 1810 the church enjoyed a revival, in which 40 members were added, and in 1817 there was another revival. The church flourished under the care of Elder Wellman until 1821, when he embraced open communion. The church called an ecclesiastical council on this account, the result of which was the withdrawal of their fellowship from Bro. Wellman as a Baptist minister. Three years later, Bro. Wellman renounced his open communion sentiments and was fully restored by the church. After the dismissal of Elder Wellman in 1821, Elder Hibbard supplied the church eight months.

ELDER BELA WILCOX

was invited, Jan. 2, 1823, to preach, which he did with great satisfaction to the church for three years. March 17, 1826, the church voted to settle Bro. Wilcox with us for five years. April 26 the church gave him a call to be ordained, but he declined. Aug. 25, 1826, the church called to the ministry, and just one year after ordained him as pastor. During the next year the church in East Townshend was organized, and about 70 members were dismissed from Brookline to Townshend, reducing the Brookline church about one-half.

BRO. DAVID CUTLER

The church was prosperous while under Elder Cutler's care, his labors being very useful.

DEA. CALVIN BARRETT

was received from Windham church, July 7, 1827. His letter says "that he has served as deacon of that church over 20 years." He was chosen deacon of this church also, which place he filled with great acceptance until his death in 1862.

SUNDAY SCHOOL.

Feb. 25, 1828. The church voted to organize a Sunday school in town. Rev. David Cutler, Thomas Crane and Alvin Boyden, superintending committee. This school has continued to the present time, with but short vacations.

BRO. CRANE

was invited to preach Dec. 24, 1830.

A BRO. PERRY

from the Marlboro and Newfane church was called, and preached about one year, and was succeeded by Bro. George Phillips from the same church, who preached here until 1834.

BRO. DANA BROWN

succeeded Bro. Phillips. Bro. Brown's pastorate continued to 1836.

BRO. DENZEL M. CRANE was then called and was ordained by this church, June 1, 1837, it being the same day the present house of worship was dedicated.

Elder Crane continued his labors here till June 15, 1838. Rev. John Baldwin, from Jamaica, succeeded him, till the spring of 1841, when from Windham, was called to the pastoral care of the church, and ordained on the 18th of November following.

The church prospered under Elder Kingsbury's care till 1849. In the autumn of this year a fatal epidemic passed through the town, and this devoted servant of God, his wife and three children, the entire family, deceased within the short space of two weeks, and the wife's father and mother about the same time.

REV. RUFUS SMITH

accepted the pastorate in the winter of 1849-50, and was dismissed by letter, March 28, 1852. Sept. 21, 1851, Bros. Calvin T. Barrett, Francis Merrifield and C. W. Stebbins were elected deacons. Dea. Francis Merrifield left a legacy to the church of $250.

BRO. C. B. SMITH,

then principal of Leland and Gray seminary, Townshend, this county, was called to supply the desk in April, 1854, and February, 1855, he was ordained pastor and remained such till August 7, 1859.

From 1859 to 1862, the desk was supplied by Bros. Chas. Frost, Whitcomb, Wheeler, Burrows and others. In 1862 Rev. J. P. Huntington was pastor nine months, succeeded by Rev. Sem Pierce. Failing health obliged the latter to retire in the spring of 1865; he was succeeded by

REV. CHARLES FARRAR,

July 1st, the same year, whose pastorate continued to 1871, when he was dismissed to Warwick, Mass. During this time the house of worship was greatly improved, largely through the efficiency of the pastor's wife, Elizabeth Farrar.

REV. WM. A. A. MILLARD was pastor from 1871 to 1873.

REV. J. D. DONAVAN was next pastor from 1873 to 1876.

From May, 1876, to 1880, Rev. Charles D. Fuller was pastor. This pastor was stricken down with paralysis, resigned and moved to Brattleboro.

May 1, 1881, Rev. Charles Farrar was recalled as pastor, and served as such till June 1, 1884, when he retired and moved to California with his family, aged 85 years.

Since June 15, 1884,

REV. I. D. BURWELL

of Saxtons River, has supplied the desk half the time, and as acting pastor till May, 1887, when Rev. H. V. Baker of Rhode Island, accepted the pastorate, which continued two years. About 540 members have belonged to this church. It has ordained six ministers and licensed several others, among whom are Eliot P. and Austin A. Merrifield.

This church has had two meeting houses. The first a temporary building, without floor or other finish, except a small desk, attached to the frame on one side.

In 1836-7 the present substantial brick edifice was erected.

Though often without a pastor, the church has always sustained discipline and the Christian ordinances. It has dismissed many members, who have become pillars of strength, to some of the churches in the large cities and in the growing West.

We cannot close this sketch without offering a tribute of love and respect for the faithful dead and absent, whose names and doings are here recorded:

DEACONS.

William Thomas, Lamech Blandin, John Blandin, Daniel Bixby, Isaac Wellman, Harry Cary, Calvin Barrett, Jonathan Cutler, Luke B. Osgood, C. S. Boutwell, Francis Merrifield, Calvin T. Barrett, Chalmers W. Stebbins and O. C. Merrifield.

CLERKS OF THE CHURCHES.

Daniel Bixby, Archalas Bixby, John Blandin, Thomas Crane, Anthony Mason, C. W. Stebbins and John B. Stebbins.

THE INDIANS.

BY JOHN B. STEBBINS.

Soon after the settlement of this town, the inhabitants of the northern part of the town, which lies in a deep and narrow valley, were startled one day by the report that the Indian war-whoop had been heard in the southern part of the town and along the hill sides. They all rush out and listen.

The most incredulous are satisfied that it is real. What shall be done? There rises abruptly on the easterly side of this town Athens and New-fane, 15 miles one unbroken line of hill, about 1,000 feet high above the main valley, and a range nearly as high on the west. They at once decide to do their best to escape across the mountain to the settlement in Putney.

But one man is sick and cannot walk; shall they leave him? No, a litter is hastily prepared, the sick man laid upon it and placed upon the shoulders of the most athletic, and the mixed party of men, women and children move off hastily. Closely the mother clasped the hand of her trembling child at her side; she thought of the Dustan family, the massacre at Bloody Brook—scenes fresh in their minds—horror thrilled the nerves of the weaker, as they were startled by the crackling of dead limbs, or the creaking and groaning of some half fallen tree. On and up,—the sick man is abandoned,—the summit is at last reached. The frightful foe has not yet closed in upon them. Two miles of gradual descent was between them and the residence of Captain Jewett; this distance was soon accomplished; the party hauled up before the captain's door. They quite took him and his family by surprise; but their story being heard, they were told their alarm must have been occasioned by the shouts of a party of surveyors that had passed over the mountain that day. They treated the whole company to mush and milk for supper and stored them away as best they could for the night. The next day the party returned to Brookline and found their homes just as they left them; but these mothers felt almost as though their dear ones had been reclaimed from a terrible fate.

The sick man (Eliphalet Skinner) was found alive where he had been left the day of the flight. He regained his health and lived to a good old age.

C. T. BARRETT.

BY MRS. E. C. BOOTH.

As an eccentric person few are so generally known and remarked as our deacon and townsman, Calvin T. Barrett. A part of his life has been brilliant and noteworthy as a godly, upright man, acquainted almost to a line with the constructions of the Bible and other religious doctrines, also as a lover and instructor of music. The practice as a teacher of singing-schools, having brought him to an almost intimate acquaintance with a large part of the people in Windham county.

Some parts of his life have been a bewilderment from insanity, at which periods he wanders about, chart-drawing, or giving concerts and other entertainments.

THE CUTLER FAMILY.

FROM MRS. JANE BENNETT CUTLER.

Samuel Cutler was born in Fitzwilliam, N. H., Aug. 13, 1796.

In early life he came with his father to Brookline. He learned the trade of carpenter and builder, which he continued more or less during his life.

Feb. 17, 1817, he married Ruth Phillips, daughter of John Phillips, Esq. of Marlboro, this county, a very estimable woman. She died January, 1833, leaving three sons and one daughter.

June 5, 1834, he married for his second wife, Sally Phillips, a second daughter of John Phillips, and had by this union one son, John H. Cutler.

In 1828 he purchased a farm near the centre of the town, owned by Dr. William Perry, where he resided until the last two years of his life. In 1836-37 he built for himself a substantial brick house.

In 1855-56 he was sent by his townspeople to the Legislature, being called the third time to an extra session caused by the burning of the State house.

In 1854 he sold his farm and moved to Brattleboro, to spend the remainder of his days. He died Aug. 3, 1866, aged 70 years.

Luther, his first son, died in infancy.

Jonathan, the second son, was a good scholar. At the age of 20, he went to Boston, where he was successful in business.

In 1848 he married Loretta E. Abbott from Windham, daughter of Deacon Hart B. Abbott. After some years he returned to Vermont and settled in Brattleboro, 1851.

He died in 1867 at the age of 45 years, leaving a son and daughter. The son, Fred A., for several years has been in the office of A. I. & L. E. Kelly, real estate agents in Minneapolis, Minn.

Samuel, the third son, left Brookline at the age of 20 for Boston, where he has been engaged in business till the present time, residing in Boston the first 10 years, since then at Somerville, Mass.

In 1851 he married Sarah Jane Bennett of Brookline.

They have four children, the oldest, Samuel Newton, a graduate of Harvard college, class of 1877; Frank Ernest, Ella Florence and Jane Ruth, all of Somerville.

Albert, the fourth son, in early life went to Minnesota, spending the most of his time in farming. He died Feb., 1883.

John H. Cutler, the youngest son, married Martha A. Fisher, daughter of George Fisher, Esq., and has since gone to Tracey, Minn., where he is engaged in farming. He has one daughter, Laura J., born in Brookline, who lives with him in his western home.

THE STEBBINS FAMILY.

JOTHAM STEBBINS, son of Benjamin and Jerusha Stebbins, born at Brimfield, Mass., April 21, 1761, married Phebe Ellenwood, who left children: Samuel, Rufus and Phebe. He was a soldier of the Revolutionary war. He moved into Brookline in 1787, and settled on a farm, where he lived till his death in 1850, aged 89 years. He was of English Puritan descent and very tenacious of his religious principles.

SAMUEL STEBBINS,

oldest son of Jotham, was 4 years old when his parents moved to Vermont. He married Sarah, the oldest daughter of Dea. John Blandin, and settled on a farm adjacent to his father's, where he lived until his death in 1866, aged 83. He was an enterprising farmer and prominent citizen of his town; patriotic and public-spirited; kept a close run of the State and National politics; thrice elected to the Legislature, and holding many of the positions of trust. He had four sons and one daughter, who lived to maturity.

Eli M., the eldest son, died at Brown university at the close of his second year, 1839, aged 25.

Elvira, the only daughter, died in 1845, aged 25 years.

JOHN B. STEBBINS,

third son of Samuel, born in 1824, received a fair academic education at Leland and Gray seminary, and is now (1891) living on a farm near the centre of the town. He has ever been prominent among his townsmen, as a reference to the list of town officers will show, one of the incorporators of Windham County Savings bank, and for several years one of its directors.

In 1847 he married Mary E. Barber, eldest daughter of Dr. Geo. W. Barber, formerly of Wardsboro. She died June 21, 1885, leaving two sons and one daughter.

Arthur, eldest son of John B. Stebbins, was accidentally and instantly killed at Skene, Tenn., Jan. 19, 1886.—See previous notice by Mr. Stickney.

SAMUEL E. STEBBINS, son of Samuel, born 1830, is now a section farmer in Dakota, and a member of the Territorial Legislature. He was a Union soldier in the war of the Rebellion, and since the close of the war has spent several years at land surveying in the Northwest for the United States government and the Northern Pacific Railroad Company.

Charles Q., the youngest son of Samuel, resides in Townshend, this county.

RUFUS STEBBINS,

second son of Jotham, resided on the farm with his father. He married Clarissa, daughter of Dea. John Blandin, and raised a family of 11 children: Thomas, Clarissa, Chalmer, Adin, Sarah, Jonas, Christana, Vashti, William*, Edwin, Jotham.

Thomas is a farmer, Adin is an artist, Edwin a dentist, Jotham a Methodist clergyman, and Chalmer and William are well-to-do farmers in town; they have both represented the town in the Legislature and held many other honorable positions of trust.

Clarissa and Vashti are settled in town; Edwin at Shelburn Falls, Mass.; the others are in Minnesota. Sarah and Christana are deceased.

Phebe, only daughter of Jotham,

*William P. Stebbins, of Brookline, died March 12, 1886, aged 54 years.

married Joab Holland of Townshend, and raised a large and respectable family.

EDWIN ALONZO STEBBINS, son of Rufus and Clarissa (Blandin) Stebbins, born in Brookline, July 10, 1837, passed his boyhood days on the farm, attending public school in the Round school house, and the academies in Townshend, Springfield and Brandon.

He studied dentistry with Dr. E. M. Bissell, and began practice in the winter of 1860-61 in South Londonderry.

He enlisted in Co. G, 11 Reg. Vt. Vols., and was appointed corporal on being mustered into United States service, Sept. 1, 1862, and was promoted to sergeant, 1863; Company quartermaster-sergeant, Dec. 28, 1863; first sergeant, Jan. 28, 1864; first lieutenant, June 2, 1865.

The regiment was stationed in the defences of Washington, D. C., till May, 1864, when it was ordered to the front and joined the 2d Brigade (old 1st Vt. Brigade), 2d Div. 6th Army Corps, at Spottsylvania, Va., with which it served till the end of the war.

When the regiment was discharged a few hundred of its recruits were kept in service to do garrison duty, with a sufficient number of officers for command. This battalion was stationed at forts on the Potomac river, a few miles below Washington. Lieutenant Stebbins was post quartermaster at Fort Foot, and quartermaster of the battalion till they were ordered to be discharged Aug. 25, 1865.

He succeeded Dr. E. M. Bissell, dentist at Shelburne Falls, Mass.

Was elected president of the Connecticut Valley Dental Society, Nov. 5, 1885.

He was one of the organizers of the Franklin County Sunday School Teachers' Association (union) in 1876, being elected its president in 1877, and its secretary eight successive years, from 1879.

He was a delegate from Massachusetts to the International Sunday School Convention at Atlanta, Ga., in 1878.

He married Jane P. Nutting of Groton, Mass., May 12, 1861, who died at Shelburne Falls, Mass., Sept. 15, 1877.

He married A. Adella Smith of Holyoke, Mass., Nov. 28, 1878. Children: George Edwin, born Jan. 27, 1882, and Lucy A., born June 8, 1883.

The doctor is also treasurer of the board of trustees of Shelburne Falls Academy, and a trustee of Arms Academy, completed and dedicated in 1880.

THE FRANCIS MERRIFIELD FAMILY.

Francis E. Merrifield bought a farm on West river in Brookline, and moved on to it with his wife and 10 children in 1840. One son was born to him in Brookline, making 11 children in his family. At the time he came to Brookline no member of the family professed religion, but subsequently the parents and all the children, except Leonard, became active members of the Baptist church in Brookline, and Leonard joined the church of the same denomination in Dover. The father was for a long time deacon of the church in Brookline. They were all very regular and constant in their places in the choir (they all sang,) in the Sunday school, and wherever duty called. Mr. and Mrs. M. brought up their family to strict, orderly, moral and religious habits, and most rigid industry and economy. Yet they were very generous towards all religious purposes.

The children are all still living; all are married and have families.

Elliot P. took full collegiate and theological courses, and is a Baptist clergyman.

Austin S. took a theological course. He has been for several years a State missionary in Kansas.

Emery E. studied medicine. He was an army surgeon, for some time in a rebel prison. He is now farming at Macon, Mo.

Edwin S. Sherman, is a very intelligent farmer, and an active church member. He has a son who is a Baptist minister.

H. I. Turner is a well to do farmer in Dover.

S. J. Greene, is a retired farmer.

Charles S. White, is a farmer in Grafton.

Leonard B. Merrifield went to Mendota, where he engaged in a drug and book store, and traded in real estate for several years, and is now an organ manufacturer.

O. C. Merrifield remained on the homestead in Brookline till 1880, when he joined his brothers in the organ business at Mendota, Ill. He was a very active and useful citizen.

Charles Brooks, is a well educated Baptist minister.

Albert H., served in the Union army nearly through the war. He was a druggist at Amboy, Ill., for several years, but finally joined his brothers in the organ business at Mendota; since moved to Ottawa, Ill.

THE ADAMS FAMILY.

SAMUEL ADAMS.

born at Lancaster, Mass., July 10, 1781, came to Dummerston, Vt., when a young man and learned the slater's business with Peter Willard.

Nov. 27, 1805, he married Dorcas Hale, who was born at Oakham, Mass., Jan. 13, 1782. She was a woman of great endurance, and devoted her life to the cares and interests of her family. She died in Brookline, July 15, 1866, aged 84 years.

Children: Three sons, born at Dummerston:

Samuel N., born July 6, 1807; William, born July 15, 1810, and Chauncy, born Nov. 9, 1814.

February, 1819, the family came to Brookline, and settled on a farm near the centre of the town.

Samuel N., married Laura Ormsbee, of Newfane, where he owned and kept the principal hotel for several years, after which he kept a provision store in Boston, Mass. He died in Newfane, Sept. 1, 1851, aged 44 years, and his wife, Nov. 2, 1885. They had a daughter, Mary, who married F. W. Cole of Glencove, Y. N.

WILLIAM ADAMS,

son of Samuel, married Sarah E., a daughter of Brown Osgood of this town, Oct. 2, 1834, and has resided on his father's homestead in Brookline, to the present time.

They had one daughter, Mary Elvira, born Oct. 19, 1835, and three sons.

James Henry, born August 8, 1837, died Jan. 13, 1840; Charles H. born, Nov. 23, 1839, died Jan. 12, 1840, of diphtheria, and both buried together.

John C. born Nov. 25, 1842, died Nov. 25, 1844, from a scald by falling into a small kettle of hot water.

Mr. William Adams, although a farmer all his life, has by his diligent habits and early rising, been a man of extensive reading, and being of a legal turn of mind, has devoted much of his attention to legal and political subjects. This has made him a natural leader in politics. He has been Brookline's free lawyer, and for many years he has drawn up most of the legal papers for the town and its inhabitants. His official record will appear with his townsmen.

Chauncy studied law, married Catharine Brown of Jamaica, settled in Indiana, where he carried on mercantile business for a time. He received an appointment under President Polk, in the patent office at Washington, where he died Sept. 28, 1862, and his wife on Feb. 19, 1885.

Children: Geo. W. and John Q.

George was for some time a newspaper correspondent and reporter. Has now for several years been a journalist of considerable note, and is president of "The Star" Association at Washington, D. C.

GEORGE WILLIAM ADAMS,

son of Chauncy Adams, was born in Lima, Indiana, in 1839; was educated at the University of Michigan for the law, but entered journalism in Washington, D. C., in 1860, which profession he has followed ever since. He was the representative of the New York World in Washington for 19½ years; of the Chicago Times, 13 years; the Boston Herald, 14 years; the St. Louis Republican, 5 years, and at briefer periods of the New York Evening Post, Cincinnati Commercial, Louisville Courier-Journal, New Orleans Picayune, and Charleston News and Courier, and St. Louis Globe-Democrat. He is one-third owner of the Evening Star newspaper in Washington, one of the largest properties of its kind in the United States, and president of the company which publishes it. He served through the entire war as a correspondent, and was the witness of many eventful scenes in the nation's history, being present in the lobby of the theatre when Booth assassinated Lincoln, and in the room at B. and P. station, when Giteau shot Garfield. He has a wife and three daughters, has a fine residence in the most desirable portion of Washington. He holds from President Arthur a commission as president of the board of trustees of the Reform School of the District of Columbia, a United States institution. Mr. Adams is the last one of the male line of the Brookline family.

GEORGE W. ADAMS DEAD.

The accomplished journalist died at his home in Washington, D. C., Oct. 10, 1886.

THE LUKE B. OSGOOD FAMILY.

LUKE B. OSGOOD,

born in Newfane, May 18, 1772, was one of a family of seven children, left orphans during the Revolutionary war, and through the privations and hardships attending that early period, arrived at the age of manhood. He married Sally Thompson of Hubbardston, Mass. They settled in the northeast part of Newfane, which was subsequently annexed to the town of Brookline, where they reared their family.

Wm. H. Osgood married Artelissa M. Rice, March, 1836. They both died in the spring of 1853, leaving three children:

Moses R., now a railroad engineer in Connecticut.

Caroline M., wife of I. R. Warner of Saxtons River.

Gertrude P., wife of Rev. C. A. Piddock of Middletown, Conn.

Sarah E., wife of Wm. Adams, for account of whom, see Adams family of Brookline.

WILLARD E. OSGOOD

married Hannah Park and moved to Minnesota in 1864. He engaged in lumber business and land speculation; he died suddenly at Minneapolis, Jan. 8, 1880. His widow and daughter, Frances H., now reside in Worcester, Mass., near her daughters, Marion, wife of Geo. Fisher, and Martha E., widow of Edwin R. Morse.

Mary Jane Osgood, wife of John A. Farnsworth of Saxtons River, adopted the two orphan daughters of Wm. H., with whom they lived until their marriage.

LUKE B. OSGOOD, JR.

married Cynthia Jones. He moved to Beloit, Wis., in 1846, and afterwards to Minnesota. He traded in land, and once made a journey to Pike's Peak, on a trading excursion. He was an extensive farmer, and had the reputation of being a kind neighbor, ready to help the unfortunate. He died at Garden City, Minn., Jan. 1, 1884.

HARRIET L. OSGOOD,

wife of Alonzo Damon of Hubbardston, Mass., was married Oct. 3, 1840.

She and her youngest child (a boy four years old), were suddenly killed at a railroad crossing at Winchendon, Mass., Feb. 5, 1858. They with Mr. Damon were crossing the track when an engine came upon them. When the train had passed and Mr. Damon had recovered his consciousness, he found the head of his little boy lying at his feet. Its body was picked up in nine parts. The lifeless form of his wife was carried farther on by the engine. She left a son, Eugene A., who died in early manhood, 1875, and one daughter, Mary Jane, who resides at Hubbardston with her father.

Elizabeth L., wife of J. E. Ells, was married Jan. 1, 1846, moved to Rochester, Minn., where they lived 20 years; thence to Kansas City, Mo., in the vicinity of which place they still reside near their daughter, Alice, wife of J. Templer, grain dealer. Their son, James E. Ells, a farmer, resides at Lake Benton, Minn.

Mrs. Wm. Adams and Mrs. J. A. Farnsworth having always resided in this vicinity, have been valuable members of society.

Luke B. Osgood, senior, spent his days in Newfane and Brookline, and died at the age of 74, his wife having died eight years previous; they became firmly convinced of the truths of the Christian religion in their early married life, and were, with other believers, baptized by his brother, Rev. Emory Osgood. (One of the early Baptist ministers of Vermont, and father of the late Rev. Sewell M. Osgood, who labored eight years in Burmah, under the direction of Rev. Adoniram Judson, and died in Chicago, Ill., after several years' service as district secretary of the Western States for foreign missions.) Mr. Osgood was an industrious, successful farmer.

BENNETT FAMILY.

BY DR. LEMON BENNETT.

The ancestors of the Bennett family came early from England, and settled in Rhode Island, and for several generations were mainly seafaring men.

Samuel Bennett, the grandfather of the writer, with three of his brothers, served as soldiers during the Revolutionary war. He held the office of drum-major.

Soon after the close of the war he, with his wife, whose maiden name was Rebecca Shaw, and several of his connections came to Putney, Vt., and he was one of the first settlers on Putney West Hill. Here he raised a family of five sons and seven daughters. His son, my father, married Sarah Read, daughter of John Read of West Putney, a woman of most excellent mind and character. They lived on the home-place, and took care of grandfather and grandmother. He was a man of great industry and economy, and accumulated considerable property.

SAMUEL BENNETT,

He was one of the worst sufferers in the accident that occurred at the raising of the Baptist church at Brookline. The bones of his legs were very badly broken and crushed, and ever after he was very lame.

About 1839 he bought the Dr. Perry place in Brookline, to which he moved his family and where he lived till his death in 1849.

He had a family of four sons and five daughters; one son died in infancy.

He and his wife were staunch Baptists, and three of his daughters, Maria, Louisa and Ellen, married Baptist ministers.

Maria Bennett, the oldest, married Rev. Nathaniel Cudworth, who was educated mainly at Hamilton, N. Y., and was a very successful pastor and eminently a good man. He died some years since, and his widow, son and daughter now live in Boston, Mass.

Louisa Bennett married Rev. Samuel Kingsbury, who was the pastor of the Brookline Baptist Church at the time of his death.

In the fall of 1849 a terrible calamity came upon the Bennett family, a most malignant type of typhus dysentery (ship fever) was brought into the neighborhood from the sea-board, and my father and mother and brother and sister Kingsbury, and their three beautiful children, the entire family, seven in all, took it and died in the short space of six weeks. Other members of my father's family had it, but recovered, though with broken constitutions, and Mary only survived a few years.

Jane Bennett married Samuel Outler of Brookline, then a merchant of Boston, Mass., where they have since lived. He is a deacon in the Baptist church and a man of some wealth. They have two sons and two daughters.

Ellen Bennett, my youngest sister, married Rev. Luman Kinney. They have no children.

Of the three sons:

Walter married Vashti E. Stebbins, daughter of Rufus Stebbins, and he still lives in this town.

Warren Bennett and family live in Putney.

The writer of this fitted for college at the Lealand and Gray seminary at Townshend; was at Waterville college, Me, now Colby university, three years; graduated at Dartmouth in 1848, and went to Tennessee in 1849, where he was engaged in teaching till the war broke out, when his teaching South ended. In 1861 he removed to Iowa.

Samuel Bennett died, with his son, Samuel Jr., Sept. 23, 1841, aged 83 years.

FAMILY RECORD.

Samuel Bennett, Jr., born in Putney, Aug. 30, 1791, married Dec. 14, 1819, Sarah Reed, born in Putney, Nov. 23, 1794. Their children, all born in Putney, were:

Maria, born Oct. 9, 1820; married Sept. 1, 1841.

Lemon, born April 8, 1822; married July 30, 1851.

Walter S., born June 5, 1824; married Jan. 1, 1850.

Louisa, born March 13, 1826; married Dec. 27, 1843.

Warren, born April 11, 1828; married Dec. 25, 1855.

Simeon, born March 2, 1830; died Aug. 8, 1831, aged 1 year 5 months.

Sarah Jane, born May 6, 1832; married May 13, 1851.

Mary E., born Jan. 29, 1834; died Oct. 27, 1854, aged 20 years.

Ellen C., born Oct. 14, 1836; married Dec. 17, 1856.

Samuel Bennett, Jr.; died Sept. 25, 1849, aged 58 years.

Sarah Reed Bennett died Oct. 17, 1849, aged 55 years.

DR. LEMON BENNETT

graduated at Dartmouth college and took a partial medical course. He was an excellent scholar and a successful teacher. He was principal of an academy in Eastern Tennessee for several years. He was also for a few years in the drug business in Chattanooga.

Being a thorough going abolitionist, when the war of the Rebellion broke out he was compelled to flee to the free States, and settled on 400 acres of land he had previously bought in the town of Murray, Ia. He is now a well-to-do farmer at that place. He married Elenor Wright, and has three sons and three daughters.

Walter S. Bennett, who still lives in Brookline, has four daughters.

Warren Bennett married Frances E. Morse. He resided on a farm in Brattleboro 15 years, and then purchased the Winslow stock farm in Putney, where he now resides. He has two sons and one daughter.

[This intelligent family, of a high moral and religious character, were a good acquisition to the society of Brookline. Mrs. Maria Bennett Cudworth, whose husband was pastor of the Baptist church in Ludlow, in our school days, is one of the women whom we have always remembered preciously. Of whom we shall speaking more in the history of Ludlow.]

Jane, Mary and Ellen Bennett, inmates of Mrs. Cudworth's family, and students at the old Black River seminary some years, were classmates and friends. Mary Bennett was an estimable young lady. Even to-day, we regret her death in the fresh flower of young womanhood, and she stands in memory before us as we write.

We are happy to-day to open the leaves of our history for these friends, and to put them in there to live forever.—Ed.

GEORGE MASON.

was born in Putney, Dec. 31, 1831. His parents moved to Brookline the next year, and he passed his boyhood in that town. In 1851 he began his collegiate studies with Prof. Ward at Saxtons River, and continued them at Westminster until 1854, when he entered the University of Vermont, and graduated in 1858. He subsequently received the degree of Master of Arts in course from his Alma Mater. During his vacations he was engaged in teaching until 1863.

In 1862 he was married to Josephine N. Buffum, in Oxford, Mass., and the following year removed to Washington, D. C., where he has since resided.

From 1863 to 1868 he was in government employ, in the office of the Paymaster General of the army.

In 1868 he graduated from the Law Department of Columbia College and was admitted to the bar of the district. He has successfully engaged in the practice of law and in real estate business.

In 1869 he served on the school board of Washington city, to which position he was elected by the City Council.

George Mason was a son of Ephraim H. Mason, who was a prominent man here for more than 30 years, representing the town in the Legislature of 1835 and 1836, and grandson of Anthony Mason, who moved into town in 1796, and was one of the most stirring business men of the town.

WARREN B. STICKNEY.

was born in Brookline, Dec. 3, 1837, fitted for college at Power's Institute, Bernardston, Mass.; entered Amherst College, 1859; enlisted in 8th Reg. Vt. Vols., Nov. 19, 1861; promoted to a lieutenancy in 99th Reg. U. S. C. I.; organized and was superintendent of first public colored schools in New Orleans, 1863, '64, and of Freedman's Bureau, in northwestern Louisiana, in 1865; principal of Greenfield and Chicopee, Mass., High schools, 1867, '68 and '69; received the degree of A. M. from Amherst College in 1868; elected superintendent of City schools and member of State Board of Education, New Orleans, La., 1869; was over four years in the army, participating in the sieges of Port Hudson, and Mobile; while organizing and superintending the colored schools in New Orleans, matured a plan which resulted in giving the freedmen of Louisiana the best system of public schools organized for them in any State, and in 60 days after, appointed as superintendent of Freedman's Bureau of N. W. Louisiana, he put 32,000 colored laborers under contract, receiving for every one of the recently emancipated slaves some compensation for his or her labor. He married Sept. 28, 1865, Olive B., daughter of U. S. Darling of Leyden, Mass., who graduated under Hiram Orcutt, A. M., at Glenwood Ladies' Seminary at West Brattleboro, class of 1864, to whom one son, Clement R. Stickney, was born Oct. 14, 1866. At present, (1881,) Mr. Stickney is publisher of Johnson's Natural History, in two large royal octavo volumes of over 1500 pages, and 1500 engravings, with residence at Ann Arbor, Mich.

THE JESSE WALKER FAMILY.

HON. ELLIOT WALKER

was born in Brookline, Feb. 25, 1822. He prepared for college at Townshend Academy; at 22 entered Colby University, at Waterville, Me., and graduated in 1848. He then went to Brandon, Vt., as principal of the Seminary there, where he remained two years.

He commenced studying law in Brandon and finished with Boutelle & Noyes at Waterville, Me., and was admitted to the bar in November, 1851, and the same year went to Corrina, Me., and took charge of the academy there for two years. In 1853 he came to Newport, Me., and commenced the practice of law, and has remained in the practice of his profession here ever since.

He has held various town offices and in 1866 and 1872 represented the towns of Newport, Stetson and Plymouth, in the State Legislature of Maine,—these towns comprising a legislative class. In 1880 he was elected judge of the Probate Court and of the Court of Insolvency for Penobscot county for four years, and held the office until the close of 1884. He was nominated that year for reelection, but the political party by which he was elected failed to carry the county.

Mr. Walker married Sophronia B. Coffin of Waterville, Me., in 1852, who is still living. They had four children:

Sarah C., married Howard C. Atwood and lives in Fairfield, Me. She has two children living, a son and a daughter.

Jane W., married James T. Footman, and died in 1881; no children.

William E., married Florence Huntington; lives in Bradford, Me., is a practicing physician.

Edwin C., died at the age of six years, at Newport.

PROFESSOR WALKER.

Versal Jesse Walker was born on a little hill farm in Brookline, overlooking the richer farms in the meadows in the vale of Grassy brook; born Feb. 22, 1824.

In a few years two other children had come to the home on the Brookline hill, but the dear boy, Versal, never lost the warm place he found in his mother's heart that cold morning he first came to earth. From his very childhood it was not he to win a choice thing and lose it again. At seven, at ten, he was an active and bright boy, did up the farm chores promptly, attended with much zeal the district school, but at 13 lost his father. It was a hard blow; fortunately he had a mother of good courage and wisdom at the helm, and a judicious elder brother it was his ambition to equal. He followed him at Townshend at 19, at Colby University at 21. At college "He was particularly distinguished for proficiency in the sciences and mathematics, and took high rank in the languages." He was four years at the old Waterville college and graduated with the honors of his class.

He was principal of the New London academy in New Hampshire, and a few years later principal of the academy at China, Me. Here he found the lady who afterwards became his wife. He continued teaching in the Eastern States for some years, but in 1855 went to California, where he engaged both in business and teaching four years, and returned. The year 1859 he came back from California, married, located in Winona, Minn., and immediately commenced teaching there. He established the first High school in that city; was afterward elected to the joint office of principal of the High school and superintendent of the city schools of Winona, which position he filled until elected to the professorship of the Latin language in the University of Minnesota, in 1869, which position he accepted and honored with marked ability and acknowledged success." "In Memoriam," published after the funeral, by the university.

"For several years Professor Walker was secretary of the State Educational association, and at one time its president. He was one of the few who never sought office, but who always gave character to positions of trust and responsibility. For three years he was a member of the Board of Education of Minneapolis; secretary of the board, superintendent of the schools. Under his management the schools were prosperous. The governing principle of his life was to do well and thoroughly everything he undertook. The secret of his successful life was found in this, that he was ready to meet the demand of each hour. He brought few if any burdens from the past to oppress him in the present, and when on May 17, 1876, the summons came bidding him 'go up higher,' he was ready. His life work was completed faithfully and well. He approached the grave

"Sustained and soothed
By an unflinching trust."

"Like one who wraps the drapery of his couch
About him and lies down to pleasant dreams."

Thus far beautifully speaks his university for his Brookline professor.

Versal Walker had commenced to prepare for this event—the close of the earthly life—in Brookline. To look back, in the late autumn, we see a little party approach toward the waters of the valley of Brookline for baptism, the youth Versal, of 17 is there, comes to receive the first rite of Christianity. He has resolved to become a Christian man.

"He and C. W. Blandin and myself, were a trio of boys whose births occurred at very nearly the same date, and we always took a special interest in each other. He was baptized at Brookline, Nov. 30, 1841.

From the 23d of November to December 12, there were six seasons of baptism, in which 26 persons were baptised and joined the Baptist church, among them several names familiar to you, viz: William Adams, V. J. Walker, C. W. Blandin, and five others on the same day, and between November 23 and December 12, E. P. Merrifield, (a Baptist minister,) Louisa Bennet, who subsequently became the wife of Rev. Mr. Kingsbury, J. B. Stebbins, Samuel Cutler, Sophia R. Merrifield, Francis E. Merrifield, his wife Sarah C., A. Judson Walker, and Emory Merrifield, (now Dr. M.)"

At Boston, Prof. Versal J. Walker and Miss Susan P. Hanscome were united in marriage by Rev. Denzel M. Crane, Aug. 3, 1859. It is pleasant to see at the professor's marriage officiating, the friend of his youth from the dear, old birth-town. It is pleasant, Denzel M. Crane and Versal J. Walker were the two most gifted men ever born in Brookline. "Praise no man while alive." They are dead and we may praise them.

He did his last day's work at the University, May 11th; died a few days after; his old foe, neuralgia, met him; went suddenly to the heart; his wife and aged mother were with him. Few die so peacefully as the good professor.

The exercises at the University were suspended. It was the first death of one of the first officers; officers and students draped with black, professors were pall-bearers; Winona, too, sent her mourners; he rests where he closed his labors.

He left an estate, $20,000, no children. His wife, still his widow, resides at La Cross, Wis.

PAPER BY JOHN B. STEBBINS, ESQ.

Of Jesse Walker, father of Judge Elliot Walker and Professor Versal J. Walker, I know but little, except that he was a farmer of moderate means and had the reputation of being a very worthy man. He was born at Newfane in 1778, and married Waity, fifth daughter of Deacon John Blandin, in 1820. They owned a 100-acre farm in the south part of Brookline, where he died in 1837, leaving his widow with three sons, Elliot, Versal J., Andrew Judson, and one daughter, Waity Jane, on this poor farm.

The farm was sold for $800. With these small means, the widow by dint of good management, industry and economy of the whole family got the two oldest boys through college. See sketches of Hon. E. and Prof. V. J. Walker.

Andrew Judson, third son, born in Brookline, Jan. 20, 1829, obtained a good academical education and went to California in 1849, which was just then being opened to the States. There he engaged in various enterprises. He made and lost fortunes, but finally returned to Vermont, about 1862, with a large property.

In 1863 he married Louisa K., daughter of Dr. George W. Barber and sister of Mrs. J. B. Stebbins. She was a young lady of grace and dignity. They have three sons: George Jesse, born in La Cross, Wis., 1864; Willis Judson, born in Brookline, Vt., 1866; Arthur Samuel Barber, born in Osborn, Mo., 1870; and one daughter, Jennie Louisa, born in Osborn, Mo., 1871.

For the last few years the family have lived at Hastings, Neb. George was offered a cadetship at West Point, but he preferred the life of a citizen to that of a soldier.

Waity Jane, the only daughter in the family of Jesse Wrlker, born 1835. She was a superior scholar, studied Latin with success at ten, graduated at Fairfax; died 1858, of a fatal epidemic at Newburyport, Mass.

Mrs. Waity Blandin Walker, the honored mother is living (1887) at the age of 88 years with her son, Hon. E. Walker of Newport, Me.

PAPER FROM MRS. B. H. CRANE.

Thomas Crane, Esq., the father of Rev. Denzel M. Crane, was contemporary with the Blandins and the Stebbins and intimately associated with them all his life in the interests of the town. He was of English origin, and his children so resembled their ancestors my husband was often taken for an Englishman in his travels on the other continent, 1869.

Thomas Crane and his wife, Mrs. Rebecca Crane, when about 40 years of age, united with the Baptist church. They had eight children, of whom three sons and two daughters that reached maturity, married and were active men and women. The youngest was the wife of Deacon Chalmer W. Stebbins and the mother of his children.

Mother Crane at the time of her death, had reached the age of 92 years and retained her faculties, mental and physical, to a remarkable degree. The removal of her parents to town when a child of two summers was an event fresh in memory.

While pursuing his studies at Pierce Academy, Mr. Crane supplied the Baptist church in Raynham, and 47 united with the church through his teachings.

During his ministry of 42 years he baptized 458 persons, married 359 couples and attended about the same number of funerals.

MRS. SOPHRONIA MASON GIBSON, a daughter of Ephriam H. and Prudence Hills Mason, was born in Brookline, and received a good academical education. In 1855 she married John M. Gibson, a native of Scotland, a gentleman of talent and culture. With him she removed to Canada West, where they spent their lives in the cause of education. She died in 1873, and her husband survived her a little more than a year. They left a large family of children, of whom the eldest, Miss H. E. Blanche Gibson, is the present efficient matron of the Vermont Asylum for the Insane at Brattleboro. A second daughter, Florence A. L. Gibson, is supervisor in the same institution. A son, John Mitchell Gibson, is a student in medical department of the University of Vermont.

BROOKLINE IN THE FIRE-WAVE.

May 25, 1886, parts of the Windham county Vol. V., including 16 pages of Brookline with the type, stock, paper, etc., were utterly consumed, and no insurance; to refurnish, begin and reset work paid for the second time, all new help, good, but to get acquainted with the hardest of typographical work, a local and geneological history, filled with names, we have worked at a disadvantage, but believe us, Vermont, hard for you this time, so in the midst of otherwise deserved criticism remember mercy.

HALIFAX.

By REV. H. EASTMAN.

HALIFAX,

is a post-town in the south part of Windham county. It lies 25 miles east from Bennington, and nine southwest from Brattleboro. The town was chartered May 11, 1750, by Benning Wentworth to Oliver Partridge and 63 others, Mr. Wentworth himself being one of the grantees.

The settlement of the town was commenced in 1761, by Abner Rice from Worcester Co. Mass. He was joined by others from Massachusetts in 1763. The time the town was organized is not precisely known, but was about the year 1770. The first town clerk of whom any information has been obtained, was Samuel Woodward, and the first representatives, Hubbell Wells and Edward Harris.

The following is a copy of the records of the first town meetings held in Halifax of which we have any knowledge: "at a Town Meeting Regularly Warned and held at Hallifax, on tuesday, the third Day of March, 1778, Chose Capt Hubbel Wells, moderator. it was Put to a Vote whether whether the town would Accept the Constitution of the State of Vermont. It Pased in the affirmative. Chose Capt. Hubbell Wells and Ens. Edward Harris to Represent the town at a General Court at Winsor.

Attest: JAMES GRAY, Town Clerk.

at a meeting of the freemen of the town of hallifax, legally warned and Held in Hallifax, aforesaid, on the 9th Day of April, 1778, Chose Capt Hubbel Wells moderator, Chose Lieut. John Thomas as a Delegate to Cary the votes for a Judge of Probates to Gilford. Voted to adjourn this meeting to the third Tuesday in June at 11 o'clock in the fournoon. * * * June 16, 1778, the freemen of this town met according to adjurnment. Chose James gray, town Clerk. Chose Capt. Hubbel Wells doct., William Hill and Mr. Israel Guild, selectmen. Chose Jas. Gray, town treasurer. Chose Mr. Amos Pebody and Doct. Wm. Hill, Constables." There are many other town officers of minor importance which we do not give.

The religious denominations formerly were Congregationalists and Baptists. A Congregational church was organized in 1778, and a meeting-house built in 1782. Their first settled minister was Rev. David Goodall, who was the first settled minister in the town. He was settled in 1781, and dismissed in 1796. Their second minister was Rev. Jesse Edson, who was installed over the church Nov. 23, 1796, and died Dec. 14, 1805. He was succeeded by the Rev. Thomas H. Wood, who was ordained Sept. 17, 1806. Several other ministers afterward served this church for longer or shorter periods, but the church has ceased to exist as a regularly organized body, and for many years preaching has not been sustained. The meeting-house, which is situated at West Halifax, is now occupied one-half the time by the Universalists.

BAPTIST CHURCH.

The first minister who preached in town was a Mr. Evans, a Baptist minister. Mr. Evans was succeeded by Elder Warren. The Baptist church was organized in 1793, and its first settled minister was Abner Bemis, in 1796. He was succeeded by Paul Holmes, and Mr. Holmes by Samuel Fish, in 1821.

Mr. Fish was born in town, Oct. 13, 1788, and is now (1870) 82 years of age, and is the only settled minister in Halifax. Since his settlement in 1821, he has preached in town up to the present time, with the exception of nearly two years spent in Guilford, an adjoining town, making a pastorate of about half a century over the same society. This venerable and much respected minister is enjoying a serene old age, calmly awaiting the Master's call. The Baptists now have the meeting-houses about two miles apart, and two small societies in town. The Methodists have never had any organized society in town, but have had a few resident members and occasional preaching.

Perhaps no town of the same population has raised up and sent out more ministers of different denominations than this. At least 22 have gone out, some of them quite eminent men, such as Elijah Plumb, D. D., Rev. Sumner Everett, missionary to Constantinople; and Rev. Chas. Scott, Congregationalists. Rev. Appleton Danforth, missionary to Burmah; H. C. Fish, D. D., of New-ark, N. J.; Rev. Ross Burdick, and Rev. Judson Tucker, Baptists. Rev. Hosea Ballou, Universalist.

No town perhaps has been more famous for rum selling and rum drinking in by-gone days, but for the last 30 years no merchant, or inn-keeper has sold alcohol as a beverage in town.

Widow Scott, R. Crosier's daughter, one of the first settlers, now living within one mile of where she was born, has always lived in town, is now 94 years of age, and is able to give some statistics of the history of the first settlers. Widow Scott's mother, one of the first settlers, lived in town, and died aged 105 years, 5 months. Three brothers by the name of Crosier were among the first settlers in the year 1762 or '63. The first female born in town was Dea. Moses Leonard's wife, named Pratt.

The first physicians were, Drs. Hill, Ransom, Richardson, Cobb, etc. In 1795 Judge Darius Bullock was chosen town clerk and served the town 37 years, until he died. He often represented the town in the Legislature, and always held offices of trust.

About the year 1812 a Mr. Rice died here, aged 112 years. The years 1805, 1812, and 1813, were the periods of the most remarkable mortality.

In August, 1788, there was a terrific hurricane which prostrated the woods to a very great extent. This accounts for the numerous little mounds or hillocks in different parts of the town. This township is watered by North and Green rivers. The former runs through the western and southern part, and the latter through the northeastern. They are both large and commodious mill streams, and the mill privileges are numerous. In the branch of North river, on the farm of Henry Niles, is a succession of cascades extending about 100 rods. The falls are from 15 to 20 feet each, and are overlooked by the projecting rocks on the right in ascending the stream. The place is visited by the curious, and the scene which presents itself is rugged, wild and romantic. The surface of the township is uneven, but there are no mountains worthy of notice. On the margin of North river is a cavern called Woodard's cave or Dun's den. It is 25 feet in length, five in width and the same in height. The sides and top are of solid rock. This is also a place of resort for the curious. The soil is generally of good quality, well adapted to the production of grass, and much attention is devoted to the raising of cattle and the keeping of dairies. The people are mostly industrious and wealthy. The timber is principally beech, maple, birch, ash, hemlock and spruce. The town is divided into 14 school districts, with as many school houses. At the centre is a handsome brick school house, 42 by 24 feet on the ground, in which the languages and higher branches of literature have usually been taught a part of the year. There was also formerly a school for young ladies, in which the higher branches and drawing, painting and music were taught.

II Kings 4:13. "I dwell among mine own people."

When Canaan was first settled by the Israelites, a certain portion of land was given to every citizen, who had the right to transmit it to his heirs. By no act of his could this land be forfeited to the family longer than till the next jubilee which occurred every fiftieth year. This arrangement gave permanency to the location of families. It was characteristic of a Jew to entertain a peculiar attachment to his own nation, his tribe and kindred; and especially to the old estate where his fathers had lived for many successive centuries.

When the Shunammite woman was enquired of by the servant of Elijah, how her kindness to the prophet should be rewarded—asking if she would not "be spoken for to the king; or to the captain of the host," that some royal or distinguished favor might be bestowed upon her, such, perhaps, as would elevate her rank in society; she made this simple hearted but significant reply, "I dwell among mine own people." She dwelt among her kindred, among a people with whom she sustained the same rank in life; who were of similar customs and like sympathies with herself. With them she wished to still to dwell, to continue in the same sphere in which she had been accustomed to move, and for which her habits were formed. She has associated with those who were of the same faith, and were cheered by the same hopes. Interwoven as the Jewish religion was with the whole structure of society, mingling with all the civil and social affairs and relations of life, their country, in the estimation of the Jew, would have been the best on the earth, even if their hills had been comparatively barren hills, and their valleys far less fruitful than they were.

Great care was taken in Ancient Israel to preserve the history of families, as well as of the several tribes, and of the nation. Accurate genealogies were kept of separate families, important events were noted, and whatever of interest was not put on record was preserved by tradition. The frequent narration of the important incidents which had been accumulating for many generations must have been attended with no small degree of interest, especially to the younger members of the family.

It might be supposed that in an age of so much reading as ours, and where there is no end to the demand for the making of books, that the history of separate communities would be carefully preserved, so that the people might be well informed in the history of their own immediate neighborhood. But in this respect we are sadly deficient. The records of this town throw but little light upon its early history, and the generation that was conversant with the first settling of the town has passed away, with the exception of a single individual, now upwards of 105 years of age, so that the sources of information are not very abundant. Such information, however, in relation to the history of the town as I have been able to glean from different sources I shall present in this discourse.

Before entering upon the history of the town, I will briefly allude to the early history of Vermont. The first settlement in Vermont was about a mile below Brattleboro, made under the supervision of the government of Massachusetts in 1724.*

But New Hampshire claimed jurisdiction over the territory now embraced in the State of Vermont, and was invested with authority by the British Crown to extend her laws over the district, give grants of townships, superintend and direct in their settlement. When she had exercised this authority to some extent for several years, the government of New York laid claim to Vermont as their province, and in 1763 this claim began to be urged with forcible measures, ejecting from their lands in several instances, those who had purchased in and settled upon the New Hampshire grants, and under the patronage of her government, because they would not purchase their lands of the government of New York.

This brought Vermont into collision with New York, New Hampshire, and to some extent with Massachusetts during a series of 26 years, embracing the period of the Revolutionary war. These claims were all yielded in favor of Vermont in 1789; and in February, 1791, she was received into the Union as one of the Federal States.

The town charter of Halifax was given by the government of New Hampshire, May 11, 1750. The township embraces in its charter a territory of 6 miles square. This was to be divided into lots three-fourths of a mile square consisting of 360 acres in each lot. One of these lots was assigned to each of the 62 grantees, reserving two lots, one for the first settled minister and one for the benefit of schools.

The charter provides "that before any division of the said land be made to and among the grantees, a tract of land as near the centre of the said township as the land will admit of, shall be reserved and marked out for town lots, one of which shall be allotted to each grantee of the Contents of one acre." This reserved land at the geographical centre of the town, was designed to serve the purposes of a garrison in case there should be war with the Indians. Here each grantee might erect his block-house to which he might retire with his family on short notice, in case of danger while the country was new, having an acre of ground which he could cultivate as a garden. But the Indians gave no trouble to the early settlers of Halifax and the land reserved for purposes of defence has long since been otherwise disposed of.

The charter required the payment of one ear of Indian corn by the grantees on the 25th of Dec. (Christmas) "if lawfully demanded." And for the space of ten years, commencing with 1750. Also commencing with 1761 it required of every land holder. "One shilling proclamation money for every hundred acres he owns or settles, or possesses, and so in proportion for a greater or less tract of the said land, which money shall be paid by the respective persons above named, their heirs or assigns, in our own council chamber in Portsmouth, or to such officer or officers as shall be appointed to receive the same, and this to be in lieu of all other rents or services whatsoever." Deducting the highways and other public lanes exempted by the charter from taxes, the proclamation money would have constituted an annual revenue to the Crown of about $20.

It was also required by the charter that five acres of land should be planted and cultivated "within the term of five years for every fifty acres" owned as individual property. In case of failure on the part of any grantee to fulfill this condition, his whole share was forfeited to the Crown. This condition could not have been fulfilled as no one settled in the town for ten years after the charter was given. Nor is it known that the claims of the grantees were ever questioned on this account.

It was demanded also by the charter, "that all white and other pine trees within the said township fit for masting our Royal Navy be carefully preserved for that use, and none to be cut or felled without His Majesty's especial license, upon the penalty of the forfeiture of the right of such grantee." This condition probably has never been violated to any great extent.

When there should be fifty families settled in the town they were to "have the liberty of holding two Fairs." The time of holding them was to be the last Mondays in the months of April and September, and not to continue longer than the Saturday of the week upon which they were held. These fairs were designed to be occasions when buyers and sellers of all kinds might meet at a certain place for the purposes of trade. If such a custom had been introduced, a week in the Spring and also in the Fall of the year would have been convenient seasons. The people could then have accomplished most of their trading in stock and many other things for the year on those occasions. The custom of holding such fairs has prevailed extensively in England and other European countries. We have county and State fairs, but they are rather for exhibition than for trade.

When the number of families had increased to fifty, the charter requires that "a market shall be opened and kept one or more days in each week as may be thought advantageous to the inhabitants." The object of the market is similar to that of the fair, though less extensive in its design. The custom of having a market-place has been in vogue for many centuries in England in towns of considerable size, and in other European countries.

The original grantees chiefly resided in Hatfield and Deerfield, Mass., together with the adjacent towns. A few resided in the State of New Hampshire. Oliver Partridge, Esq., of Hatfield, was the principal actor in obtaining the charter. It is thought that Mr. Partridge became the actual original proprietor of nearly one-half of the town, many of the signers of the charter never having been personally interested in the enterprise, only permitting their names to be used. Mr. Partridge was constituted by the charter the moderator of the first meeting of the proprietors which he was to notify on the first Wednesday of August, 1750, at such time and place as he might think most convenient. The grantees held meetings for business for several years, at such times and places as they saw fit to appoint. No connected record of proceedings of those meeting is in the possession of the town.

The survey of the town cost £50, 7:6; the platting of lots cost £155, 5; the obtaining of the patent £73, 19; total expense, £279, 11:6, or about $865.

To defray these expenses the proprietors vote, Nov. 28, 1750, to raise a tax of £5, 5 "upon each lot except the Governor's two, and the two public lots," the surplus of which money was to be retained in the treasury. From this vote it appears that Governor Wentworth, the then acting Governor of New Hampshire was in the enterprise, and, the proprietor of two lots; and also the magnanimity, or policy, of the other grantees—possibly their respect for magistrates (?)—relinquishing the taxes of the Governor in the expense of laying out the town.

The geographical centre of the town is three-fourths of a mile north of what is now known as the Centre. The frame of a meeting house was erected within a few rods of the geographical centre previous to 1780. But a few enterprising citizens established the business of the town at the place now called the Centre, so that the original frame of a meeting house was abandoned, and the present Congregational meeting house at the business centre was erected in 1782, but was not completed till several years afterwards, though it was occupied as a place of worship.

The land upon which the meeting house stands and three or four acres of the common, together with the adjoining cemetery grounds, were deeded to the Congregational Society by Deacon McQuillis of Colerain. That part of the Common south of the road was given to the Congregational Society by Dr. Richardson.

In the original grant of the town one lot of 360 acres was appropriated for the benefit of schools. This lot is in the northeast corner of the town, commonly called Thomas Hill. The land is sold with the reserve, that the interest of two dollars a year per acre shall be annually paid into the town treasury in the month of — for the benefit of the schools. The sum of $43.20.

Abner Rice was the first settler. He came about the year 1761 and settled in the easterly part of the town. As nearly as can be ascertained, in the early part of the year 1766, there were but four families in the town. Mr. Rice in the east part, Capt. John Pannel and a Mr. Gaught in the southwest part (Pannel Hill) and a Mr. Pratt, who settled on the farm since occupied by Robert Collins. From the year 1766 the population of the town increased rapidly, so that in March, 1778, when the town was organized, there were recorded upon the town records the names of 140 freemen, and this was but 13 years after there were but four families in the town.

Pannel Hill was first settled by people from Colerain, Mass., who were soon joined by several families from Connecticut and from Princeton, Mass.

The southeast part of the town was also settled to a considerable extent by families from Colerain. The Taggetts and some other families came from Londonderry, N. H.

The northeast part was settled by people from Rhode Island, among whom were the families of Wilcox and Thomas.

The centre was settled mostly by families from Massachusetts.

In the early part of the present century the number of inhabitants was something more than 1700. What the number was in 1790, when the first census was taken, I have not been able to learn, but it was probably about as large as at any time since.

EARLY POLITICAL STRIFES.

The party feeling between the adherents to the New Hampshire and the New York claims was never so strongly developed in this town as in some of the adjoining towns. The New Hampshire party always held the predominance in this town. Some little vexatious matters occasionally transpired. As an instance: A man by the name of Frazier was sued for debt from spite by a Yorker. His cows were attached and some other property, and his person was seized for imprisonment. As soon as the condition of Mr. Frazier was known, the alarm was given throughout the town, and the New Hampshire men rallied for his rescue. Joseph Williams seized a horn and from the hill north of the place, afterwards occupied by Solomon Bascom, blew a blast that brought to the aid of Frazier the west part of the town, and some from Whitingham and Wilmington, who with others already on the track pursued the party who had taken Frazier to Westminster for imprisonment, and with the assistance of a company from Westmoreland, New Hampshire, succeeded in his rescue. This is spoken of as the most important affair between the New York and New Hampshire parties in this town. There were other occurrences which showed the party feeling. Mr.

Orr, a Yorker, who kept a public house on the place where Deacon Williams now resides, was visited by two Hampshire men who sought admission to his house, and being refused, they entered by force, and seizing Mr. Orr, demanded of him that he should say New Hampshire, and despairing of help otherwise from their firm grasp, he cried out New Hampshire to their satisfaction.

EARLY BUILDINGS.

The first dwelling houses in the town, as is the case in all new countries, were log houses. It is, however, the testimony of some who commenced their residence here in the midst of all the inconveniences and hardships of a new country, who lived to occupy commodious dwellings with the conveniences of living multiplied a hundred fold, that their happiest days were when they lived in their little log hut, and a small plot of ground cleared around it with but few of the conveniences they afterwards enjoyed.

The first house that was shingled in town, was built by a Mr. Sabin on the ground now occupied by Capt. Abel Scott's house. The shingles were attached to the roof by wooden pegs instead of nails.

NEIGHBORHOOD INTERCHANGES.

The following incident may illustrate the kind of neighborly feeling that prevailed when the conveniences of life were few. Three families who came into the town while it was yet a wilderness, Deacon Hubbel Wells', Ebenezer Sabin's and one other, had between them but one needle with which for several years all the sewing for the three families was performed. Those are said to have been times when neighbors were always glad to see each other, each one seeking to render himself the most obliging.

EARLY HARDSHIPS AND FORTITUDE.

A Mrs. Woodward, the mother of Titus and Israel, wishing to weave a web of cloth, was under the necessity of going on foot three miles to Dea. McClure's. After she had performed the work of her family in the morning and having spent the day at the loom, she returned at night to do the work of her house. This practice she continued till she had completed her web.

The late Widow Learnard, born in 1766, is thought to have been the first child born in town. Her father, Mr. Pratt, located on the farm now occupied by Robert Collins, when there were but four families in the town. Their nearest neighbor was Captain Pannel who lived on Pannel hill four miles distant. Mr. Pratt had occasion to leave his wife and two small children at home in his absence of 10 days. The first or second night of his absence the fire went out. Mrs. P. had no means of obtaining fire but from her neighbors. She took her two children, one in her arms, leading the other, and started for Captain Pannel's through a dense forest guided by marked trees. When she had gone a little distance from her home she roused a bear who ran up a tree. With self-possession she took her apron and tied it around the tree, and hanging her bonnet upon a stake she placed it against the tree and passed on. Captain Pannel returned with her and shot the bear, which had been kept upon the tree by the bonnet and apron. Those were days of female courage as well as hardship, innured as they were to life in the wilderness.

Mrs. Learnard, the infant whom Mrs. Pratt carried in her arms to Captain Pannel's, was married to Dea. Moses Learnard in 1786. Two years afterwards her husband being taken sick in the night, she had occasion about midnight to go some 40 rods from the house to get water from a spring. In the morning she went to the same spring and found fresh tracks of a bear and his prints where he had wallowed in the mud that same night.

Pastures not being inclosed cows were suffered to run at large in the woods. It was often with difficulty that they were found. Mrs. Pratt on one occasion in searching for her cow just as night was setting in, became completely bewildered more than a mile from home in a dense forest. Not knowing which way to direct her course she sat down and wept. Soon the thickening clouds began to pour down rain, and there was every appearance of a cold, stormy, October night. At this juncture, while she was casting about to know how she should spend the night, she heard the voice of her husband, of whose return she had known nothing, calling her name from a distance. She at once responded to the call and attempted to make her way in the direction of the distant sound, but being bewildered she took the wrong course and went in the opposite direction from the voice. Her husband perceiving that her voice grew fainter and fainter by distance, called upon her to stop till he could come to her. But she, confident that she knew the course she was taking quickened her speed, thinking that she might save him the trouble of coming all the way to her. She was overtaken at last in the border of Whitingham, near where Mr. Barrington now lives on North river, at more than twice the distance from home than when she first made answer to the call of her husband. They then took their course homeward through the dark forest and drenching rain. Returning to their quiet home in their snug log-cabin, they doubtless rejoiced together, with their little ones, in the favorable issue of the enterprise, more fortunate than one of her neighbors, who in hunting her cow was compelled with her two children to remain in the woods during the night, taking their position upon the trunk of a tree that had fallen by the wind.

FRUIT.

The first apple tree and the first currant bush were brought from Colerain by a Mr. Clark, and set out on the farm now owned by Joseph Henry, Esq., near the geographical centre of the town, known as the Woodward farm. The orchard on that place, a part of which is still standing, is probably the oldest in the town.

MILLS.

The first saw-mill was built on the place, or near where Mr. Fisher's saw-mill now stands. This mill was built previous to 1780, as the mill was conveyed that year by deed to a Mr. Stacy. There was afterwards a grist-mill put up on the same privilege, which was the first grist-mill in the town.

CEMETERIES.

The first person who died in the town was Samuel Gaught, a lad of three years, a brother of the widow Crozier. He was buried in Colerain.

The first cemetery that was opened was on Pannel hill. The second was near the geographical centre of the town, now overgrown with large trees, and long since abandoned. A few rough stones mark the places of the early dead of the town.

The third cemetery was opened at the business centre of the town. The first person buried in it was a daughter of Deacon Conant. The second was Cornish Stacy, who was drowned in attempting to cross North river on a log near where the bridge now is, on the road that passes Israel Woodward's. A Mr. Underwood from Pannel hill was afterwards drowned at the same place on returning from a military training.

Captain Gaught, a grandson of the original settler upon Pannel hill, just as he left the store of Hamilton & Muzzey, in an attempt of some of his company to honor him by firing according to the custom of those days, was shot through the head, a part of his skull hitting the door of the store.

John Pannel, a grandson of Captain Pannel, was killed by the fall of a tree in 1773, which was the occasion of the following lines :

"Mr John Pannel, killed by a tree,
In seventeen hundred and seventy-three,
When his father did come,
He said, Oh my son,
Your glass is run,
Your work is done."

Mr. Abner Rice, the first settler in the town, was shot for a bear while watching a field of grain in company with others. He sat under an apple tree at the time he was shot. Jesse Rice, a cousin of Abner Rice, died at the age of 113.

A tornado occurred in August, 1788. It was the most destructive of any since the settlement of the town. It swept the town from west to east, leaving scarcely any timber standing on some farms in its course. The day on which it occurred was still and foggy up to the time the heavy wind struck. There were no premonitions of its approach. There was no roaring heard till just as the main force came, upturning trees, leaving devastation and destruction in its track of nearly two miles in width, passing on through other towns to the east.

CHURCHES.

The Congregational church of Halifax was organized July 24, 1778, consisting of 5 males and 5 females.

Rev. David Goodall, the first settled minister in town, was installed over the church and society in 1781, about 3 years after the church was organized. He was the pastor of the church about 15 years, being dismissed in 1796. During his ministry 58 were added to the church, 8 of whom were received by letter.

Mr. Goodall was a native of Marlboro, Mass. He was a graduate of Dartmouth College. He was a logical thinker, Calvinistic in his theology, tenacious of his opinions and of his just rights, and liberal in his benefactions. He had the respect and esteem of the people.

In the original grant of the town, a lot of 360 acres was appropriated for the first settled orthodox minister in the town. This fell to Mr. Goodall. The claim was disputed by Elder Eweings, a Baptist minister, who had resided in the town a few years previous to Mr. Goodall's settlement. The matter was adjusted by Mr. Goodall's quit-claiming to Elder Eweings 100 acres. This arrangement was entered into previous to Mr. Goodall's settlement. After his dismissal, he disposed of his real estate in Halifax and removed to Littleton, N. H., where he spent the remainder of his days chiefly in agricultural pursuits. He lived to an advanced age. He visited the place but once after his removal. As evincing a regard for the people of his former charge, a few years before his death he made a donation of $100 to the church, with instructions that the interest should be appropriated for the furnishing of the communion table. But a few years after the donation was received in trust, at the hands of his son, it was appropriated to the payment of arrearages in the society.

The following call extended to Mr. Goodall by the church to settle with them in the ministry, is taken from the town records:

"The Church of Christ, in Halifax, to the Rev. David Goodall, greeting;

Rev. and Beloved:—We, being by the appointment of Divine Providence, situated in the wilderness where we have ever been destitute of the stated ministrations of the word and ordinances of the Gospel, after application being made to you by the town in general to preach with us on probation for settlement, and your complying with our request, and thereby giving us convenient opportunity to judge of your ministerial qualifications, which are great in our esteem, by the concurrence and assistance of the town, by their vote, and of a friendly religious society, formed for the purpose of enjoying Gospel privileges, we do unitedly, unanimously, and earnestly call and invite you, dear sir, to take the ministerial and pastoral care and charge of said church and society, and labor with us in word and doctrine, administer the sacraments of the New Testament, and perform all other duties and offices properly belonging to a Gospel minister.

Your compliance with our request herein, will lay us, dear sir, under voluntary obligation to yield to you that subjection, honor and support that is properly due from a people to their pastor.

And for your encouragement to undertake the work of the Gospel ministry and pastoral office among us, you will, upon your installment into said office, be entitled to, and become possessed of in fee simple the land by the charter granted and reserved for the first settled orthodox minister in this town, being lot No. 28, excepting 100 acres thereof on the southerly side, which the town have alienated, to which hundred acres we hereby desire and expect you will give a quit-claim upon your inauguration into the ministry and pastoral office. And that you may be decently and honorably supported while attending to the work of the ministry among us, we freely and unanimously agree and vote to give you a salary of the sum of forty pounds a year for the first year, and to raise five pounds a year until it amounts to fifty-five pounds in silver, at six shillings eight pence per ounce, which sum of fifty-five pounds shall be paid you annually, and for each and every year so long as you continue our minister." $183.33.

REV. JESSE EDSON.

Rev. Jesse Edson was ordained and installed over the Congregational church, November 23, 1796, and died in 1805, being the pastor about nine years. During his ministry 99 were added to the church.

Mr. Edson was a native of Buckland, Mass., and graduate of Dartmouth College. He commenced his ministry with this people. As a preacher, he was sound in doctrine. His preparations for the pulpit were made with readiness. He interested himself in the young people of his charge, and was accustomed to preach to them one sermon a year. His only production published was a sermon entitled, "An Address to Young People." Mr. Edson's salary was a hundred pounds. He died at an early age.

REV. THOMAS H. WOOD,

installed September 17, 1806, was pastor a little more than 36 years. For three or four of the last years of his life, his health was feeble, and he was engaged but little in his accustomed labors. During this time, the pulpit was supplied by several ministers, each for a longer or shorter period.

Mr. Wood was born in Norwich, Conn., in that portion of the town now comprised in Bozrah, in 1772. He removed with his parents to Hawley, Mass., in 1775, where he resided till he commenced his studies preparatory for college. There he pursued with Rev. John Groat, of Hawley, and Rev. Preserved Smith, of Rowe, Mass. He entered Williams College in 1795, and graduated in 1799, at the age of 27. After leaving college, he taught a year in Northampton, Mass., and then commenced the study of theology with Dr. Joseph Lyman, of Hatfield. Previous to his ordination, he preached in Oxford, Mass., and in Lebanon, N. Y. He was ordained as an evangelist, at Amherst, Mass., May 2, 1804, and went with the Rev. Mr. Gould, afterwards of Southampton, Mass., to Maine as a missionary; and also to the State of New York, with Rev. Mr. Williston, of Easthampton. He came to Halifax in the month of February, 1806, and was installed the following September.

The education of young men received his special attention, nine of whom from his own society fitted for college with him, besides several from adjoining towns. Six entered the ministry under his pastorate. Of the young men from abroad who studied with him, were Dr. Jonas King, of the Greek Mission, Dr. Nathan Brown, of the Baptist Mission in Burmah, and Abner Hazelton, who was afterwards a member of congress. Mr. Wood is remembered among his people as a faithful and beloved pastor.

Mr. Wood was married twice; had six children who lived to adult years, four by his first wife and two by his second. He died December 26, 1842, at the age of 70, having survived all the ministers in the county of his own denomination, who held the pastoral office at the time of his installation.

REV. ALPHEUS GRAVES

was ordained and installed as associate pastor, with Rev. Thomas H. Wood, November 11, 1841. In the summer of 1844, the Congregational Society built a meeting house in the valley, two miles west of the old house, which was dedicated in the early part of October of the same year. Not coinciding with this movement, 6 males and 22 females left the original church, and were organized anew the following winter. A new society was also formed, which together with the church, occupy the former house, taking the name of the Central Church and Society of Halifax.

BAPTIST CHURCH.

Elder William Eweings was the first minister who preached stately in the town. Very little is known of him. He came to the town previous to 1778, and probably remained two or three years.

After Elder Eweings left, Elder Warren gathered a church of a small number in the northwest part of the town. A few joined it from Wilmingtion. They were accustomed to meet in school-houses and dwelling-houses. The church was afterwards dissolved.

The present Baptist church was organized July 26, 1793, consisting at first of 11 members.

ELDER ABNER BEMIS,

the first pastor, was settled in 1795, and remained with them till his death in 1809. A goodly number were added to the church under his ministry.

ELDER PAUL HINES

was settled Nov., 1813. His pastorate continued seven years.

ELDER SAMUEL FISH

commenced preaching in the fall of 1820, and was ordained August 15, 1822.

The meeting house was built in 1808, previous to which time meetings were held in school-houses and private dwellings.

It is matter of gratitude to God that the institutions of religion were early planted in this town; that the benign influences of the Gospel have been enjoyed, and have had their effect in moulding the character of this community from the beginning.

Among the early settlers of Halifax, we find five families of the name of Hall. There were five brothers that came from East Enfield, Conn., between 1776 and 1780. In tracing the emigrant ancestors bank, we find in 1636, Edward Hall of England came to Rehoboth, Mass. His wife's name was Esther. Their children, 1st, John; 2d, Esther; 3d, Samuel; 4th, Jeremiah; 5th, Thomas; 6th, Preserved; 7th, Andrew; 8th, Benjamin. Samuel, the third child, born in Rehoboth, Oct. 24, 1656, married, April 7, 1686, Elizabeth Brown; settled in Taunton, Mass. Their children, 1st, Elizabeth; 2d, Remember; 3d, Nicholas; 4th, Mary; 5th, Nathaniel; 6th, Mahitable; 7th, Enoch, he settled in Northfield, Mass.; 8th, Ichabod; 9th, John, born 1705, settled in East Enfield, Conn., married Hannah Guild. Children, 1st, Israel; 2d, John; 3d, Joel; 4th, Levi; 5th, Asariah; 6th, Daniel; 7th, Hiram; 8th, Keziah. Of those children John, Joel, Hiram, Levi, and Azariah settled in the northwest part of Halifax. While at one time they nearly all had large families, at present but a few families represent them. Of the family first John Hall married Alice Bush. Children, 1st, Erastus; 2d, John; 3d, Alice; 4th, Louisa; 5th, Rhoda; 6th, Susannah; 7th, Rufus. Erastus married Huldah Mather. Children, John; graduate of College. Died soon after. Now lives in Stamford, Vt., is one of the associate judges of Bennington county; 8th, Charles.

OBITUARY.

DEATH OF MR. JAMES L. STARK.

One of Chicago's brightest professional men, Mr. James L. Stark, died at his residence, No. 168 Cass street. Mr. Stark was born in South Halifax, Vt., on the 6th of February, 1823. His father, Judge Stark, was an eminent lawyer, and the blood of the Revolutionary Starks flowed in his veins. He adopted the profession of the law, and was admitted to practice in Bennington county, Vt., and his ability and energy were recognized by the people, who elected him to the State Senate in 1858. He served with distinction one term, and became the recognized leader of his party in the Senate. In 1859 he came to Chicago, and, ignoring politics, devoted his entire attention to the law. He was very successful, securing many clients by his devotion to business, and acquiring considerable property. His residence on the North Side was destroyed by the great fire, and he was the first man who rebuilt a substantial home in that portion of the "burnt district."

Mr. Stark was a practical and emphatically a self-made man, and, being modest, did not appear above the surface in many enterprises in which the people of the North side were interested. He was very active, however, in a silent way, in promoting improvements, especially the lake shore drive and the planting of trees to beautify the northern division. His advice was always accepted, and his labors were appreciated by those having cognizance of them. The death of so estimable a man will certainly be regretted in the community, and the vacancy caused by his death will not be soon satisfactorily filled. He leaves a wife and two children.—Chicago Tribune.

BY GEORGE L. CLARK.

HON. JAMES LANDON STARK.

Among the most prominent and influential of the early residents of Windham county Vt., was the grandfather of the subject of this sketch. A graduate of Yale college, and a lawyer, he removed from Litchfield county, Conn., to Halifax, Vt., in 1792, where he became eminent in his profession, and was in active practice until his death. He married Abigail Camp, a lady with great beauty and dignity of presence. They had six children. The oldest was James Landon. He graduated at Yale, in the class of 1814, then studied law in the office of his father, and when admitted to the bar, practiced law in Halifax until he was elected judge, which office he held for many years. He was also repeatedly elected to represent his town in the General Assembly. He was a man of much talent, fine legal mind and imposing presence. But though occupying various offices of trust and confidence, agricultural pursuits were more congenial with his tastes. To them the latter portion of his life was devoted. He spent more than 50 years on his farm in South Halifax, where he died March 14, 1868, in his 76th year. His wife was Sybel Smith (daughter of Asa Smith, who married Submit Severance.) They had nine children. Joshua Leavitt, Jedediah, Royal Houghton, James Landon, Harriet, George Washington, Sybel Livania, Sereno, Horace Goodrich.

The fourth child, James Landon Stark, was born in Halifax, Feb. 6, 1823. The most of his minority was spent at his father's home, assisting in farm duties, attending the district schools and a few terms at an academy in Whitingham. Judge Stark having conceived some prejudice to college education and professional life, persisted in his efforts to make farmers of all his sons, and James was denied those early advantages which were always regretted by him.

As a lawyer, Mr. Stark was well-read, especially in equity, and had a clear, logical mind. His natural diffidence, modesty and want of early training, often made him appear to disadvantage until aroused sufficiently to forget himself, when he became clear in statement, powerful in argument and impassioned in eloquent delivery.

The late Dr. Dewey of Montpelier, once told the writer that he never met a man who could use the English language with such vigor, directness and point, as did Mr. Stark when fully aroused. As a politician, Mr. Stark was earnest and unselfish. From the first caucus to the last hour of the election he worked indefatigably for the side which he thought was right, though always declaring there was no office he himself would or could afford to accept. His nature prompted him to look out for his friends, and no nomination was made in his ward, for years, to which he did not lend his strong sense and active aid.

BRIEF.

James L. Ridgely Lodge, No. 15, I. O. O. F., was instituted at West Halifax, Feb. 17, 1882, by Charles Woodhouse of Rutland, Grand Master, assisted by members of the order from Brattleboro, Readsboro and Shelburne Falls, Mass. The charter contained eleven names: Jeremiah Gifford, Crosby A. Perry, William W. Follett, Warner W. Stowe, Add. C. Niles, William R. Brown, Francis Kingsley, Henry F. Wheeler, Henry B. Stone, John Anderson and Eli S. Cook. The first officers were: N. G., W. R. Brown; V. G., W. W. Follett; Sec., A. C. Niles; Treas., E. S. Cook; P. G., J. Gifford. The lodge at one time had a membership of 21. It has paid out quite a sum of money for the benefit of its members, is out of debt and prospering.

THE DEATH OF CAPT. GAULT.

This is an occurrence that has long been forgotten, but was received by a person interested in such matters, reading the lines upon his grave-stone in the cemetery in School District No. 1. An item was placed in the papers, and the following was taken from the Gazette and Courier of Dec. 26th 1887:

"Mr. Editor: I noticed in a late issue of your paper a request from a Halifax, Vt., correspondent, for information concerning the tragic death of Capt. Gault in 1778. I am now in my 93d year, but remember well an account of the circumstances as related to me by my father, Jonathan Kellogg of Halifax, who served as lieutenant in the company of which John Gault was captain. The company were accustomed to meet at Halifax Centre for training. On one occasion, after the men were dismissed, the officers gathered at the tavern for a social drink. One of their number was absent, whom they wished to summon. Being informed that he could be found at the house across the street, the Captain says, "I will go and call him," and started with a double hop towards the door. It was the custom of those days to honor an officer by firing over his head. Accordingly, as Capt. Gault passed out at the door, a soldier standing near discharged his musket, but at that instant the Captain gave a hop that brought his head in range of the charge, which entered it, wad and all, killing him instantly. The event naturally caused the greatest excitement throughout the community. Still further. After a suitable time had elapsed my father called the company together to choose another captain, but, himself being anxious to get clear of training duty, declined being a candidate for the office. This caused a choice to be made from those below him in rank, and he being "jumped" as they called it, obtained his discharge which cleared him from further duty during life.

Charles P. Clark Corps, No. 55, W. R. C., was instituted Aug. 20th, 1889, by Mrs. Herrick of Brattleboro, with 11 charter members. The officers were as follows: Pres., Mrs. Sarah B. Thurber; S. V., Mrs. S. Jennie Clark; J. V., Miss Lilla DeWolfe; Secy., Mrs. Ella M. Winn; Treas., Mrs. Mary A. Ballou; Chap., Mrs. Elvira M. Gates; Con., Mrs. Elanor Miner; Guard, Mrs. Ellen D. Powers; Asst. Con., Mrs. Lucinda Hill; Asst. Guard, Miss Viola Hudson. Being a recent acquisition, not much can be said of it, except that it is working for a very praiseworthy object.

Charles P. Clark Post, No. 103, G. A. R., was named from Serg. Charles P. Clark, son of Nicholas and Clarissa Clark, who enlisted in Co. F., 16th Reg., Vt. Vols., and who died in the hospital at Camp Vermont, near Fairfax Seminary, Dec. 13th, 1862. This Post was instituted June 30th, 1889, Col. H. E. Taylor of Brattleboro, mustering officer. The charter members were: D. D. Barnes, H. C. Bell, E. E. Gates, H. W. Griffin, A. A. Hill, F. T. Miner, Thos. Miner, Milton Powers, Israel Stowe, H. B. Stone, E. H. Thurber, Harrison Williams, J. C. Winn, F. L. Woodard. The first officers were: Commander, J. C. Winn; S. V. Com., F. T. Miner; J. V. Com., A. A. Hill; Adjt., F. L. Woodard; Q. M., H. W. Griffin; O. of D., H. Wallins; Chap., Milton Powers; Surg., E. E. Gates; O. of G., H. C. Bell; Q. M. S., E. H. Thurber; S. M., D. D. Barnes; Sent., H. B. Stone.

The Halifax Library Association was established in August, 1874, with 55 members. The officers were: J. M. Eames, Pres.; M. Wicks, Secy.; Oscar Howe, Treas.; and L.

M. Tucker, librarian. The association now have 250 volumes in the library.

Aaron Leonard, whose buildings stood near the bridge north of the Methodist chapel, Ried Hollow, was frozen to death April 6, 1815. His wife being away for a few days, he in company with some of the young men in the neighborhood, planned to have a good time on Fast day, which would occur on the 7th. Accordingly, he with his little boy started for Marlboro, where he procured a jug of rum. He started for home about dark in a snow storm. The little boy becoming cold lagged behind, and his father, tipsy and stupefied, stumbled and fell. The boy passed him and on getting home, supposing that his father had gone to bed, retired also. His cronies arriving next day, search was made for him, and the body found about one-half mile from the house of David Niles, (which is now gone.) The body was brought to the house and a coroner's inquest held, eliciting the above facts.

There has been a large number of saw-mills in town, the immense water power on the several streams affording facilities for manufacturing excelled by but few towns in the State. There are seven mills now in town. Frank B. Stone, manufacturer of chair stock and lumber; Stone & Clark, manufacturers of lumber, chair stock, baby carriage hubs, perambulator handles, etc.; W. Dennison, lumber; L. W. Sumner, lumber and shingles. He also runs a grist-mill with his other business. A. L. Thurber, lumber and chair stock. He has lately added steam power. And two mills in district No. 11, Gilman Warren & Son, lumber, chair stock, and cider jelly; and J. E. Gates, lumber and cider jelly.

There have been stores in town as follows: One in school district No. 1, one in district No. 3, one in district No. 6, six different places in district No. 7, one in district No. 10, two in district No. 11. At the present time there is one store at Halifax Center, Watson DeWolf, proprietor; at West Halifax, George L. Clark and Oscar Howe, each general assortment stores; J. M. Niles, boots and shoes; L. W. Sumner, flour, feed and oats. These with the Grange store in district No. 10, are all the stores in town at the present time.

MINERALS.

The rocks of the town abound in minerals; among which iron and copper are most common, also sulphur. Mineral springs abound, but little is known about their medicinal virtues. There is much timber and wood in town, and it is also noted for its fruit; also for its maple sugar and horses.

NOTED PEOPLE.

Among the noted people born in town may be mentioned Chipman Swain, high sheriff; Stephen Niles, high sheriff, representative; Sanford Plumb, senator and representative; Rev. Samuel Fish, who preached in town over fifty years. He was father of Rev. Henry C. Fish of Newark, N. J., who acquired quite a reputation as a doctor of divinity, author and traveler, and of Warren Fish also of New Jersey, the inventor of the porcelain shade lamp; also grandfather of Geo. H. Niles of Brattleboro, inventor of the Niles self-regulating electric dynamo, and of Mrs. Will Carlton, wife of the famous poet of that name, who in her earlier days was, in company with her first husband, the Rev. Sabin T. Goodell, engaged in missionary work in Burmah. The Starks, father and son, Landon & Jed, noted lawyers, together have solemnized over 2,000 marriages. Other lawyers who have lived in the town were Mr. Barber, W. H. Follett and C. F. Boyd. There have been many different physicians in town among whom the most noted have been Drs. Williams, Miller, Johnston and Harrington. Drs. O. A. Wheeler of California, and J. M. Clark of North Adams, Mass., were natives of this town. Prof. C. W. Emerson, president of the Boston School of oratory, preached in this town several years. The Rev. L. W. Brigham, past grand master of the I. O. O. F. of Wisconsin, once lived in this town, and married his wife here.

During the war Halifax furnished one hundred and nine men, and fifteen paid commutation. She lost three in battle, and sixteen others died in the service. She paid $18,450.85 as bounty to volunteers, and $3,400 for substitutes for enrolled men.

The first mention we find of Halifax was at the meeting at Dorset of delegates from the various towns in the New Hampshire grants in September, 1776, Halifax then being represented by Col. Benjamin Carpenter; Edward Harris, 1778 to 1783; Joseph Tucker, 1784; Hubbel Wells, 1785 to 1789; Benjamin Henry, 1790 to 1798; Darius Bullock, 1799; B. Henry, 1801-2; Mr. Bullock, 1803 to 1811; Stephen Otis, 1812 to 1817; Darius Bullock, 1818; Russell Avery, 1819; D. Bullock, 1820-21; B. Henry, 1822; George Boardman, 1823-28; James L. Stark, 1829-30; Sanford Plumb, 1831; D. Bullock, 1832; Sanford Plumb, 1833; Benj. Woodard, 1834; James L. Stark, 1835-36; B. Woodard, 1837-38; Isaac Worden, 1839; James L. Stark, 1840-41; Rufus K. Henry, 1842; William H. Stark, 1843; B. Woodard, 1844; Nicholas Clark, 1845; William Plumb, 1846; Stephen Niles, 1847-48; Jonas Scott, 1849; Joseph Henry, 1850; Amos Tucker, 1851; Jonas Scott, 1852, Elisha Hager, 1853; Isaac Worden, 1854; Martin Scott, 2d, 1855-56; Alpheus H. Stone, 1857; A. H. Tucker, 1858-59; Stephen Niles, 1860; Martin Scott, 2d, 1861-2; Charles Fowler, 1863-64; A. H. Tucker, 1865-66; Albert J. Tucker, 1867-68; Almon Ballou, 1869, A. H. Stone, 1870; this year the biennial sessions began. In 1872, Charles F. Griffin; 1874, A. H. Stone; 1876, Albert M. V. Hager; 1878, J. L. Harrington; 1880, L. W. Sumner; 1882, L. M. Woodard; 1884, George L. Clark; 1886, L. M. Woodard; 1888, Luther Adams; 1890, George L. Clark.

In regard to the town clerks the records are very incomplete. Deming's "Vermont officers" gives Samuel Woodard as the first town clerk, chosen about 1772. Beer's "Windham County Atlas" says the same. A diligent search of the records in the town clerk's office shows a record of birth attested to by James Gray, clerk, October 27, 1773. The books contain various entries consisting of land records, church membership, ear marks, agreements, etc. of earlier dates, but all were attested by justices of the peace, pastors, deacons, county surveyors, where they contained any signature. The rest is a record of an "Annual town meeting" at which James Gray was chosen clerk, 1778; 1779, Hubbel Wells; 1787, Nathan Fish. The next year he was succeeded by Wells. Mr. Fish also served again, also Hubbel Wells and Darius Bullock. He was also very prominent in town affairs. Rufus K. Henry, 1834; Whitney J. Hitchcock, 1852; Charles Fowler, 1854; J. L. Harrington, 1867; L. M. Tucker, 1868; Mr. Harrington, 1869; 1881, H. R. Stone; Millard Wicks, 1882, and is still in office.

JAMAICA.

By J. G. EDDY.

JAMAICA.

Jamaica, in size, the third town in Windham county, having by the census of 1860 a population of 1541, is situated in the northwestern part of the county, on West River, about 27 miles from Brattleboro, and 18 miles from Manchester. It is bounded N. by Londonderry and Windham, E. by Townsend, S. by Wardsboro, W. by Stratton and Winhall.

The township is in the form of a trapezoid, and contains about 42 square miles. The surface, like other Green Mountain towns, is uneven, being diversified by high hills and mountains, known as Ball Mountain, Shatterack Mountain, Tom Thumb Hill, South Hill, and West Hill. Cold and uninviting as they may appear to the people at the present time, it is a noticeable fact, that the earlier settlers first chose the highest of them for their homes, as is attested by fallen down houses, old cellars and highways, still plainly to be seen. West River flows through the northeastern part of the town. There are also several other streams of considerable size, branches of this river, flowing through different sections of the town, affording good mill privileges, and otherwise supplying the town with water in great abundance. In the northern part of the town is a body of water, known as "Cole's Pond," receiving its name from a man living near it. It is about one mile in length and from one-half to three-quarters of a mile in width. Hamilton Falls are situated on a small stream, known as the "Cobb brook," which rises in Windham, and flows a southwesterly course through Jamaica, emptying into West River. The falls are distant from Jamaica village about $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles. They are but a few rods from the road leading from Jamaica to Windham, yet are so hidden that their existence would remain unknown to a casual passer by. The falls are about 125 feet in height. The stream is quite small, and when the water is low the scenery is not remarkable, but when high, the sight is magnificent.

The first settlers, Calvin, William and Caleb Howard, together with their families, moved into town the day before the battle of Bunker Hill, June 16, 1775, and claimed that they heard distinctly the roar of the cannon, on that memorable day. They had previously erected a small log-house, and cleared a few acres of land, a short distance from West Townshend village, near where Chas. Robbins now resides. They emigrated from Massachusetts. Calvin Howard was one of the ten brothers, five or six of whom, afterwards came to Jamaica, and were among the original grantees of the town, and are represented at the present time by their numerous descendants. The night after their arrival, Elisha Howard was born, and was of course, the first child born in Jamaica. The original grantees were Col. Samuel Fletcher, His Excellency Thomas Chittenden, William Ward, Col. Moses Robinson, Mathew Lyon, John Butler, Caleb Maynard, Stephen Rawson, Reuben Hamlington, Silas Hamlington, Marshall Miller, Ebenezer Haven, Nathaniel Haven, Joseph Haven, Stephen Wilcox, Joseph Hildrich, Caleb Hayward, John Wright, Benj. Hayward, Moses Johnson, Silas Hayward, Aaron Alexander Knight, Joseph Tyler, Amariah Taft, Aaron Hutson, Chas. Hutson, William Hayward, Peter Hazleton, John Fossett, William Church, Jonathan Knight, Samuel Kingsbury, Daniel Gates, Arad Holton, Joel Knight, Isaac Miller, Tilletson Paul Spooner, Esq., John Sergeant, Ethan Hayward, Moses Doty, Reuben Nard, Philip Jordon, Comfort Joy, Jesse Joy, Philip Alexander, Levi Hayward, Benj. Howe, Isaac Hart, Hazael Shepard, Rufus Shepard, Eleazer Harris, Nathan Hayward, Moses Holbrook, Frederick Taft, Michael Johnson, Archibius Blodgett, Joshua Morse, Calvin Knowlton, Seth Knight, Jonas Cook, Samuel Wakefield, Paul Hayward, Ira Allen, Esq., Jabez Butler, and John Jones. The condition of the charter was as follows: "Each proprietor of said township of Jamaica, his heir and assigns, shall plant and cultivate five acres of land, and build a house thereon, at least eight feet square, on each respective share or plight of land in said township, within the term of four years after the circumstances of the war will admit of it with safety."—that "all pine timber suitable for the navy, shall be reserved to and for the benefit of the State."

The town was chartered Nov. 7, 1780, by Thomas Chittenden, then governor of the state, and organized by a meeting of the proprietors Sept. 3, 1781, which meeting was holden at the house of Wm. Hayward. Lucius Wilson was chosen moderator; William Harrison Church, town clerk, and Benj. Hayward, W. Hayward and Wm. H. Church, selectmen. The first school-house built in town was constructed with logs, and stood a short distance from the bridge across West river near Clark French's dwelling house. It was built soon after the first settlement of the town, and was probably the first public building erected. The first saw and grist mill were on the same stream and near the same place whereon Judson Howard's old mill now stands.

The village of Jamaica is situated east of the center of the town on a branch of West river. The first house that was built in this village was erected by Roger Howe in 1803 or 4, and is the same building now occupied (1869) by William H. Sanders for a dwelling house, but has been several times repaired and enlarged, and originally stood a little south of its present location. Soon after it was built it was opened for a hotel and was the first public house in the village, though not the first in town, as I am told that previous to this a small building, occupied at the present time by Deacon James Muzzy for a pig-sty (the same in size then as now) was once the hotel in Jamaica. Mr. Howe's sign was a rough board, nailed to a large hemlock tree standing near, with the words "Pay to-day and trust to-morrow" painted upon it, indicating that the house afforded that which commanded house custom to an extent not allowable at the present day. Howe continued to occupy this house until the present hotel, standing on Main street, was built by Nathaniel Cheney, about the year 1814. Cheney kept this house a short time and then sold to Samuel Hastley, since which it has been kept by Moses Chamberlain, Ezra Wilder, S. Newell, Horace Howe, J. E. Knowlton, D. H. Rice, O. F. Knowlton, H. E. Sawyer and E. W. Prior.

The first store goods were offered for sale by Nathaniel Cheney, in a small building known as the "noon house," standing near the Congregational church. Ripley and Doolittle built the first store on the same site, and said to be the same building now owned and occupied by the Hon. H. H. Wheeler. Subsequently Wilder, Cheney & Brown, J. S. Newell, L. Merrifield & Co., I. & J. Williams, C. H. Peirce & Co., A. Johnson, J. H. Converse and Anson Howard traded in the same building.

The second store was built by S. T. R. Cheney, who traded in it a while and was afterwards used for the same purpose by Brown & Furnace, I. G. Sumner, Sumner & Brimhall, then by Union Store Association, still later, by Jamaica Leather Company, for a boot shop, since burned. In 1846 or 1847, J. G. Sumner built the store opposite the hotel, and carried on trade in the building a few years. It has since been occupied by Birchard Livermore & Co., Livermore & Howard, Benj. Livermore, H. J. Philipps and Abijah Muzzy, present occupant.

In 1852, C. H. Peirce built the store now occupied by him on Hill street. In the meantime it has been occupied by C. H. Peirce & Co., D. G. Dexter and Peirce & Dexter.

In 1849, the Union Store Association fitted up and occupied the same building in which L. H. Phelps is now trading (1864). During the intervening time the same has been occupied by O. F. Knowlton, Knowlton & Foskett, Knowlton & Butler, H. A. Butler and Butler Bros.

WEST RIVER BANK

was chartered in 1853. At the first meeting of the stockholders, March, 1854, Hon. James H. Phelps of Townshend, was chosen president and the Hon. John E. Butler, cashier. The first named holding his office until the change to a National bank in 1865, when he was succeeded by the Hon. Wm. Harris of Windham. Mr. Butler was successively chosen cashier to the time of his death, which occurred in 1867, and was succeeded by his son, John A. Butler, present cashier.

In 1858 the Jamaica Leather Company was incorporated and immediately commenced and continued to do a large business up to 1867; but it proving unprofitable they sold out their shop which they built in 1860, to Parsons, Livermore & Holton, who are now doing a good business in the same.

In the year 1828, Benj. Felton fitted up an old building into a tannery, near the present location of the Universalist church, and his two sons, Henry H. and H. L. Felton, carried on the tanning business therein until 1839, when they left here and built where C. D. Reade's tannery now stands. In 1848, Reade bought them out and has since carried on that business, associating with himself John Parsons two years and his son, Fayette D., one year.

The second tannery was built by Solomon Newell, near the bridge, across the stream on the road leading to Winhall, about the year 1841. In 1849, H. H. & H. L. Felton built the tannery now occupied by H. H. Felton, and they or one of them, have since carried on that business in this building.

John Kellogg in 1809, put up the first blacksmith shop, near the present residence of C. H. Peirce.

In 1844, Gilbert Shomway built the chair factory and saw-mill now occupied by A. Muzzy. Occupied in the intervening time by E. G. Johnson & Co.

Lewis Shomway built the bucket factory and saw-mill on the road leading to West Jamaica, and the following named persons have since carried on the business there: O. Maynard, Q. Shomway, T. Boynton and D. Sherwin.

Roger Howe built the first grist-mill, near Reade's mill-dam, which he run for a few years. The same was afterwards run by Joseph Shepard. The grist and saw-mill back of the shoe shop, was built by Joseph Dicks in 1809, and the same was subsequently occupied by A. Kellogg, A. Wheaton, James Waterman and Almon Clayton; since burned.

THE BAPTIST CHURCH.

Of its early history and organization, but little can be ascertained, the church records as well as those of the society being lost. Its organization, however, appears to have been previous to that of the Congregationalist church. Elder Simeon Coombs was the first settled minister of this church and the first in town, and received the "ministerial land," which was by the terms of the charter of the town to go to the first settled minister. Among its first members were Calvin and Caleb Howard, and many others of the very earliest settlers in town. Previous to the erection of the meeting house, which was in 1817, they held their meetings at private dwelling houses and school houses. These meetings were always fully attended, the people deeming it almost a sin not to be found in their usual place at church. From this church the Baptist churches in several of the adjoining towns have been set off, and wide and lasting has been its influence, and from it, too, have gone out a goodly number of Baptist preachers, who have distinguished themselves by their good works, among whom are Rev. Leland Howard, now residing in Rutland, one of the first preachers in the State, and whose fame was not confined to Vermont alone, he having preached several years in Troy and Buffalo, N. Y., and other large places. Also Rev. Timothy Spaulding, who was styled a martyr to the cause of slavery. While lecturing upon that subject in one of the Western States, he was refused admission to the meeting house, on account of the political feeling in the church, so retiring to a grove, before a large audience, he delivered his lecture, took cold and died from its effects. Rev. Ziba Howard, Rev. Rufus Smith and Rev. Mr. Kingsbury were also among the number. Those who have supplied their pulpit, as near as can be ascertained, were Rev. Messrs. Simeon

Coombs, Choate, Shomway, Baker, P. B. Fisk, Graves, Bruier, Robinson, Chamberlin, T. Blood, Nathan Arms, Leland Huntley, Nathaniel Cudworth, Norman Clark, I. H. Wood, A. H. Stearns, Robert Myers, Samuel S. White and C. P. Frenyear.

THE CONGREGATIONALIST CHURCH.

This church was organized Sept. 25, 1791, with advice and direction of the pastors of the Congregationalist churches of Dummerston and Newfane. The first members as appears by the church records, were Reuben Wellman, Mary Gage, Loney Blanchis, Aaron Whitney, Mary Wellman, Margaret Whitney and John Wellman. Reuben Wellman was chosen the first deacon. In 1794, by a vote of the church, an invitation was extended to John Stoddard to take the pastoral charge of the church. The church at the same time requesting the town to give him the ministerial land already alluded to in connection with the Baptist church, which it appears was under the control of the town. But the town, for some cause, refused to grant him the land which we have already seen went to Simeon Coombs, who afterwards presented one-half of the same to the Congregational society. Stoddard, however, it appears, came and preached for several years; and it does not appear that the church had any other settled preacher until 1815, when Rev. Philip Spaulding was regularly installed pastor over it, and receiving the land which Coombs presented to the society. Spaulding remained with the church till 1829, and was succeeded by Rev. Samuel Kingsbury, who was dismissed 1833. There is no record of those who have preached for this church since Mr. Kingsbury left. Below we give a list collected from old inhabitants: Joseph Kingsbury, — Brown, Justin Parsons, Abel Pattin, Sumner Lincoln, Thomas Rood, Abijah Stowell, — built a meeting house in 1851, and for two or three years after their house was built Rev. Mr. Wilcox supplied the pulpit, who was succeeded by Rev. Mr. Perkins, who stayed about the same length of time, since which they have not had any preaching. They never had a church organization.

Selden, Robert D. Miller, Nelson Barber, L. G. Chase and W. C. Bourn.

THE UNIVERSALIST SOCIETY

MILLERISM.

In the fall or early winter of 1842 a man by the name of Chandler, a preacher, came to Jamaica, and wished to lecture on the second coming of Christ as declared by Miller. He proposed to show from the prophecies that the end would come on a certain month and day in 1843, and being an eloquent speaker, and able reasoner, many very soon embraced his views. Great excitement prevailed. Other preachers of the same faith soon arrived, and this excitement lasted during the next summer and autumn. Farmers neglected their fields, alleging that the world would end before harvest, and crops that had matured were left to waste. Meetings were held in different places almost continually, till people were exhausted by fatigue, anxiety and want of sleep. A company of these fanatics collected at the house of a Mr. Young in the south part of the town. The house was thronged day after day until the community became alarmed for the health and reason of those in attendance. The civil authority visited them and in kindness requested them to stop the meetings for a time and get rest and sleep, but all to no purpose. A few days after this Mrs. Young died from over-excitement.

A Mrs. Stocker in the same neighborhood became insane and committed suicide, while many others appeared for the time to have lost their reason. Property was wasted, families neglected and churches rent in pieces. Finally, upon setting time after time for the second advent, and being as often disappointed, many acknowledged their mistake and the excitement abated. "God grant," says an eye witness, "that we may never see the like again."

ACCIDENTS.

About the year 1862, Daniel Stocker, and his son George, then a young man of 21 years of age, were out breaking roads when a gust of wind carried off the young man's hat, who immediately went in search of it, and not returning his father supposed that he had gone to the house which was near by, and continued his work for nearly an hour, when ascertaining that George was not at the house he went to look for him and passing around the brow of the hill, he saw a large snow-slide, and on proceeding to the spot and listening could just hear the feeble sound of his son's voice, then so weak from exhaustion that it could scarcely be heard. He was entirely covered and so completely imbedded in the snow as to be unable to move hand or foot, and where he must have perished but for the timely assistance of the father, who dug him out.

The great freshet of Oct. 4, 1869, will long be remembered by the inhabitants of Jamaica and surrounding towns, as the most destructive of the kind that ever occurred in this vicinity. The damage done to the highway was immense, nearly all the bridges in town, amounting to about a mile in length, being swept away and the roads otherwise rendered impassible. The damage done to private property was also great. There were several narrow escapes of men's lives, and one man, Mr. Wm. H. Can, was swept away in the mighty element. The circumstances of his death were as follows: The bridge across the stream near Chas. D. Reed's had been all the forenoon (Oct. 4th) momentarily expected to go off, the abutments having been undermined in the early part of the day. Mr. C. during this time had been cautioning older people, and preventing the boys from venturing upon the bridge. At noon he went to his house and took dinner, and as he started to go back, Mrs. C. in turn charged him not to go upon the bridge. He replied that there was not money enough in town to hire him to cross it, and went off. On reaching the spot he perceived that the water had fallen a good deal and the bridge still standing. He remarked to a Mr. Clark standing near, that it was safe, thereupon he and Clark started to cross to the opposite side. They no sooner stepped upon the bridge than it began to tremble. Mr. Clark sprung backward, while Mr. Can rushed ahead, hoping, it is supposed in his fright, to gain the opposite side, but so suddenly did the bridge float off that he had not got more than half way across. Mr. Clark saw him as he floated down the stream, standing in the middle of the bridge with his hands raised above his head, looking upward apparently watching the falling timbers, when the bridge seemed to close up and crush him in its huge grasp. No more was seen of him until after the water abated the next day, when his body was found washed up on dry land a short distance above West Townshend. Mr. Can had held various offices in this town, and at the time of his death was the oldest deputy sheriff in the county of Windham, in which office he excelled. The town lost a valuable and active citizen.

HON. JOHN E. BUTLER,

Son of Aaron and Lucinda (Howard,) Butler, born in Jamaica, Dec. 14, 1809; worked on his father's farm till 17 years of age; then worked abroad, at home, attended select and academical schools, taught winter schools in the towns of Londonderry, Townshend and Windham; Mar. 1833, studied law with Epuphroditus Ransom, Esq., at Townshend; Mr. Ransom removing to Michigan he continued in the office of Hon. John Roberts of Townshend; finished with Horace Roberts, Esq. of Whitingham; admitted to the Windham County bar at the April term, 1837; commenced and continued to practice with Horace Roberts at Whitingham, till the death of Mr. Roberts in 1838; Oct. 25, 1837, married to Roccina Brooks of Winhall; P. M. at Whitingham, 1838-43; while resident at Whitingham, an academy was built there and provided with apparatus, mainly through his efforts; July 24, 1843, commenced the practice of law in Jamaica; representative from the town in 1838, '39, '51, '53; West River Bank incorporated in 1853, mainly through his influence, and located at Jamaica; organized 1854, he was elected cashier and remained so while he lived; formed a law partnership with Benj. L. Knowlton; dissolved by Mr. Knowlton's death in 1855; 1857, member of the Constitutional Convention; 1858, '59, Windham county State senator; 1859 Jamaica Leather Co. incorporated and located at Jamaica, chiefly through his influence; commenced business in 1859; formed a law partnership with H. H. Wheeler, which continued while he lived.

In 1861 he was a prominent candidate for governor, but Mr. Holbrook's claims were urged so strongly that Mr. Butler's name was withdrawn.

As a lawyer he stood in the front rank. For the preparation of causes for trial, the arrangement and putting in of testimony, and the cross-examination of witnesses, he had no equal in this part of the State.

In the town where he resided, he was foremost in every enterprise for its welfare, or of the village in which he lived. As a legislator he was practical and reliable, and as a neighbor, kind and accommodating. His family consisted of a wife and three children. The youngest, Geo. A., died Aug. 1, 1864, at the age of 18. His eldest, John A., assisted him in the bank from about the time it was incorporated until his death. His second son, Henry A., was lying dangerously sick at Beaufort, S. C., where Mr. Butler had gone to visit him, at the time of his own death, which occurred May 9, 1867.—Condensed from an elaborated notice in the Vermont Record and Farmer.

SOLOMON GOODALE,

a man of liberality, died at Jamaica, Vt., in Sept., 1815, aged 70 years. At no time was his property worth $5,000. He was a farmer, living in a rude spot in the neighborhood of the Green Mountains. All his property was gained by severe personal labor, and saved by strict frugality, yet about the year 1800, he gave $100 to the Con. Miss. Soc., and the same sum for several successive years. When the American Board of Foreign Missions was established, he sent notice that he wished to subscribe $500 for immediate use, and $1000 for the fund while yet it was not in his power to pay only $50 as earnest money. He fulfilled his engagement and paid interest on the proposed $1,000 until he made provision for its payment, just before his death, adding to it another $1,000. The amount of his donations to missions to the heathen besides other charities, was $3,686. He had also provided for his children and his wife. He was a Baptist, yet most of his donations were entrusted to the hands of his fellow Christians not Baptists.

His integrity soon gained the confidence and respect of his townsmen and he probably had a greater influence over them than any other man of his time. For several years he was our representative at the General Assembly, and for a long time held the office of town clerk, and at different times held other town offices. The Baptist church is greatly indebted to him for its prosperity at the present time. He had two sons who enlisted in the service in the late Rebellion. Warren died soon after returning home from disease contracted in the army. Wm. H. H. was wounded at Algiers, La., by a party of guerrillas; recovering from his wounds, he again entered the service and rose to the rank of major.

TIMOTHY GOODALE.

A nephew of Solomon Goodale, also emigrated from Massachusetts when quite young. He was a talented man, a consistent member of the Congregational church, and an ardent abolitionist. He was prominent in town matters and was several years in the legislature.—From Allen's Biographical Dictionary.

DR. JOEL HOLTON.

Thomas Holton, with his son Arad, who had previously married Anna Haven, came to Dummerston in 1782, and together owned the well-known Holton farm north of the centre village. Arad's wife died in 1787, and he married Rebecca Houghton in the same year. She died, and he married Eunice Skinner, widow of Josiah, son of Lieut. Leonard Spaulding. Joel was born of this marriage, May 14, 1803. He became an apt scholar and a fine penman in the common district schools of the time, and by teaching penmanship enabled himself to pursue higher studies under the tuition of the neighboring clergyman, as was common in those times. Among others from whom he received instruction in this manner was Rev. Ephriam Holland Newton of Marlboro. He also attended a few terms at the academy in West Brattleboro, and studied medicine with Dr. Isaac N. Knapp of Dummerston. He was so successful that he attended a course of medical lectures at Bowdoin college, Maine, from which he received the degree of Doctor of Medicine, May 17, 1831. He became a Fellow of the Vermont Second Medical Society in the same year. His certificate contains the four names, John P. Warren, David Allen, Waitstill R. Ranney and Chester Olds, familiar in the medical profession.

He married Lucretia Bugbee before his graduation, Aug. 29, 1830. He resided in Dummerston until the latter part of the year 1831, when he removed to Jamaica and settled there. His wife died there May 15, 1839, leaving no children. He married Miss Pamela Knowlton of Wardsboro, Dec. 3, 1839. The children of this marriage are: W. H. H. Holton, inspector of customs at the port of New York; Warren L. Holton, who was a soldier of Co. D, 16th Regt. Vt. Vols., and died Aug. 2, 1863, just after being mustered out of the service; Mrs. Lucretia E. Eddy, wife of David Eddy, Esq., of Jamaica; and George W. Holton, who now resides with his mother at the family homestead. Several others died in infancy. Dr. Holton died at Jamaica, Aug. 3, 1884.

During the half century and upwards that he practiced his profession in Jamaica he was the favorite family physician of many people in that and adjoining towns. He was moderate in his charges for service, lenient in asking payment and never refused attendance and medicine for the poor. His house was always open to his friends, relatives, acquaintances and patrons. He was town clerk from 1836 to 1845, and from 1860 to 1863, inclusive, and a member of the constitutional convention of 1850, justice of the peace for several years, and representative to the Legislature in 1868 and 1869. When the artist, Wood, at Montpelier in 1868, wished to represent a country doctor in a painting, he selected Dr. Holton as a type, and induced him to pose for a figure of that character; and in the picture he appears quite true to life. Soon after coming to Jamaica, he united with the Baptist church, and was ever afterward an active and prominent member. He was an early advocate of temperance and favored strongly the strictest prohibition of the traffic in intoxicating liquors. He vigorously opposed slavery and favored abolition, and was secretary of the first anti-slavery society in the State. He was most strenuously opposed to secret societies of every name and kind, considering them conspiracies against the good of society and wholly out of place in a free country and among a free people. He could brook no opposition about this, and carried it into all his associations. He was generous of his means towards all public and worthy objects, large-hearted and kind; was known to all the people round about; was prominent among families, in the street and in public places. His death, full of years, was noticed by all, and he will be greatly missed by many.

MRS. PARMELIA HOLTON.

When it became known that in the early morning of the second day of May the soul of this saintly woman had passed on to her maker, the universal thought and exclamation was, "A mother in Israel has fallen;" and never were words more fittingly applied. Born in Wardsboro, Nov. 21, 1816, she was one of a family of five children of Justice and Chloe Knowlton, all of whom were men and women of strong mental and physical vigor, and one, the Rev. Miles J. Knowlton, D. D., was for more than 20 years a missionary in China, dying there about 15 years ago. Parmelia Knowlton was converted in the spring of 1838, and united with the Baptist church in West Wardsboro. December 3, 1839, she married Dr. Joel Holton of Jamaica. She was the mother of five children, three of whom are now living, one son dying in the army.

With a simple dignity that won the respect of all, she yet made herself the servant of all, and none were too humble not to be loved and helped by her, and her life was one unceasing round of kind deeds that brightened and bettered every life that came in contact with hers.

THE HON. HOYT H. WHEELER.

The Hon. Hoyt H. Wheeler was born at Chesterfield, N. H., August 30, 1833, where he lived until February 14, 1849, when he removed with his parents, John and Roxana Wheeler, to Newfane, Vt. While residing at Newfane he attended school several terms at Chesterfield academy, and also select schools at Fayetteville, Vt. In December, 1855, he commenced the study of law with Charles K. Field, Esq., at Williamsville, Vt., and remained with Mr. Field what time he could get till March, 1859, at which time he went into the office of Bradley & Kellogg, at Brattleboro, and studied with them till the September following, when he was admitted to the bar in Windham county. In December he went into partnership at Jamaica with the late Hon. John E. Butler; practiced law with him until the death of the latter in 1867, after which he continued his practice in Jamaica till the summer of 1869, when he associated with himself L. M. Reed, which co-partnership lasted till he was elected one of the assistant judges of the Supreme Court of this State. Mr. Wheeler's parents were poor and he was obliged to rely upon his own resources to obtain means with which to pursue his studies at school, and also those of the law. While attending the academy and studying law he taught school and attended to various other kinds of business. In 1868 he represented the town of Jamaica at the General Assembly, and in 1869 was chosen senator from the county of Windham, and was a member of the Senate at the time he was elected judge. Mr. Wheeler possesses a well balanced mind and on entering upon the practice of law formed habits of industry and regularity, and his intense application and unyielding perseverance soon ranked him among the first lawyers in the State, and justly entitled him to the high position which he now occupies.

BENJ. L. KNOWLTON,

also a partner of the late John E. Butler, was born in Newfane, September 16, 1824. He was a son of Benjamin and Olive S. Knowlton. He attended school at Leland and Gray seminary at Townshend, and a few terms at the Black River academy at Ludlow, until fitted for college. He graduated at Waterville, Maine, in 1849. In 1851 he commenced the study of law with Oscar Shafter, at Wilmington, Vt., and remained with him until he was admitted to the bar in 1854. In December, the same year, he commenced practice in company with Mr. Butler. He became a well read lawyer, held the office of State's attorney in the county for two years, and at the time of his death, September 19, 1859, he had attained a good degree of eminence in his profession, and was highly respected by his townsmen, both as a citizen and as a lawyer.

ATTORNEYS

who have resided in town and pursued their profession here: John E. Butler, Benjamin L. Knowlton, E. E. Kellogg, H. H. Wheeler, E. L. Waterman, L. M. Read and J. G. Eddy.

PHYSICIANS

who have practiced medicine in Jamaica: Nathaniel Weeks, Joel Holton, Moses Chamberlain, William Sanders, C. Fisher, J. Otis Howe, William Chase, Lorenzo H. Sprague, M. V. Congdon, A. F. Bliss, Charles E. Spring.

PETER R. TAFT,

an influential citizen, spent about 20 years of the most active part of his life in Jamaica, and rendered here valuable and efficient services in a public capacity. At the time of the enactment of the law creating road commissioners for each county, he was appointed a member of the first board; and through his influence many alterations and improvements were made in the public roads throughout the county. Below we give a memorial sketch published in the Cincinnati Gazette, soon after his death, January, 1867.

PETER RAWSON TAFT,

born April 17, 1785, at Uxbridge, Mass., at 14 years of age, with his father's family, removed to the new State of Vermont and settled in Townshend. He labored on his father's farm a greater portion of his time, but improved the advantages of such common schools and academies as were accessible; he was studious and always fond of reading. As soon as he was of sufficient age, he taught the public school of Townshend in the winter season, and continued to do so for five or six years. He also made himself a skillful surveyor, and for a time was extensively employed in that capacity.

At 25 he was married to Sylvia Howard of the same place, who has also died within the past year. They lived together about 56 years.

They had but one child, Alphonzo Taft, now one of the judges of the Superior Court of Cincinnati, with whom they have resided at Cincinnati the last 20 years or more. The active life of the deceased was mainly spent in Vermont. Without aspiring to high office, he was a good deal in public life. By annual elections and re-elections he was many times a representative in the Vermont Legislature. He was four years judge of the Probate Court, and also four years a judge of the Windham County Court. He was extensively trusted, confided in and consulted by his neighbors and fellow citizens of Windham county, and universally regarded as a just and humane man, not grasping for gain nor ambitious for office; but rendering much useful service for moderate compensation.

Books have been a great resource in his old age. His historical knowledge was extensive and his famil-ilarity with the Bible, truly remarkable. He has left to those friends and relatives who have survived him and who knew him best, a sweet and precious memory. He died about 4 o'clock A. M. on New Year's day.

LONGEVITY.

The following named persons lived to a great age. Several were upwards of 90, and few, if any, were under 80 years, at the time of their decease: James Magan, Rachell Magan, Sally Howard, Benj. Knowlton, Olive S. Knowlton, Wm. Bond, Dea. C. Wheaton, Lewis Shumway, Sarah G. Hyde, Nehemiah Ramsdell, Huldah Wilder, Reuben Holton, Jonathan Howard, Israel Underwood, John Howe, Nathan Davidson, Sarah Davidson, Bailey Rawson, Susannah Rawson, Abijah Fuller, Susannah Streeter, Betsey Kingsbury, Huldah Howe, Jemima Cobb, Alpheus Kellog, Nathan Weeks, Joshua Daniels, Elisha Howard, John Howe, John Wellman, John Watson, Josiah Davidson, Mrs. Josiah Davidson, Benj. MILITARY HISTORY OF JAMAICA.

BATTLE BETWEEN THE WHITES AND INDIANS.

A fight between a party of scouts from Fort Dummer in Brattleboro took place near Jamaica village on West river at a point where the river leaves Ball mountain, now known as the "Salmon hole," an account of which, taken from Hall's History of Eastern Vermont, we give below: "Preparations having been consummated, a scout of 19 men under the command of Capt. Eleazer Melvin, marched on the 13th of May, 1745, from Fort Dummer. Proceeding up Connecticut river as far as Number Four, they were there joined by Captains Stevens and Hobbs, with a force of 60 men, and the whole party on Sunday, the 15th, at sunset, set out from Number Four on their hazardous enterprise. They followed the "Indian road" along the banks of Black river, but sometimes would lose it in fording streams and in traversing the forests where the ground was covered with a thick growth of underbrush. On reaching the main branch of Otter Creek, Capt. Melvin and his men, according to agreement, left the party, crossed the stream, and set out for Crown Point. Capt. Melvin's party having met during the two following days with many indubitable signs of the enemy, came on the 23d to a large camp inclosed by a thick fence, where they found about 12 pounds of good French bread, and a keg which from all appearances had lately contained wine. Having arrived opposite to Crown Point on the 25th they perceived two canoes with Indians on the lake and imprudently fired upon them; the garrison at Crown Point taking the alarm, fired several guns and sent out a party to intercept them. Melvin and his party immediately started on their return, marching three or four miles through a deep morass. On the 26th, they saw the tracks of 150 to 200 of the enemy, who had evidently left that morning, having taken the course by which Melvin's party had reached Lake Champlain. Upon this they took a south direction and marched up the south branch of Otter creek, and on the 30th came upon a branch of West river. Provisions being very short they began their march before sunrise on the 31st, and travelled until about half after 9 o'clock in the morning. On the banks of West river several of the company being faint and weary, desired to stop and refresh themselves. Having scattered they took off their packs and began shooting the salmon then passing up the shoals of the river. While thus engaged, the Indians who, unknown to Melvin, were then in pursuit of him and his party, directed probably by the report of his guns, pressed forward and suddenly opened fire upon the incautious scout from behind the logs and trees about 30 feet distant. Melvin endeavored to rally his men who had been thrown into the greatest confusion by this unexpected attack, but was unsuccessful, for after firing one volley they retreated, some running up, some down the river, others crossing to the opposite side and two or three escaping to a neighboring thicket. Deserted by his men, Capt. Melvin was left alone to defend himself. Several of the Indians attempted to strike him with their hatchets, others threw them at him, and one of them, or a shot, carried away his belt and with it his bullets. He then ran down the river and was followed by two Indians, who, as they approached, called to him "Come, Captain! now Captain!" On pointing his musket at them, they fell back a little, upon which, he ascended the bank of the river, when they again fired at him. Gaining a side hill, commanding a view of the place where the skirmish had taken place, he then sat down to watch for his men and wait for the shout of the Indians, usually given when they have gained a victory; but not seeing the former, nor hearing the latter, he started for Fort Dummer, where he arrived on the 1st of June about noon-time. One of his men had come in a little before him, and eleven more arrived, though in several companies, in the space of a few hours. In this fight, five of Melvin's men, viz: Sergt. John Heyward, Sergt. Isaac Taylor, Privates John Dodd, Daniel Mann and Samuel Severance were killed outright. Joseph Petty was wounded and his comrades being unable to take him with them in their flight, left him in a hut made with boughs, situated near a spring. Before departing they placed beside him a pint cup filled with water and told him "to live if he could" until they should return with assistance. On the 2d, Capt. Melvin with 46 men, left Fort Dummer for the place where the fight had occurred. Great search was made for Petty, but he was nowhere to be found. After having buried the dead above named, with the exception of Samuel Severance, whose body was not discovered until some time after, the party returned to Fort Dummer, having been absent about three days. On the 6th, Lieuts. Alexander and Hunt with a large force, went again to search for Petty. In one report it is stated that he was found dead; in another that his body was never discovered. From the secrecy used in concealing the bodies of their companions, it was impossible to determine the loss of the enemy. The fight is supposed by some to have taken place within the limits of the present township of Newfane, but it is more probable that the scene of the conflict was within the bounds of Jamaica, or Londonderry, the latter being the most likely, as the situation corresponds best with that given by Capt. Stevens, viz: 33 miles from Fort Dummer up West river. It is now ascertained beyond a doubt that this fight took place at the point above mentioned, the Salmon Hole, which is situated in West river, about 27 miles from Brattleboro. Above this place is a bend in the river, it taking an easterly course and running around Ball Mountain, and it is probable that the Indians being better acquainted with the route struck across on the west side of the mountain, which would be several miles nearer, and in this way overtook Capt. Melvin's party. Earlier settlers tell us that bones of human beings have been dug up by the farmers' plow, and that mounds said to be graves where the dead were buried were within their recollection visible near this place.

That the Indians once inhabited this region is apparent from the fact that numerous beds covered with pieces of flint where they had carved out their arrows have been found in different parts of the town although nothing definite can be learned about them.

Under the call for troops, in the war of 1812, Jamaica was called upon to furnish six privates and one sergeant. No one responded to the call, therefore a draft was ordered, and as the day arrived for carrying it into effect, the people of the town assembled to witness the proceedings. Before commencing, a request was made for volunteers, when Nathaniel Vial promptly stepped forward and enlisted. Then taking a position behind a drummer-boy and holding in his hand a staff from which was suspended a silk handkerchief representing a flag, this brave volunteer marched to and fro, across the common, in front of where the Congregational church now stands, asking others to join him. Wm. Davidson soon took a place by the side of Vial, and was immediately followed by Sylvester Hiscock, Zather Daniels, Amasa Evidence and Alvin C. Greene, completing the number of privates. A sergeant was still wanting. There were five in town at this time, who drew lots by placing bits of wood of different lengths, in the hands of Capt. Robbins, agreeing that he who should draw the shortest piece, should go. The lot fell upon Caleb Howe, who afterwards procured Abram Gage, a substitute, to take his place. One or two of the privates for some cause did not go, probably on account of sickness. Amasa Evidence died from disease while in the service. The rest returned at the close of the war.

MARLBORO.

A post town in the central part of Windham county, is in latitude $42^{\circ} 53'$ and longitude $4^{\circ} 26'$, and is bounded north by Newfane and a part of Dover, east by Brattleboro and a part of Dammerston, south by Halifax, and west by Wilmington. It is 24 miles east from Bennington and 44 miles south-west from Windsor. The township is 6 miles square. It was chartered April 29, 1751, but the charter was forfeited in consequence of not complying with its requisitions. The proprietors urged as a reason for their neglect, the intervention of the Indian and French war, and succeeded in getting their charter renewed by the same authority, New Hampshire, Sept. 21, 1761. The charter was given to one Timothy Dwight, and his associates, of Northampton, Mass., and its vicinity. The settlement was commenced as early as the spring of 1763, by Abel Stockwell, from West Springfield, Mass., and Thomas Whitmore, from Middletown, Conn. Whitmore came in by the way of Halifax, and settled in the south part of the town, and Stockwell by the way of Brattleboro, and settled in the eastern border. These families spent nearly a year in town and endured many hardships without any knowledge of each other, each considering his own the only family in town. Whitmore brought his provisions from Deerfield, Mass., on his back, a distance of 20 or more miles. Mrs. Whitmore spent most of the winter of 1765 alone, her husband being absent in the pursuit of his calling, as a tinker. Mrs. Whitmore was very useful to the settlers as a nurse. She frequently went through the woods on snow shoes, from one part of the town to the other, both by night and day, to relieve the distressed. She lived to the age of 87.

The first town meeting on record was held May 8, 1775. William Mather was the first town clerk. Another meeting was held on the 22d of the same month, to know the minds of the people with respect to the impending war with Great Britain. At this meeting they passed the following resolutions: "Resolved, we will, each of us, at the expense of our lives and fortunes, to the last extremity, unite and oppose the last cruel unjust and arbitrary acts of the British Parliament passed for the sole purpose of raising a revenue; Resolved, we will be contented and subject to the Hon. Continental Congress in all things which they shall resolve for the peace, safety and welfare of the American colonies." When the news of the Lexington battle reached here several young men shouldered their guns and hastened to the field of action. In 1777, Capt. Francis Whitmore was sent as a delegate to the convention at Windsor, and in 1778, Dr. Samuel King was sent as the first representative to the legislature, which met that year at Windsor. The Congregational church in town was organized by Rev. Joseph Lyman, D. D., of Hatfield, Mass., Oct. 20th, 1776. It consisted at first of nine male and eight female members. On the 9th of December, 1778, the Rev. Gershom C. Lyman, D. D., was ordained and settled over this church and society, he having preached one year. Dr. Lyman continued faithfully to discharge the duties of his sacred office 'till the time of his death, which took place on the 13th of April, 1813, in the 61st year of his age, and the 35th of his ministry.

Rev. Dr. Lyman in the early part of his ministry accustomed himself to manual labor, cultivating his farm. When not engaged in labor he was found in his study, which was sacred to himself.

The following is the epitaph upon his tombstone :

*In Memory of Rev. Gershom C. Lyman, D. D., First Pastor of the Church in Marlborough.
Who was a wise counsellor a skillful guide
A blessed peacemaker
An example to believers
A pattern to God's ministers Having for thirty-four years with uncommon ability
An exemplary fidelity
An ardent zeal for Christ
And tender concern for the salvation of sinners
Fulfilled his course, went to rest
In the bosom of his Saviour
April 13, A. D., 1813,
In the 61st year of his age and 35th of his ministry.*

The dead men shall live together, with my dead body shall they arise. Awake and sing, ye that dwell in the dust : for thy dew is as the dew of herbs and the earth shall cast out the dead.

Isaiah, XXVI. XIX.

Rev. Ephriam H. Norton was then settled over the church and society, and continued until about the year 1833. Since that time, Rev. Benjamin H. Pitman, Rev. Josiah Peabody and Rev. Elisha Smith have been their ministers at different times. The present minister is Wm. Schofield. The first meeting house was built in 1779. The Congregationalists erected a new meeting house in 1820. In 1822 the old meeting house was taken down, and a commodious town house erected. There is also a Baptist church and society, partly in this town and partly in Newfane. A Baptist meeting house was built here in 1815. Rev. Phineas Howe, being pastor. He was born in Fitzwilliam, N. H., May 16, 1792, came to Marlboro to preach, June 1, 1824, ordained Oct. 24, was pastor seven years, then absent three years, returned, and remained another seven years; while here, baptised 308, in Marlboro and adjoining towns. Rev. Dana Brown supplied one year; little is known of his history. Centre Mountain is a considerable elevation, and is so called on account of its being situated near the centre of the township. Allen's pond in the north-east part of the town is about $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile long and three-quarters of a mile wide; South pond, in the south part, is about the same size; it is watered by the west branch of West river, Whetstone brook and Green river, which rise here and afford several valuable mill rites. The soil in general is rich and deep and produces good crops. The timber is beech, birch, maple, bass, spruce, oak, hemlock, pine, fir, ash and cherry. The minerals are: sulphur, serpentine, garnets, stratite of different varieties, clay, sulphuret of iron and sulphuret of copper. In the early settlement of the township near Mather's mills was found a horn-blende rock in mica slate in which was discovered upon the surface somewhat imbedded, precious and massive garnets with chlorite and sulphuret of iron. A Mr. Samuel Mathers, a man of rare genius and of a peculiarly visionary temperament, having an occasional residence in the place, became charmed with the appearance of this rock. He professed to possess a glass with which he could look and see the mineral treasures in the earth, and he induced individuals to believe that in the heart of this rock he saw caverns lined with nuggets of gold. The rock was opened and a deep pit opened by drilling and blasting done by the gold seekers at an expenditure of much hard labor and about all the riches they possessed, without reaching the gold. During the year 1780 the inhabitants in this vicinity were in continual apprehension of a hostile visit from the Indians and Tories, and meetings were held to take measures for the common safety, whereupon it was agreed that every able-bodied man should hold himself in readiness to defend the settlements. On the eve of the last day of October, in the same year, after a clear and pleasant day, a violent snow storm commenced, and in the evening, Mr. Stockwell of this town received a letter from Col. Sergeant of Brattleboro, calling upon the inhabitants to defend themselves against the Indians and Tories who had reached Newfane. Charles Phelps, a lawyer from Hadley, Mass., moved into town in 1764, and his was the third family here. During the controversy with New York his son Timothy was high sheriff of the County of Cumberland. About the year 1768, two young women of Irish descent, by the name of McLaughlin, came to this town and resided with Mr. W. Clark. In the fall of the same year one of them went out towards evening after the cow, and was probably lost and perished in the woods, or devoured by wild beasts, as she never was afterwards heard of. In 1769 and '70, Col. Wm. Williams, who distinguished himself in the battle of Bennington, moved from Northboro, Mass., accompanied by Capt. Nathaniel Whitney and his two brothers, Samuel and James, from Shrewsbury, Mass. The latter was a representative of the town in the general assembly seven years, 32 years a justice of the peace, and 47 years a deacon of the church. He removed to Ohio. In 1770 the settlement was considerably augmented by emigrants from Massachusetts and Connecticut. About this time meetings were established for religious worship, but they had no regular preaching in town for several years. In 1771 the Rev. Abner Reene of Brattleboro married the first couple. (Peren Stockwell and Dinah Fay) in this town. The first death in town was that of James Ball, who died here in December, 1762.

EARLY SETTLERS.

Samuel Whitney, Jr., eldest son of Samuel J. of Shrewsbury, Mass., who in company with his brother Nathaniel came to Marlboro, March, 1770. He built a log house and moved his family from Shrewsbury to Marlboro, consisting of his wife and four children. He was resolute and fearless, was a great hunter; his dogs would tree a bear and he was sure of his prey. On one occasion his dogs had driven a bear into a den among the rocks, he ventured to look in, saw the glaring eyeballs very near him, started back, at which the bear sprang upon him; they took a fair hug and rolled from the rocks down the hill together. In the struggle the bear seized his opponent's leg in his jaws and made a frightful wound. The old hero's sons, Moses and Guilford, mere lads at the time, saw the perilous condition of their father but dared not fire lest they might shoot him; but they put on the dogs and urged them to the combat, whereupon the bear quit his hold to attack the dogs; and they improved their opportunity to shoot the bear. The old hunter was disabled a long time by the wound and carried the scar to the grave. In 1762 he married Phebe Harrington, of Grafton, Mass., and moved to Marlboro in the spring of 1770. He died Feb. 1, 1811, aged 71. She died March, 1812, aged 71.

Children: Catherine, m. Sam'l Pratt; Betsy, m. Alvin Pratt; Moses 1st, Moses 2d; and Guildford b. in Shrewsbury. The folloing in Marlboro: Sam'l, jr.; Mariam, m. Lyman Brown; Zenas; Simei, Phebe, m. Roswell Paddlford; Russell, b. May 21, 1789, d. May, 1790. In the fall of 1777, Capt Whitney had a fever by which he was confined many weeks. His family was out of fuel. As a last resort, Betty, 13 years of age, put on her father's leather apron, yoked up the oxen, went into the woods, cut small trees, snaked them to the house, and chopped them up into fire wood. That this was the custom of the handy child was narrated by her sister, Mrs. Brown.

WHITNEY,

Capt. Nath'l, son of Sam'l of Shrewsbury, Mass., when a young man of 20 years, with his brother, Sam'l, jr. was induced by the invitation of Col. Wm. Willkens to visit Marlboro in Nov. 1769. After spending a few days he returned to his parents and made a proposal to the young lady to whom he was afterwards married, whom he left a widow after over 50 years of married life. Mar., 1770, his father carred his sons, Samuel, jr. and Nath'l to Marlboro, left them and returned to Massachusetts.

Capt. Nath'l put up a log camp in the woods and commenced clearing. In this camp he spent his next two summers. He had to bring the meal on his back, 15 miles. Capt. Whitney built the first framed house in town which he occupied a few years and sold for Continental paper money. He suffered almost a total loss of his sale. In this impoverished condition, he began anew by purchasing of Chas. Phelps the whole right of No. 23, in 1777. The land adjoining he purchased of Perez Stockwell, where he again settled, thrive and spent his life. He was an influential citizen. As a hunter and a trapper no one excelled him.

From notes penned 40 years since by himself; "In the autumn of 1773, brother Samuel and myself are to go out hunting at the first suitable fall of snow. In November a few inches of snow had fallen, when I repaired to my brother and found him sick, feeling himself too feeble to engage in the chase. In the morning I took my brother's dog with my own, and went into the woods. Bear tracks were plenty; the dogs took one, but at night I returned to my brother, and found him not as well. In the morning I again took his dog and entered the forest. At that time all was a howling wilderness, without a single settlement. I took a westerly course, and saw a monstrous track of a bear, larger than I ever before saw. I returned to the house and persuaded brother Samuel to go and see it. We were both exceedingly surprised. We pursued it nearly to the top of the hill, in the west part of the town near Wilmington line. I let the dogs go. In a few minutes they entered a thicket and roared tremendously. I flung off my pack and pursued with all speed down the hill near Wilmington Pond to Deerfield river. The bear and dogs had crossed. By taking some pains I found a tree which had fallen across the stream, on which I found a safe passage, and soon discovered that Samuel's dog had treed the bear. I then levelled my gun and fired directly at his head. He dodged a little, came down, struck brother Samuel's dog with his paw and laid him stiff, and again ascended the tree. I fired the second time at his body. He instantly slid down the tree and moved off with two streams of blood flowing, one on each side. I shot at him the third time, and put the ball through his body. I shot the fourth ball through his middle, shot the 5th through his head and the bear yielded. Enormous creature. The bear was so heavy that in ascending and descending the tree, he tore his nails off to the very quick. The next day I succeeded in obtaining help in drawing the animal and carrying him home."

Capt. Whitney was fond of the exciting scenes of the hunter's life, even until his hair was whitened by age. In recounting his success as a sportsman, he said he thought, but could not tell exactly, that, he had killed not less than 100 bears, 100 deer, one moose and 14 wolves, to say nothing of the multitude of lighter game.

He was a staunch whig and took a decided stand for the Revolution. On hearing of the battle of Lexington (as before told) he and Capt. James Warren, took their muskets and started for the American camp. It will be remembered he was also on the guard over the Bennington prisoners, after that battle in which he shared. At the close of the campaign he returned to his family and his farm. He took a lively interest in the prosperity of the town also in the Congregational church of which he was a worthy member. His family has been widely dispersed. But few of their descendants remain to cherish their memory. Children: Capt. Nathaniel was b. May 30, 1749, m. TIMOTHY MATHEW.

In the spring of 1773, then a lad of 16, who was after promoted to the office of major, came from Suffield, Ct., selected 100 acres of land, built a log house and spent the summer clearing land, and in the fall returned to Suffield. In the spring of 1774 his parents and family came and settled with him in Marlboro, and secured the title to the 100 acres on which he had commenced improvements. His brother Phineas purchased 100 acres. They obtained the right of cutting a canal from a large natural pond and then erecting a dam with a gate, to draw water when needed. This was done at considerable expense, and the water was carried through the canal and the natural channel about a mile to their own lands, where there was a natural descent, and where it could be used to the best advantage. This mill site is now the best one in town. The two brothers by their industry and enterprise bought lands till they owned rights 13, 5, 4 and 12. The whole is now in the possession of the descendants, viz: General Phineas, Cotton, Dan and James P. Mathew.

In 1857 he gave his valuable mineralogical collection to Andover Theological Seminary, where he spent a few years in arranging it. In 1863 he presented to Middlebury College his library, where it is arranged in an alcove bearing his name. He was always an active laborer in the cause of education, a devotee to natural science, and earnest in his endeavor to win men to godliness.

EPHRIAM HOLLAND NEWTON, son of Marshall, of Newfane, who was son of Marshall of Shrewsbury, Mass., who was son of Obadiah, born 1702, who was son of Thomas, born 1674, who was the son of John, born August 20, 1641, who was son of Richard and Anna who came from England about 1635. Children: Laura, Almira and Charles Hernian, Clark, Mary A., Franklin, Dolly A., Catherine, Judah, Rufus, John, Elmira, Martha, Timothy and Sally. Laura his eldest daughter, born Feb. 7 1810, married first Mar. 25, 1828, Luman Stearns, who died June, 1830, age 23; she married second, Dec. 1833, Hosea Haskell of Wilmington; he died and she married third, Ebenezer Stone of Wilmington; he died and she married for her fourth husband, Alonzo Bugbee of Dover.

HENRY CLOSSON.

Henry Closson Jacobs, son of Enoch Jacobs, formerly of Marlboro, enlisted in May, 1861. He had not been absent two years when he fought his last battle. We need not speak of his deeds of personal bravery for he belonged to a regiment of heroes. In the battle of Winchester he escaped with two bullet holes in his coat. In another battle only one beside himself of all his company who were in the action escaped. At the battle of Cedar Creek the stock of his gun was shattered in his hands by a rebel shot. He was in the battle of Antietam and South Mountain and in over 20 skirmishes.

BOOMER JENKS, son of Joseph, b. in Scituate, R. I., Feb. 19, 1761, only child of his father by a second marriage to Mrs. Sarah King. Young Jenks at the age of 15 enlisted under the State authorities of Rhode Island as a soldier, and served three years in the Revolutionary war. The night he was 16 he stood sentry. He was a pensioner. Before the close of the war m. Anna King of R. I., b. Jan. 21, 1761, d. March 14, 1837. At the declaration of peace he found himself destitute but with a whole constitution. Came to Marlboro with his family and purchased 30 acres, to which he afterwards added ample additions; d. June 8, 1847, a. 86.

DEACON SYLVESTER BISHOP

came when a young man to this town from Brookfield, Mass., 1776, purchased right No. 9, lived on it till his death. In 1777, joined the regular army, was with the Green Mountains Boys in the battle of Hubbardton, and with John Marks of Burlington was taken prisoner, and incarcerated in Fort Ticonderoga. While there the prisoners were daily marched to Lake George and employed in the construction of forts built for the defense of the lake. One morning Bishop and Marks by previous engagement while on the march, stepped from the ranks into the bushes, hapily they were unnoticed by their guard. They secreted themselves in the woods till night, when they wandered over Mount Defiance to the western shore of the lake when fortunately they found a canoe in which they started for the Vermont shore. On approaching the center of the lake a gun was fired from one of the enemy's vessels of war, when they found themselves in the fog, almost under the mouth of the cannon. Unobserved, silently as possible they rowed to the N. Y. shore, which they reached, fastened their boat, and secreted in the rocks through the day. At night they succeeded in coming to the Vermont shore. They steered their course for Castleton and reported themselves to the wife of a fellow prisoner whom they had left in the fort. They were fed and sheltered through the day, and at night cautiously continued their journey through the forest; they reached Bennington on the morning of the Bennington battle. They procured each a musket and entered the ranks. After the battle they found among the prisoners the Ticonderoga guard from whom they had escaped. As they recognized each other Bishop said, "what, my boys, are you here?" "Yes! turn about is fair play." He married Deborah Barnes of Brookfield, Mass., and died Mar. 12, 1822, age 66. She died July 20, 1851, age 92; one child, Isaac born Feb. 15, 1802.

CAPT. ISAAC BISHOP, son of Sylvester, married Dec. 4, 1823. Susa, daughter of Captain Abraham Miller, died Dec. 29, 1860. Children 9.

AMOS PROUTY,

son of James, of Spencer, Mass., came to Marlboro about 1784; m. Phoebe, daughter of John Bartlett; settled on a farm which he cleared and where he lived the rest of his life. He was born 1766, d. 1841; she was born 1768, d. 1841. Children, 12.

Dolly, daughter of Capt. Nathaniel Whitney, m. Jan. 22, 1791, Levi Sawtell. Her children have had 48 children, and her grandchildren 48, making her mother to 10, grandmother to 48 and ancestral mother of 106 in her lifetime.

Jona. Underwood m. Hannah Richardson and moved from Suffield, Ct. to Marlboro in 1776. He died Oct. 1, 1794, age 79. She died Mar. 6, 1813, age 95.

Children: Jona. Underwood jr., married Deborah, daughter of Isaac Morgan, who was from Brinfield, Mass., and with her parents came to Marlboro. At the time of her wedding the snow was very deep and she with her bridegroom and another couple went several miles through the woods on show shoes to Col. Granger's where they were married. They had 9 children. He died Dec. 1801. She married second, Benjamin Lee of Vernon, Mar. 1815. After Mr. Lee's death she returned to Marlboro, and died, Jan. 18, 1830. Children by first marriage 9. Thaddeus, son of Jona. born in Suffield, Ct., came with his parents to Marlboro, at the age of 16 he married Mary Farr of Boylston, Mass., settled on the homestead where he lived, and died Sept. 1840, age 80. His widow died in Westminister; children, 10. Phineas Underwood and Sabra, early settlers, removed after a few years.

Capt. Jona. Warren son of Jona. came a young man to Marlboro, purchased and cleared the farm now owned by Lincoln Adams, on which he reared his family.

When the news of the Lexington battle reached Marlboro, he and Capt. Nathaniel Whitney shouldered their muskets and forthwith repaired to the opening scenes of the American Revolution and tendered their services. The same noble spirit was the prominent characteristic of the man in childhood and stayed throughout life. He lived to an advanced age. For his first wife he married Huldah, daughter of Joseph Winchester, sr. She died in early life. He married second, Sarah Sawtell of Phillipston, Mass. Children, by first marriage; Lucy, who married Daniel Higby for her first husband and Royal Knights for her second; children by second marriage, Jona., born May 10, 1779, died Dec. 25, 1844, in Brooklyn, N. Y. Sarah, died unmarried, in Bath, N. Y. Huldah, born Dec. 1783, died in Bath, N. Y. Susan, born Feb. 20. 1786, married David Adams.

Thomas, son of Capt. Jona., married Polly Knight, sister of Royal. Children: Dwight, Phineas, Gratia Knight, Dunford. Jona. jr., son of Capt. Jona, married Sarah, daughter of Thomas Adams, 1807. She died 1838; children: Clark, Barnard, Adams, Almon F., Lucy, Emily, Louisa. The three youngest brothers reside in Brooklyn, noted for their mechanical talents, and as self-made mechanics in the invention and manufacture of their own tools.

They commenced business without capital and invented and manufactured a variety of diamond pointed tools by which they have admirably succeeded in establishing for themselves the reputation of business men.

NEWFANE.

HISTORICAL ADDRESS

OF THE HON. CHARLES K. FIELD, DELIVERED AT THE CENTENNIAL ANNIVERSARY OF THE ORGAN-IZATION OF THE CHURCH AND TOWN OF NEWFANE,
JULY 4TH, 1874.

Newfane, the shire town of Windham County, is situated eleven miles west of Connecticut river, and is bounded north by Townshend, east by Dummerston, Putney and Brookline, west by Wardsboro and Dover, and south by Marlboro. The township contained originally within its chartered limits thirty-six square miles; but, in 1820, that part of the town lying northeast of West river was annexed to Brookline, which materially reduced the chartered area of the town. The original charter of the town was granted in 1753, by Benning Wentworth, governor of New Hampshire, to Abner Sawyer and others, by the name of Fane. There was a current tradition, seventy years ago, that it was called Fane after Thomas Fane, one of the "men of Kent," who was engaged in an insurrectionary movement under Sir Thomas Wyatt, in 1554, during the reign of Queen Mary, for the purpose of elevating Lady Jane Grey to the throne, in consequence of the odious Spanish match which Mary had formed with Philip 2d. Abner Sawyer and sixty-five others were the original grantees of Fane. Their names were as follows:

In 1761 the charter was returned to Governor Wentworth, and a new one issued to Luke Brown and his associates, containing the same provisions that are embraced in the original charter. The 11th day of May, 1772, the governor of New York made a grant of this township, by the name of Newfane, to Walter Franklin and twenty others, most of whom resided in the city of New York. This New York charter is a literal copy of the original charter granted by Governor Wentworth. The 12th of May, 1772, Walter Franklin and his associates, the grantees named in the New York charter, assigned and conveyed all their right in said township to Luke Knowlton and John Taylor, Esqs., of Worcester County, Mass. The titles to the lands in said township are derived directly from the New York charter. The township was surveyed in 1772, and duly organized May 17, 1774. The town was first settled in 1766, by Jonathan Park, Nathaniel Stedman and Ebenezer Dyer, who emigrated from Worcester County, Mass. The first clearing was made by Park and Stedman on the Nathan Merrifield farm, north of the Newfane Hill Common, in the spring of 1766. In 1774, Judge Knowlton, one of the original proprietors under the New York charter, was allowed some 300 or 400 acres in and about the present site of Fayetteville.

Deacon Park's clearing covered the old common on Newfane Hill and the Knowlton farm. Judge Knowlton exchanged his lands in and about Fayetteville with Deacon Park for his clearing of eighty acres and a log cabin thereon. The deacon went down and cleared up the land in and about Fayetteville. In 1787, the judge succeeded in removing the shire from Westminster to Newfane Hill; but in 1824—thirty-seven years thereafter—the shire was removed from the Hill to Fayetteville. Had Judge Knowlton made his pitch upon the lots originally allotted to him on Smith's Brook, and contributed as liberally towards the growth and prosperity of a village where Fayetteville now is, it would have changed materially the destiny of Newfane. Starting, a hundred years ago, a settlement where Fayetteville now stands, with no rival villages near, it would have secured such a concentration of wealth and business as would have made it one of the most important villages in the county. For several years the early settlers suffered all the hardships and privations incident to the settlement of a new country. Without roads, or teams, or any of the ordinary means of transportation, they were under the necessity of conveying, by their own personal efforts, all their provisions and farming tools from Hinsdale, N. H.—a distance of twenty miles—through an unbroken forest. At that early day there was no road or pathway up the valley of the West river, from Brattleboro; but they were obliged to cross Wicopee Hill, in Dummerston by marked trees. Elizabeth, a child of Jonathan Park, was the first child born in town,—February 20th, 1768.

INDIANS.

The early settlers of Newfane were never molested by the Indians, for the reason that no permanent settlements were made in this town until after the storming and taking of Quebec by Wolf, in 1759, and the capitulation of Montreal in 1760, when the French lost their control over the Indian tribes in the Canadas. June 27, 1748, before any settlement was commenced, a battle was fought in the south part of this town or north part of Marlboro; the precise place of the battle cannot be fixed. Captain Humphrey Hobbs, with forty men, was ordered from Charlestown, No. 4, through the forest to Fort Shirley, in Heath, one of the frontier posts in Massachusetts. The march was made without interruption until Hobbs arrived at a point about twelve miles northwest of Fort Dummer, "on a low piece of ground covered with alders intermixed with larger trees, and watered by a rivulet," where he halted to give his men an opportunity to refresh themselves. A large body of Indians, commanded by a half-breed of the name of Sackett, who was said to have been a descendant of a captive taken at Westfield, Mass., discovered Hobbs' trail, and endeavored to cut him off. Hobbs had carefully posted a guard on his trail, and, while his men were refreshing themselves, the enemy came up and drove in the guard. Hobbs then arranged his men for action, each man selecting his tree for a cover. The enemy rushed forward, and received a well-directed fire from Hobbs' men, which checked their progress. A severe conflict ensued. Sackett and Hobbs were well known to each other, and both were distinguished for their intrepidity and courage. Sackett could speak English, and frequently called upon Hobbs to surrender, threatening to sacrifice his men with the tomahawk if he refused. Hobbs, in a loud voice, returned a defiant answer, and dared his enemy to put his threat in execution. The action continued about four hours, each party retaining their original position. During the fight the enemy would approach Hobb's line, but were immediately driven back. Sackett, finding his men had suffered severely, retreated, carrying off his dead and wounded. Hobbs lost only three of his men—Ebenezer Mitchell, Eli Scott and Samuel Green; and three were wounded. The loss of the enemy was supposed to be greater. In all battles the Indians made extraordinary efforts to conceal their loss, and to effect this would incur greater exposure than in actual combat. When one fell, the nearest comrade was accustomed to crawl up and, under cover of the trees and brush, fix a "tump line" to the dead body and cautiously drag it to the rear. Hobb's men stated that in this action they often saw the dead bodies of the Indians sliding along the ground as if by enchantment. As late as the year 1810, a large number of graves were visible on the lower portion of the Robinson flats, so-called, under a cluster of chestnut trees, near the South branch below Williamsville, where the bodies of the Indians who were killed in this fight were supposed to have been buried; at least, such was the current tradition for fifty years or more among the early settlers of Newfane. Stevens, in his journal, states that Capt. Hobbs started for Fort Shirley from Charlestown, No. 4, with forty-two men, officers included, on Thursday, June 23, 1748, and camped the first night at Bel-lows Falls, and the next day marched for West river, which they reached Saturday, 25th; "Then traveled down the river and came to the South branch, then traveled up the branch two miles and camped, then traveled six miles southwest, and came to a small brook, where we boiled our kettles, and just as we began to eat, the enemy came upon us." The late General Field, who furnished a sketch of Newfane for Thompson's Gazetteer, about fifty years ago, was evidently misled by the prevailing traditions in relation to the fight with the Indians by Melvin's party, for he fixed the scene of the battle at the mouth of the South branch, in Newfane; and Belknap, in his history of New Hampshire, and Beckley, in his history of Vermont, adopt the same error. The publication of Capt. Melvin's journal, in the New Hampshire historical collections, fixes the place of the fight with Melvin's party in Jamaica, some seventeen miles above the mouth of the South Branch in Newfane, and about four miles below the mouth of Winhall river, which, during the old French wars, was regarded as the upper fork of West river, and the South branch in Newfane as the lower fork thereof. After the fight with Hobbs, Sackett retreated and passed down the Wantastiquet to its mouth, and crossing the Connecticut, marched down to a point opposite Fort Drummer, where they ambushed a party of seventeen men who were marching from Hinsdale to the fort, under command of Ensign Thomas Taylor, and killed four of the party. Four escaped, and the remainder, with Ensign Taylor, were taken prisoners. Ensign Taylor, in a journal describing his march to Canada, which he wrote after his return, describes his route to Crown Point, on Lake Champlain, as follows: "Crossed the Connecticut at a place called 'Catts-bane,' two or three miles above the mouth of West river, which, which we fell in with at the lower fork; thence proceeded up that river, part of the way on the flats, over the ground where Capt. Melvin's affair happened, three or four miles below the upper fork; thence to the source of the river." This would seem to settle the question conclusively, that the fight with Melvin's party took place some two hundred rods northeast of Jamaica village, on the banks of West river. At the commencement of this century, the graves on the Robinson meadow, about one hundred rods below Williamsville, near the left bank of the South branch, were plainly to be seen; and the writer of this remembers when a boy, as late as 1812, two graves were distinctly visible on Newfane hill, and the current tradition was that two scouts from Fort Dummer were at one time engaged in shooting salmon at the mouth of the South branch, and being driven by the Indians to the summit of Newfane hill, were killed, and afterwards buried about sixty rods northwest of the site of the old court house. The theories of Beckley, Belknap, and others, in relation to the origin of the graves on the Robinson meadow and on Newfane hill, are all contradicted by the journals of Melvin and Stevens. The ploughshare has long since rudely obliterated every trace of their existence.

RIVERS.

The Wantastiquet, commonly called West river, rises in Weston, Windsor county, and, passing through Newfane, empties into the Connecticut at Brattleboro. The South branch, so-called, rises in Dover, and, after receiving a number of tributary streams, passes through the southerly part of the town and empties into the West river near the eastern boundary line of said town. Baker's brook, a tributary of the South branch, rises in Wardsboro, and empties into the South branch at Williamsville. Smith's brook rises in Wardsboro, and, running through the entire northerly part of the town, empties into West river, two miles below Fayetteville. These streams afford many eligible mill sites and water privileges.

SOIL.

The intervals afford excellent tillage land, and the uplands are inferior to none in the state for grazing. The town is diversified with high hills and deep valleys; but there are no elevations that deserves the name of mountains; there is little or no broken or waste land that is unsuitable for cultivation.

GEOLOGY AND MINERALOGY.

The geological character of the town is uniformly primitive; few continuous ranges can be traced with certainty. The rocks in place are principally mica slate and horn-blende. Granite is by no means an uncommon rock; boulders and rolled masses of granite are scattered in profusion over every part of the town, and sometimes they are found on the summits of the highest hills which are composed entirely of mica slate. These boulders by skillful splitting, are wrought into fence-posts and building-stone. Horn-blende is a very common rock; it forms a range which extends through the entire town. It is the variety called horn-blende slate, and is often curiously curved and twisted, and occasionally passes into primitive greenstone and greenstone porphyry. Mica slate is the most common rock in town, yet no connected range can be traced. It forms the summits and frequently the sides of the hills, and in the valleys it is a common rock; but horn-blende is constantly thrusting itself from underneath the mica slate, and interrupting the continuity of its ranges. In the north part of the town are extensive strata of mica slate, which are occasionally quarried and wrought into flagging stones. Talcose slate better deserves the name of a range than any other in town. It traverses the whole county, passing through Whitingham, Wilmington, Marlboro, Newfane, Townshend, Windham, Athens and Grafton. In Grafton, Athens and Townshend it is extensively quarried, and wrought into fire-jams, etc. There is an extensive bed of this rock in the west part of Newfane, bordering on Wardsboro and Dover, which, at some future day will be successfully wrought, whenever the railroad facilities shall be such as to furnish a cheap mode of conveyance to market. Serpentine associated with talcose slate forms a range extending four or five miles on the western border of the town, presenting perpendicular precipices in some places forty or fifty feet in height. The crystalline appearance of this rock demonstrates it to be of the most primitive kind. Its texture is close, and it is extremely tough and hard, though in some cases it is easily broken on account of the fissures that pass through it. Chloride slate occurs in this town, in which is embedded splendid specimens of garnet. A nugget of native gold, weighing eight and one-half ounces, was found in this town in 1827, about one hundred rods east of the village of Williamsville. It was of a conical shape, and there were adhering to it a number of small crystals of quartz. It was found in alluvion consisting of thin strata of sand, clay and water-worn stones. The rocks in situ are all of a primitive class, consisting of horn-blende, horn-blende slate and greenstone porphyry, which are often found alternating with mica slate. At the time this mass of gold was found, it was supposed to have been a piece that was accidentally lost by a band of counterfeiters, who formerly resided in the immediate neighborhood, although their operations were confined exclusively to the counterfeiting of silver coin. Gold at that time had not been discovered elsewhere in New England; but since then its discovery at Somerset, Plymouth, Bridgewater, and other places in Vermont, seemed to favor the theory that it existed originally in the bed of serpentine and talcose slate in the west part of the town, near the head waters of the South Branch, and was swept out of place by some freshet and deposited in the alluvion some six miles below. All the gold which has thus far been found in Vermont has been associated with the serpentine and talcose slate range, which extends from Massachusetts north line to Canada. This town probably furnishes the richest and most extensive variety of minerals of any town in the State.

THE BURNING OF THE SAWTELL FAMILY.

A melancholy catastrophe occurred in this town on the night of the 2d of February, 1782, in the burning of the log house of Henry Sawtell, which created great sorrow, bordering upon terror, in the minds of the inhabitants of the vicinity, for the house was not only burned, but Mr. and Mrs. Sawtell and five children were consumed therein. The morning after the fire the neighbors saw a cloud of smoke gathered over the Sawtell place, and smelt an unusual odor in the air like burning flesh and clothing. The site of the house was hidden from the view of all the neighboring inhabitants, being situated in a deep valley; but as they approached the ruins they discovered, to their great horror and astonishment, the Sawtell house in ashes. Some of the larger logs were still burning, and the charred bodies of Mr. and Mrs. Sawtell and five of their children were smouldering in the ruins. They gathered up, with pious care, the charred remains of the family, placed them in a coffin, and a public funeral was holden at the center of the town on the fourth, when a great crowd of people from the town and vicinity were assembled, and an appropriate sermon was preached by Rev. Hezekiah Taylor, the pastor of the church. From an old copy of his sermon, in the possession of the writer of this sketch, it appears that he exhorted his hearers not to construe this painful and violent death of a whole family as a judgment of God by reason of any great or unusual wickedness, for the manner of a person's death was no evidence of his righteousness or sinfulness before God. He appealed in pathetic and eloquent terms to the neighbors and townsmen of the deceased family, to take warning by this terrible and appalling calamity to be "always ready," for they know not at what hour the Lord would come, "whether at the second or third watch, whether at nightfall or at midnight." Mr. Henry Sawtell and his wife came to Newfane about 1774, and began the clearing of a new farm at a point midway between Newfane Hill and Williamsville. He was highly esteemed for his integrity. His wife was regarded as a pious, amiable woman, an exemplary, affectionate mother. After having undergone the hardships and vicissitudes attending the commencement of a new settlement, though not wealthy, Mr. Sawtell was in comfortable circumstances, and contemplated the erection of a more convenient and suitable dwelling for his family. But fate had decreed "that but for a little time" and they would need no earthly dwelling.

THE OLD SHIRE VILLAGE.

In the early settlement of the town, a village grew up on the summit of a hill, which rose like a cone in the center of the town, and in 1787 Newfane was constituted the shire town of Windham county, and the courts were removed from Westminster to Newfane Hill, so called. From 1790 to 1820, the village consisted of a court house, jail, meeting house, academy, three stores, two hotels, a variety of shops, such as were found in all New England villages at an early day, and about twenty private residences. The village stood upon the summit of the hill, and afforded a prospect as extensive and picturesque as any in New England. From the summit, near the meeting house, might be seen not less than fifty townships, lying in Vermont, New Hampshire and Massachusetts. On the west, Haystack in Wilmington, and Manicknug in Stratton, towered above the ridge of the Green mountains which formed the western boundary of the county. On the north, Ascutney was plainly visible to the naked eye, and on a clear summer day, the White Hills in New Hampshire could be distinctly seen by the aid of a telescope. The Highlands of New Hampshire and Massachusetts, extending for a distance of more than eighty miles from Sunnapee to Holyoke, were distinctly visible on the east, while Monadnock and Wachusett, with their cloud-capped summits, seemed to mingle with the heavens; and along the margin of the horizon to the southeast, little was to be seen but a broad sea of mountain tops, displaying, in wild disorder, ridge above ridge, and peak above peak, until the distant view was lost among the clouds.

SITE OF THE NEW SHIRE.

In 1825, the site of the public buildings were changed from Newfane Hill to what is now called Fayetteville, a village two miles east of the old centre in the valley of the Wantastiquet or West river. The present site of the shire is three miles east of the geographical centre of the county, and one mile south of the centre of population. It is easy of access from all parts of the country. A new court house and jail were erected at an expense of $10,000. In 1853, by act of the General Assembly, commissioners were appointed, who altered and improved the public buildings at a cost of $13,000. After the removal of the shire from the hill to the valley below, the owners of the real estate on the hill commenced removing their buildings to Fayetteville and Williamsville, the two villages that have sprung up since the removal of the public buildings, and as late as 1860 not a building remained to mark the pleasant site of the old shire of Windham county. Fayetteville, the present site of the shire, has entirely grown up since 1825.

TOWN CLERKS.

The following is a list of the town clerks from the first organization of the town, in 1774, to the present time:

Luke Knowlton, from 1774 to 1783; Hezekiah Boyden, from 1783 to 1784; Luke Knowlton, 1784 to 1789; Calvin Knowlton, from 1789 to 1792; Nathan Stone, from 1792 to 1834; Joseph Ellis, from 1834 to 1836; William H. Hodges, from 1836 to 1839; Otis Warren, from 1839 to 1867; Marshall Newton, from 1867 to 1868; Dennis A. Dickenson, from 1868—.

REPRESENTATIVES TO THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY.

Ebenezer Myrick, 1779; William Ward, 1780; Ebenezer Myrick, 1781; Daniel Taylor, 1782; William Ward, 1783; Luke Knowlton, 1784-5; Wm. Ward, 1786-7; Luke Knowlton, 1788-9; Calvin Knowlton, 1790-91; Luke Knowlton, 1792; Moses Kenny, 1793; Ebenezer Allen, 1794 to 1804; Luke Knowlton, 1805-6; Elijah Elmer, 1807; Joseph Ellis, 1808-9; Martin Field, 1810; Sylvanus Sherwin, 1811; Luke Knowlton, 1812-13; John Brooks, 1814; Luke Knowlton, 1815; Sylvanus Sherwin, 1816; Horace Dunham, 1817; Luke Knowlton, 1818; Martin Field, 1819; Sylvanus Sherwin, 1820; Martin Field, 1821; Sylvanus Sherwin, 1822; Jason Duncan, 1823-4; Sylvanus Sherwin, 1825; William H. Williams, 1826; D. W. Sanborn, 1827; Sylvanus Sherwin, 1828; Joseph Ellis, 1829-30; Henry Wheelock, 1831-2; George Williams, 1833-4; Roswell M. Field, 1835-6; James Elliott, 1837-8; Walter Eager, 1839; Nahum Eager, 1840-1; Walter Eager, 1842; Otis Warren, 1843-4; Oliver P. Morse, 1845; no representative in 1846; Marshall Newton, 1847; George Arnold, 1848; Sir Isaac Newton, 1849-50; F. O. Burditt, 1851-2; Chas. K. Field, 1853-4-5; Marshall Newton, 1856; Otis Warren, 1857; Emory Wheelock, 1858; Otis Warren, 1859; Charles K. Field, 1860; O. L. Sherman, 1861-2; A. J. Morse, 1863-4; H. T. Robinson, 1865-6; John Rice, 1867; Holland Plimpton, 1868; E. P. Wheeler, 1869; Dana D. Dickinson, 1870-72; Alvin B. Franklin, 1874-76; John H. Merrifield, 1878-80; M. O. Howe, 1882; Alvin B. Franklin, 1884; Charles E. Sparks, 1886; Albert T. Warren, 1888; Chester E. Perry, 1890.

PERVERSION OF LEGAL MAXIMS.

By a strange perversion of legal principles, which prevailed among the early settlers of Windham county, it was supposed that whoever married a widow who was administratrix upon the estate of her deceased husband represented insolvent, and should thereby possess himself of any property or thing which had been purchased by the deceased husband, would become an executor de son tort, and would thereby make himself liable to answer for the goods and estate of his predecessor. To avoid this difficulty, Major Moses Joy, of Putney, who became enamored of Mrs. Hannah Ward of Newfane, the widow of William Ward, who died about 1788 leaving an insolvent estate, of which Mrs. Ward was administratrix, and married her within three months after taking out letters of administration. The marriage took place in the old Field Mansion on Newfane Hill, February 22, A. D. 1789, and was solemnized by Rev. Hezekiah Taylor. Mrs. Ward placed herself in a closet, with a tire-woman, who stripped her of all her clothing, and while in a perfectly nude state, she thrust her fair, round arm through a diamond hole in the door of the closet, and the gallant major clasped the hand of the widow, and was married in due form by the jolliest parson in Vermont. At the close of the ceremony, the tire-woman dressed the bride in a complete wardrobe which the major had provided and caused to be deposited in the closet at the commencement of the ceremony. She came out elegantly dressed in silk, satin and lace. A similar marriage took place in Westminster, in this county. See Hall's History of Eastern Vermont, page 585.

An instance, illustrating the strange perversion of legal maxims which prevailed among our ancestors at an early day, fell under the observation of the writer of this sketch. The Hon. Luke Knowlton, Sen., died December 12, 1810, and, at the time of his decease, there were many unsatisfied judgments existing against him. The morning after his decease, a creditor who had obtained a judgment of about forty dollars, applied to the late General Field, his attorney, for an execution with which he could seize the body and commit it to prison, hoping thereby to wring the amount thereof from the relatives and friends of the debtor. But the attorney refused to have an execution issued, insisting that it would be regarded as an outrage to take the dead body of a debtor and commit the same to prison. The prevailing notion at that time was that inasmuch as the execution run against the body, that the officer might take the body of the debtor, whether dead or alive, and commit the same to the common jail. The same notion prevailed in England as late as 1816. The creditors of the eloquent Richard Brinsley Sheridan, just before his decease, in July, 1816, became so clamorous that they caused a sheriff's officer to arrest the dying man in his bed and was about to carry him off in his blankets to a sponging house, when the attending physician interfered, and by representing to the officer the responsibility he must incur, if, as was too probable, his prisoner should expire on the way, succeeded in averting the outrage.

In the Vermont Republican, printed at Brattleboro, in July, 1855, a story is told of a custom which prevailed in this county at an early day, of holding even the dead body of a debtor liable to arrest, and that a case occurred in the town of Dummerston, when a dead body was arrested on its way to the grave and detained until some of the friends "backed the writ," and thus became bail for the debtor's appearance at court. As the return day of the writ was put far ahead the defendant was in no condition to appear and consequently "lurched his bail." In 1820 Dr. John Campbell of Putney, had obtained a judgment against Anthony Jones and Joel Lee, upon a jail bond executed by Jones and Lee. By virtue of an execution issued upon said judgment, Lee was arrested and confined in the common jail, on Newfane Hill, and under the law which prevailed in this State at that time he was not entitled to the privilege of the jail yard, but was subjected to close confinement. He died within the prison, in the summer of 1820, and his son requested the privilege of taking his body away for the purpose of burying it in the cemetery at Brookline, with his relatives and friends, but the jailer refused to permit the body to be taken away; insisting if he permitted the body to be removed it would be regarded as an escape, and he and his bail would be made liable to satisfy the original judgment, and not until the creditors had consented, would the jailor permit the body to be removed.

THE WHIPPING POST.

At an early day corporal punishments were inflicted at every term of the Court on Newfane Hill. The writer of this sketch, when a mere boy, well remembers witnessing the whipping of old Mother White, of Wardsboro, in August, 1807. She was convicted of passing counterfeit money, and sentenced to receive thirty-nine lashes upon her bare back. A great crowd of men and women collected to witness the whipping. The Post was in the form of a cross, with a transverse strip near the top, to which her bare arms were bound, and her body was stripped to the waist. The High Sheriff applied a certain number of stripes, and the balance were allotted to his Deputies, some seven in number, and some of whom applied the blows with great vigor. Near the close of the whipping her back became raw, and she suffered excessive pain and she shrieked and screamed terribly in her agony. The writer of this sketch, although very young, remembers the scene distinctly. The Meeting House and Academy stood a few rods above the site of the Whipping Post, and their windows were filled with women, gazing intently upon the revolting scene. This was probably the last woman publicly whipped in Vermont, for the Legislature abolished the Whipping Post that fall and provided for the building of a State Prison at Windsor.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

HON. LUKE KNOWLTON, was born in Shrewsbury, Mass., Nov. 4, 1738. He served as a soldier in the old French War, and in 1759 was stationed at Crown Point awhile, and suffered great hardships during his march from Crown Point to Charlestown, No. 4. From a journal he kept during his service as a soldier, we learn that his company, in marching through the wilderness, exhausted their stock of provisions and were obliged to kill a pack-horse to save themselves from starvation. He married Sarah, daughter of Ephriam Holland, of Shrewsbury, Mass., January 5, 1760, and with his family moved to Newfane in Feb. 1773, which was the fourteenth family that settled in town. He continued to reside in this town until his death, which occurred Dec. 12, 1810, at the age of 73 years. His wife died Sept. 1, 1797. He was chosen first Town Clerk, at the organization of the town in 1774, and continued to hold that position for fourteen years. He was Town Representative in the General Assembly of the State of Vermont during the years 1784, 85, 88, 89, 92, 1803 and 1806, and a member of the old Council from 1790 to 1800; Judge of the Supreme Court in 1786 and a Judge of the Windham County Court from 1787 to 1793.

He was a Loyalist, and in consequence of the great sacrifices he made in behalf of the British Government, in the early part of the Revolutionary war, he received a large and valuable grant of land in Lower Canada, upon a part of which the present town of Sherbrooke is built.

Previous to the year 1784 Judge Knowlton gave in his adherence to the government of Vermont, and voluntarily became a citizen of the State. He was liberal and generous to the poor, entered heartily and zealously into all the public enterprises of the day, gave to the County of Windham the land for a common on Newfane hill, at the time of the removal of the shire from Westminster to Newfane, and contributed largely towards the erection of the first Court House and Jail in Newfane. His family consisted of seven children, three sons and four daughters, as follows:

Calvin, born in 1761, died January 20, 1800; a graduate of Dartmouth college, class of 1783; married Sophia Willard, of Petersham, Mass., in 1793; studied law and practised his profession in Newfane until he died. Patty, born in 1762, died in Ohio in 1814. She married Daniel Warner, and was the grandmother of Hon. Willard Warner, late United States Senator from Alabama, and a member of General Sherman's staff in his celebrated "March to the Sea." Silas, born 1764, married Sarah Holbrook at Newfane, November 30, 1786, died in Canada aged eighty. Sarah, born May 2, 1767, married John Holbrook at Newfane, November 30, 1786. She died March 22, 1851. Alice married Nathan Stone April 24, 1788. She died November 14, 1865. Lucinda, born August 8, 1771, married Samuel Willard. They lived awhile in Sheldon, Vt.; from thence they removed to Canada where she died, May 4, 1800.

Luke Knowlton, jr., was born in Newfane, March 24, 1775; died at Broome township, Canada East, September 17, 1855, aged eighty. Luke Knowlton's grandsons were men of marked ability, among whom were Paul Holland Knowlton, Broome township, Lower Canada, son of Silas Knowlton, who occupied distinguished political positions in the province, and was for many years a member of the Canadian Parliament; Rev. John C. Holbrook, of Syracuse, N. Y., an eloquent divine, highly esteemed for his piety and learning; Hon. Willard Warner, of Alabama; Hon. George W. Knowlton, of Watertown N. Y.; Hon. Frederick Holbrook, of Brattleboro, who for two years during the War of the Rebellion, was Governor of the State of Vermont, and who in the discharge of his official duties exercised the prudence and discretion, united with the energy and ability which characterized his worthy ancestor, the subject of this notice.

REV. HEZEKIAH TAYLOR,

the first pastor of the Congregational church in Newfane was born in Grafton, Mass., in 1748; graduated at Harvard college in 1770, and was settled as pastor of the Congregational church in Newfane the 30th day of June, 1774. The church was organized the same day of his settlement, and at that time there were but fourteen families in the town, and the church consisted of only nine members. He died August 23, 1814. He was possessed of a firm and vigorous constitution, of great endurance, an indomitable will, and a resolution unshaken by the care of his flock and the labor and hardship incident to the early settlement of the town. Possessing habits of great industry, with a liberal education, and a disposition of great kindness and benevolence toward all with whom he was connected, he faithfully ministered to the spiritual and temporal wants of his people. Of an exceedingly genial temperament, overflowing with wit and humor, he was the delight and ornament of the social circle. His efforts and example contributed eminently to the happiness and prosperity of the early inhabitants of the town.

HON. EBENEZER ALLEN

was born in Medway, Mass., 1758; removed to Newfane in 1785. He represented the town in the General Assembly, for ten years, from 1794 to 1804. He was for a time a Judge of the County Court, also a Judge of Probate for the District of Marlboro, and was actively engaged in public business until his death December 16, 1805. He was an enterprising, active, and eminently practical man, and highly esteemed for his patriotism and public spirit.

REV. AARON CROSBY.

Born in Shrewsbury, Mass., November 27, 1744; graduated at Harvard in 1770, married Mary Taylor, sister of Rev. Hezekiah Taylor, August 22, 1774. His family resided in Newfane from 1774 until his death, in 1824, with the exception of the term of his pastorate over the church in Dunmerston, Vt., from 1784 to 1804. He died January 13, 1824. He was for many years a missionary among the Indians on the head waters of the Susquehanna. He acted under the patronage of a society in Scotland. The war of the Revolution interrupted his labors and compelled him to return to New England.

WARD EAGER.

BY HIS GRANDDAUGHTER, MRS. FANNY A. BAKER, OF PUTNEY, VERMONT.

The subject of our sketch, son of Bezaleel and Persis Eager, was born in Northboro, Mass., April, 1750. His mother's maiden name was Ward, and she was related to the Wards of Worcester County, Mass., who distinguished themselves in the war of the Revolution by their patriotism and loyalty. He came to Newfane about the time of the commencement of the war, in which he served awhile as a soldier. He was engaged in the battles of Bennington and Saratoga, but the perils he encountered and the hardships he endured he never communicated to his family in after years, for he was excessively modest and taciturn, and never talked of himself. The musket and cartridge box he bore at the battle of Bennington and the taking of Burgoyne at Saratoga, he retained with scrupulous care until his decease. He came to Newfane when it was little more than a wilderness, and when the land he purchased was a dense forest. He married a Mrs. Abigail Pike, a widow lady, whose maiden name was Holland.

He cherished a passionate fondness for mathematical studies, particularly geometry, and for many years was the only practical surveyor in the town and vicinity. He took a lively interest in the study of astronomy, and prepared the astronomical calculations for two or three almanacs. The only office he was ever known to accept was that of Town Treasurer, which he held for many years. He was reticent, taciturn and generally regarded as unsocial, for he loved seclusion and quiet, and much preferred his books to a free social intercourse with his neighbors, or the society of the many cultivated men for which the town was distinguished at an early day. He was a member of the Congregational church, although he differed with his bretheren upon the subject of baptism. It is said of him that without consulting his family or friends he quietly rode away one Sabbath morning into a neighboring town and received the ordinance of baptism by immersion, and the fact was studiously concealed from his family for a long time. Quietly and serenely, in the retirement he so much loved and coveted, his days passed away until his life had reached almost four score years, when he died, March 24, 1824. He left at his death three sons and three daughters.

His sons, Benjamin, Nahum, and Walter, were prominent men in town, distinguished for their enterprise, probity and practical good sense. Nahum and Walter Eager represented the town two years, respectively, in the General Assembly of this State, and for more than thirty years they filled many of the most responsible offices in town.

GEN. MARTIN FIELD, was born in Leavitt, Mass., February 12, 1773; graduated at Williams College in 1798, and received the honorary degree of A. M. from Dartmouth College in 1805. He studied law with his uncle, Lucius Hubbard, Esq., of Chester, Vt., and upon the decease of Calvin Knowlton, in 1800, and at the special instance and request of Hon. Luke Knowlton, he came to Newfane in January, 1800, and entered upon the practice of law. He married Esther Smith Kellogg, daughter of Daniel Kellogg, of Amherst, Mass., February 21, 1802, an accomplished lady of fine personal appearance, of great goodness and exemplary piety. He was indebted, in a great measure, for his success in life to her great industry, prudence and discretion. She died June 6, 1867, aged 88 years, surviving her husband thirty-four years. He was full of anecdotes, and could tell a story with inimitable grace. His forensic efforts abounded with flashes of wit and occasional bursts of caustic sarcasm and biting ridicule, which he could use with great skill and effect. These peculiar powers rendered him a popular and distinguished jury advocate. He was eminently successful in his profession, and for nearly thirty years enjoyed a large and lucrative practice, which he was compelled to abandon by reason of his excessive deafness. On relinquishing his practice he commenced the study of Geology and Mineralogy, and by great perseverance and industry he collected what, at that time, was regarded as the rarest and most extensive cabinet of minerals in the State. A few years since it was generously given to Middlebury College by his widow, Mrs. E. S. Field. He was, for ten years, State's Attorney for Windham county, and repeatedly represented the town of Newfane in the General Assembly and Constitutional Conventions. In 1819 he was elected Major General of the first division of the Vermont militia.

He died at his residence in Fayetteville, October 3d, A. D. 1833, aged 60 years.

ROSWELL MARTIN FIELD,

son of Gen. Martin Field, was born in Newfane, February 22, 1807, died at St. Louis, Mo., July 12, 1869. He fitted for college with Rev. Luke Whitcomb, of Townshend,

Vt., and entered Middlebury college in the autumn of 1818, at eleven years of age. Graduating in 1822, he studied law with Hon. Daniel Kellogg, of Rockingham, Vt., and was admitted to practice in September, 1825, at eighteen years of age. He practiced law in Windham county from 1825 to 1839, when he removed to St. Louis, where he remained until his death. He represented the town of Newfane in the General Assembly of this State during the years 1835 and 1836. He was elected State's Attorney for Windham county in 1832, 1833, 1834 and 1835. While a member of the Legislature in 1835, he wrote an able report in favor of abrogating the rule of the common law excluding atheists from giving testimony in courts of justice. The proposition failed of adoption, but in 1851 it was renewed by Hon. Loyal C. Kellogg, of Benson, then a member of the House of Representatives, and passed into a law. Since that period, "no person is deemed incompetent as a witness in any court matter or proceeding on account of his opinions on matters of religious belief." The special pleas which he drew and filed in the libel suit of Torrey vs. Field, reported in the tenth volume of Vermont reports, were declared by Judge Story to be masterpieces of special pleading. He was a finished scholar, and read Greek, Latin, French, German and Spanish, besides having an extensive acquaintance with English literature and general science. He could speak with greater facility, not only French but German. It was as a lawyer that he won his great distinction. When he went to St. Louis, in 1839, he had to contend with such men as Benton, Gamble and Bates. To none of these was he second in legal attainments, sound judgment and keen foresight. As an advocate he was eloquent, and as a lawyer, learned. His first distinction at the bar was obtained in cases involving the intricate old Spanish claims, which he mastered at an early day. His opinions always had great weight in the Superior Courts of the State, and at the time of his decease, he was esteemed as the ablest lawyer at the Missouri bar. He gained a national reputation in the famous Dred Scott case, which he started and carried on until the appeal was entered in the United States Supreme Court, when he turned it over to Montgomery Blair, then residing at Washington. In the dark days of the rebellion, during the years 1861 and 1862, when the friends of the Union in St. Louis and Missouri felt that they were in imminent danger of being driven from their homes and their estates confiscated by rebels and traitors, Gen. Lyon, Gen. Blair, and R. M. Field were among the calm, loyal and patriotic men who influenced public action and saved the city and State.

Eugene Field of Chicago, son of Roswell M. Field, is one of the leading humorous newspaper writers of the country. Several volumes of his character sketches and short poems have been published.

WILLIAM H. WILLIAMS, son of Larkin and Anna Williams, and grandson of Col. Abraham Williams, was born in Chester, Mass., February 24, 1776. At an early age he was bound out to a farmer who proved to be a hard master, depriving him almost entirely of school privileges. He came to Newfane, in October, 1797, and took charge of the cloth dressing and oil making works of Thomas and Darius Wheeler. In 1801, he bought the mills of the Wheeler's and worked them until his decease. He engaged in the mercantile business in 1814, and continued in trade for more than forty years. During the war of 1812 he was extensively engaged in the manufacture of potash and woolen cloth. He erected a large flouring mill, also a carding machine and saw-mill.

He was a resident of Newfane about 70 years, gave a name to the village where he resided and died; contributed largely towards the erection of the village church in 1834, and was at all times liberal and generous in his donations for the support of the gospel.

He was a member of the Methodist church, represented the town in the General Assembly, filled many municipal offices and faithfully discharged the duties incident to the same. He was enterprising, industrious and eminently practical in all his views and efforts. He was liberal in his contributions for the furtherance of all public enterprises which stimulated the growth and prosperity of the town, and although he suffered severely by fire and flood at different times during his life, yet by his untiring industry and perseverance he repaired all his losses and accumulated a handsome fortune, which he left to his family. He married Abigail Robinson, October 17, 1802. She was born March 25, 1781, died July 6, 1821. He married Rosanna Miller for his second wife, February 22, 1826. She was born May 19, 1794; died Oct. 1, 1884. He died Dec. 9, 1866. Here follows the names, births and deaths of his children, only two of whom survived him:

George Williams, born September 14, 1803, died May 26, 1841.

Anna Williams, born January 24, 1805, died January 26, 1805.

Hastings Williams, born March 5, 1806, died December 26, 1808.

Mary Williams, born May 26, 1808, died May 27, 1834. She married Roswell Robertson, January 26, 1831.

Sarah R. Williams, born March 30, 1810. Married Roswell Robertson, December 10, 1835, and died October 9, 1839.

Louisa Williams, born October 26, 1811, married John A Merrifield, January 17, 1843, died Aug. 15, 1884.

William L. Williams, born Dec. 9, 1813, died at Dubuque, Iowa, January 11, 1864.

Abigail E. Williams, born March

3, 1816, married Charles Converse, of Ohio, September 25, 1808, died—

John W. Williams, born January 9, 1818, married Gertrude Brown, April 22, 1841, and died May 25, 1851.

DANIEL FISHER, was born in Newfane in February, 1776, died August 17, 1862, aged 86. He married, for his first wife, Millicent Durren, of Newfane, in 1797. She died in 1813. He married, for his second wife, Miss Priscilla Ritter, of Walpole, N. H., in September, 1815. She died June 9, 1862. His children, by his first wife, were Clark Fisher; Lydia, who married Nathaniel Sampson, of Brattleboro; Orrison Fisher; Caroline, who married Richmand Dunklee of Newfaue; Millicent, who married Richard P. Pratt, of Newfane; Hannah, who married Isaac Burnett, of Dummerston, and Simon Fisher, the only surviving son. Daniel Fisher, Sr., the father of the subject of this sketch, was born in Milford, Mass., in 1752, and removed to Newfane in 1774. He purchased a large amount of real estate, situate in the eastern portion of the town, supposed to exceed one thousand acres in quantity, and embracing within its limits the fertile and productive meadows on West river. At an early day he was known and called by the name of Corn Fisher, for the reason that he raised upon his meadows great crops of Indian corn, which he sold to the early settlers on the hills and mountains west of Newfane. He was exceedingly thrifty and prudent, and at his decease he left a large estate. He died in 1820, aged 68. Daniel Fisher, the subject of this sketch, inherited a large property from his father, which he judiciously distributed among his children and grandchildren before his decease. He was generous and even munificent in his donations and subscriptions for various public enterprises. He was distinguished for his integrity and benevolence, cordial and kindly in his greetings and generous in his hospitalities; liberal and kind to the poor and suffering, never closing his door or his hand to their applications for relief. He was of a tall, commanding figure, and manly and dignified in his deportment. He early united with the First Congregational church in Newfane, and died at an advanced age, universally respected and beloved for his integrity and benevolence. The father and son were both distinguished for their practical good sense, and were often elected to the most important municipal offices in town, and faithfully discharged their official duties.

GEN. PARDON T. KIMBALL.

Born in Newfane, July 2, 1797, died April 5, 1873. He was nearly 76 years of age at the time of his decease. His death resulted from injuries received by a fall from his carriage, in the month of November, 1872. He was greatly distinguished for his energy and enterprise. He represented Windham County in the State Senate for two years, and for the last 50 years of his life he had filled the most important municipal offices in his native town. As a citizen he faithfully discharged all his duties, and greatly distinguished himself by the zeal and energy with which he entered into all the enterprises which were calculated to promote the growth and prosperity of his native town. He was munificent in his contributions for public improvements, and generous and liberal in his gifts for the relief of the suffering poor. It was oftentimes said of him, that he had a great heart and it was in the right place. His friendships were enduring, and his heart was full of the kindest charities for the poor and of sympathy for the suffering and distressed.

DEACON MOSES KENNEY, was born in Northboro, Mass., Sept. 11, 1747, died in Newfane,

June 23, 1808, aged 61 years. He was supposed to have descended from a family by the name of Keayne, as there were many of that name in the vicinity of Boston and Lynn from 1630 to 1670, and none by the name of Kenney until after that period. (See Shurtliff's Records, second volume.) He married Azubah Parmenter, about the year 1770. She was born in Sudbury Mass., Jan. 17, 1751, and died in Newfane, Jan. 3, 1837. They removed to Newfane during the year 1774. They had 12 children, four of whom died in infancy and early childhood. The others all lived to in age past middle life. Sally, who married Zadock Chapin, was born Sept. 11, 1771, removed to Pennsylvania with her husband, and died in 1831. John, born April 18, 1773, died in Newfane Sept. 6, 1849. Lucy, wife of Capt. Chandler Carter, born August 27, 1777, died in Newfane in 1825. Captain Carter was a prominent citizen, a skillful mechanic, a fine military officer, highly respected for his honesty and industry. He died in Michigan about 1864. Halloway Kenney, born February 18, 1781; removed to Lower Canada, and the day and place of his death is unknown. Charlotte, born May 26, 1783, died in Lower Canada, February 22, 1843. She married Luke Knowlton, jr., of Newfane, March 18, 1799. Silas Kenney was born April 12, 1785, died May 5, 1863. In 1813 and 1814 he commanded a company of cavalry composed of citizens of Newfane and Wardsboro. While he held a subordinate position in the company, and it was under the command of Captain Barnard, of Wardsboro, they assembled at the dwelling-house of Silas Kenney, and ascending a stone wall which he had just completed, they marched and counter-marched upon its top which was at least six feet across. The wall was built upon the roadside and twenty rods or more in length. After his discharge from the command of the cavalry company he organized and commanded a company of riflemen, who were the pride and boast of the town, the rank and file numbering not less than one hundred tall and stalwart men, beautifully uniformed with green frocks, and caps ornamented with black plumes. For a few years it was regarded as the best drilled and most attractive military company in the State.

Olive, wife of Jonathan Hall, was born April 25, 1787. Munnis Kenney, born December 10, 1788, died April 5, 1863. He fitted for college at the old academy on Newfane hill, graduated at Middlebury college, studied law and practiced his profession in Townshend, Vt., for a number of years represented the town of Townshend in the State Legislature many times. In 1830 he removed to Webster, Washtenaw county, Michigan. While living in Michigan he was a prominent and influential citizen of the town and county where he resided. Sewell Kenney, born April 1, 1791, died in Chicago, Illinois, October 14, 1844.

Deacon Kenney possessed a vigorous and robust constitution, and in all his farm labors was exceedingly active and industrious. He left a large estate to his children, and of the thousand acres or more of wild forest land which he originally purchased, he had cleared and fenced, with heavy stone wall, more than six hundred and fifty acres. He built the first grist mill in town, at the outlet of Kenney Pond, so-called, within a hundred rods of his homestead; represented the town in the General Assembly, filled many municipal offices in the town, was a deacon in the church at the time of his decease, and in all his relations in life was distinguished for his industry, probity and public spirit.

EXTRACTS FROM REMINISCENCES OF MARSHALL NEWTON (GUNSMITH) AND HIS CHILDREN, AS WRIT-TEN IN 1854, BY REV.
E. H. NEWTON.

Marshall Newton (gunsmith), of Shrewsbury, Mass., married, first Mrs. Eunice Taylor Howe, and to them were born Daniel, Eunice and Marshall. His second wife was Mrs. Hannah Willard Roberts, and they had two sons, Calvin and Liberty. He was lieutenant in the French and Indian war and furnished three sons for the American army of the Revolution. After the war Daniel lived in Shoreham, Vt., in whose settlement and improvements he was active. Liberty lived in Shoreham and Ticonderoga, N. Y. Eunice married Col. Ephraim Holland, a soldier of Boylston, Mass., whose two sisters' Tory husbands fled to Vermont to escape the indignation of the Whigs, and took refuge in Newfane, where Col. and Eunice Holland afterward settled.

Of Calvin Newton no record can be found.

Marshall Newton, third child of Marshall Newton (gunsmith), was born in Shrewsbury in 1757. He served seven years in the war, returned to Shrewsbury and engaged in money speculations; thence went to Shoreham, Vt., where he surveyed the township into lots, in company with Timothy Chipman. He then bought land in its wild state on Newfane Hill and erected a blacksmith shop. In 1786 he married Lydia Newton of Shrewsbury and settled in Newfane. For close attention to business, laborious and persevering toil he was scarcely excelled. Possessing means to stock his shop and carry on his business to advantage he kept work on hand for the farmer and mechanic. Tools of every description and the nails used in construction of all the vicinity buildings were made in his shop. Nothing in the way of barter was refused for his work and he waited patiently for his pay. He took a deep interest in the education of children, was active in the erection of an academy, and a liberal contributor to improvements of the place. He seldom left his home yet was very hospitable. The example of his industry and economy will prove a fortune to the possessor.

Children of Marshall and Lydia Newton: Ephraim H., married Huldah Chipman; Eunice T., married Capt. Silas Kenny; Isaac, married Patty Bartlett; Daniel, married Eunice Clemens.

Twin sons, died day of birth. Hannah, married Rev. Bliss Burnap; Louisa, married Rev. Chandler Bates; Marshall, married twice, first to Lydia Duncan, second to Nancy Tufts.

Eunice, Isaac and Marshall lived and died in Newfane.

There were 43 grand children, 24 of whom were brought up in Newfane. Not one of Isaac's ten children lives in Vermont at this date, eight of them range from Massachusetts to California.

HON. MARSHALL NEWTON,

[SON OF MARSHALL NEWTON SENIOR.]

Was born Newfane, April 1, 1805 and died June 29, 1870, aged sixty-five years. The subject of this sketch was possessed of more than ordinary intelligence and good sense. Respected for his judgment, and popular and unaffected in his manners, he was, for forty years honored with the most important municipal offices in the gift of his townsmen. And he discharged his official duties with great fidelity. He represented the town in the General Assembly two years, was high sheriff of the county one year, and for six consecutive years was elected and served as first assistant judge of the Windham County Court. At the time of his decease he was county treasurer and deputy county clerk. His neighbors and townsmen reposed great confidence in his integrity and good judgment, and he was largely engaged in the execution of responsible trust, during the last years of his life, growing out of the settlement of estates, and the discharge of various important commissions that were entrusted to his care. In the enjoyment of ample means, he dispensed his charities to the poor and suffering with a liberal and open hand. He was greatly respected while living and sincerely mourned at his decease. Marshall Newton was married to Lydia Duncan of Dummerston in 1833. Their only child Evelyn died at about the age of 14. He married Nancy Tufts, daughter of Rev. James Tufts of Wardsboro, Dec. 14, 1836, who is now living. Of their eight children seven lived to maturity: Fanny W. John, Seraph, James H., Mary, Chas. Marshall, and William Henry.

Marshall Newton like his grandfather furnished three sons for the war. James H. Newton was killed at the battle of Spottsylvania Court House. Three sons and three daughters are living. There are five grandchildren.

JONATHAN ROBINSON, SR.

Born in Milford, Mass., July 12th, 1754, married Sarah Taylor, sister of Rev. Hezekiah Taylor, and removed to Newfane in the early part of 1775. He bought of John Wheeler November 13th, 1775, a farm in the parish, so-called, which he occupied until September, 1796, when he exchanged farms with Lieut. James Lamb. The Lamb farm which he received in exchange embraced an extensive meadow a hundred rods or more below Williamsville, where Sackett's men who were killed in the fight with Hobbs, June 25th, 1748, were buried.

Jonathan Robinson died April 14, 1819.

Sarah Robinson, his wife, died March 9, 1809.

They had ten children as follows:

Simon T. Robinson, born April 19, 1779, died in Townshend, May 11, 1813.

Abigail Robinson, born March 25, 1781, married William H. Williams, died July 26, 1821.

John H. Robinson, born August 3, 1783, died September 17, 1843.

Aaron C. Robinson, born October 3, 1785, killed by a fall from his wagon June 4, 1864.

Jonathan Robinson, born November 5, 1787, died July 23, 1829, at Wardsboro.

Hezekiah Robinson, born March 31, 1791, died February 7, 1851, at Waterloo, Canada.

Sally Robinson, born January 12, 1795, died April 16, 1871.

Hannah C. Robinson, born July 5, 1798, married Arad Taylor, January 11, 1821, died September 1, 1853.

Mary C. Robinson, born July 29, 1800, died in infancy.

Hollis T. Robinson, born August 25, 1803, died ———.

AARON C. ROBINSON,

the third son of Jonathan Robinson, sr., succeeded his father in the possession of the farm and occupied the same until his decease, in 1864, and during his possession added to it largely by the purchase of adjoining lands. He possessed more than ordinary ability. His strong sense and excellent judgment gave him great prominence among his townsmen. For thirty years or more before his death, he was uniformly selected and appointed road commissioner at almost every term of the Windham County Court, upon petitions to lay roads and bridges in the several towns in the county.

It is creditable to his superior judgment that there are more or less highways in every town in the county, that were surveyed and laid out under his especial direction and supervision, and since they were built they have greatly subserved the interest and convenience of the public.

He married Betsey Crosby of Brewster, Mass., June 18, 1816. She was born July 12, 1791, died October 20, 1867.

They had four children, as follows:

Mary C. Robinson, born July 18, 1817, married Dennis A. Dickinson, February 25, 1845.

Eliza A. Robinson, born August 10, 1831.

Aaron W. and Betsey C. Robinson, twins, born August 9, 1833;

Aaron W. died December 13, 1838. Betsey C. married O. L. Sherman, of Newfane, September 10, 1856.

JONATHAN ROBINSON, JR.

the fourth son of Jonathan Robinson, Senior, was educated for a merchant and was largely engaged in mercantile business in Wardsboro, where he resided at the time of his decease. He was highly respected and honored by his townsmen; represented the town in the General Assembly, was for a few years a Judge of the Windham County Court, and was highly esteemed for his ability and enterprize.

HEZEKIAH ROBINSON,

[BY REV. FREDERICK ROBINSON.]

son of Jonathan Robinson, Sr., was born at Newfane, Vt., March 31st, 1791. He received a good elementary English education at the Academy of his native town.

In 1817 he married Seleucia Knowlton, oldest daughter of Assistant Judge Luke Knowlton, of Windham county.

His father-in-law having removed to Canada, Mr. Robinson followed him in 1821, and settled in Stukely, Shefford county, where he built a carding mill. The following year he purchased a valuable mill site in the adjoining township of Shefford, with small grist and saw-mills, and to which he removed his carding mill. A few years later he rebuilt the mills and opened a store. At Judge Knowlton's suggestion he called his new purchase Waterloo.

His unswerving integrity commanded the respect and confidence of the community. He was repeatedly chosen to municipal and other offices, which he filled with ability and credit. By the governor of the Province he was, in 1831, appointed Justice of the Peace for the District of Montreal, and in 1836, the first postmaster of Waterloo. From the time of his appointment to the date of his death, in 1851, he was the leading magistrate in the neighborhood.

In 1815 he became a member of the Congregational society in his native town, then under the pastorate of the Rev. Jonathan Nye. Shortly after his removal to Canada he became a member of the Church of England (Episcopal) and was ever after warmly attached to her Scriptural Liturgy, a constant attendant upon her worship, and a devout and regular communicant. He contributed liberally towards building the first church (Episcopal) in Waterloo, and gave seventeen acres of valuable land, now comprised within the village limits, towards the endowment of the parish.

The village which he practically founded, is now, in 1876, a thriving town of nearly three thousand inhabitants, the seat of public business of the county, and the commercial centre of a wealthy and enterprising district.

Mr. Robinson's family consisted of five sons and four daughters, all of whom, with the exception of one daughter, who died in childhood, married and settled in Waterloo, or its vicinity.

HOLLIS T. ROBINSON,

the youngest son of Jonathan Robinson, Sen., was bred a merchant in the store of his brother Jonathan, and for several years was engaged in mercantile business. He represented the town of Newfane in the General Assembly, and for many years he was trial justice in Newfane. He resided seventeen years in Canada, and for fourteen years was a Sheriff's bailiff in one of the eastern counties. He died Feb. 1, 1885.

He married Eliza Tufts, daughter of Rev. James Tufts of Wardsboro, and they had four children.

HON. LUKE KNOWLTON, JR.

[BY REV. FREDERICK ROBINSON.]

Luke Knowlton, jr., son of the Hon. Judge Luke Knowlton, of the Supreme Court of Vt., and of Sarah Holland, his wife, was born in Newfane, March 24, 1775, and educated first at the elementary school, at Westminster, Vt., then at Chesterfield academy, N. H., and finally as a private pupil and law student of his brother Calvin, a graduate of Dartmouth College, N. H., at Newfane, where he was admitted to the bar about 1796. He was a successful practitioner although he had no special fondness for the profession, and became assistant judge of Windham county, and also represented Newfane for several years in the General Assembly of Vermont.

In 1799 he married Charlotte, daughter of Deacon Moses Kenney of Newfane, who was then under 16 years of age. Her father opposed the match on three grounds, viz.:

First—"She is too young." Second—"I cannot spare her." Third—"I can give her no dower."

To this demurrer the young advocate replied:

First—"She will grow older every day, and as fast in my hands as in yours." Second—"You have a wife and other daughters, and can better do without her than I can." Third—"It is your daughter that I want and not a dower."

The man of law was successful in his suit—the demurrer of the Deacon being withdrawn.

This union proved to be fruitful, the issue being ten daughters and five sons.

Previous to his father's death in 1810, Mr. Knowlton became interested with him in wild lands in the Province of Lower Canada; this led to repeated journeys, on horseback, to that district and eventually resulted in his settling, in 1821, in Stukeley, Lower Canada.

In 1825 Judge Knowlton removed to Brome, then in Shefford county, and settled upon a farm, where he remained thirty years, till his death, aged 80, in 1855, having survived his wife twelve years.

HON. AUSTIN BIRCHARD was born at Wilmington, Vt., December 5, 1793. In June, 1805, he went to Saratoga Springs with his father, who died there the 22d of August following. After the death of his father he lived at Wilmington with his mother, employed on the farm and in the tavern, until her death, which occurred March 3, 1813, with the exceptions of a few months, when absent at school or attending store.

In April, 1815, he engaged himself to the late Hon. Samuel Clarke, of Brattleboro, for two years, as clerk in his store. In April, 1817, he entered into partnership for two years with the late Hon. John Noyes in a store in Dummerston as active partner, under the firm name of Noyes & Birchard. At the end of two years the firm was dissolved, and his brother Roger was received as his partner in trade, under the firm name of A. & R. Birchard, and business continued at the same place.

In April, 1819, he married Roxana, eldest daughter of the late John Plummer, jr., of Brattleboro. Soon after their marriage they visited Saratoga for her health, but she continued to decline and died July 9, 1820.

In April, 1822, he removed to Newfane Hill, the county seat, and continued trade under the firm name of A. & R. Birchard.

In September, 1824, he married Mary A., daughter of the late John Putnam of Chesterfield, N. H., by whom he had four children, two sons and two daughters. Sardis, his youngest son, gave his life for his country in the war of the Rebellion, and died a prisoner at Andersonville, Ga., August 22, 1864.

On the shire being located at Park's flat, now Fayetteville, in 1825, he immediately commenced building a store at that place and had it finished about the first of May, 1825, and filled with goods.

The subject of this sketch was an early advocate of railroads and other public improvements; cheerfully labored on the building committee and other committees of the society formed for building the first meeting-house in Fayetteville; also, on the prudential and other important committees of the Congregational society for many years. He was elected a member of the old council in 1833, at that time a co-ordinate branch of the State Government, and re-elected in 1834. He was elected one of the board of the Council of Censors, in 1841, and proposed an amendment to the constitution, abolishing said board and providing a different mode of amending the organic law of the State, which failed of adoption, but the proposition was renewed in 1870, and adopted by the Constitutional convention of that year. In 1846 he was elected State Senator. In April, 1850, he retired from trade, his constant occupation for thirty-five years. In January, 1854, he was appointed treasurer of the Windham County Savings Bank, and held the office twenty years.

He was a strenuous opponent of slavery and secret societies, from early manhood. A cheerful contributor to the Missionary and Bible societies, and other public and private charities. In 1864 he united with the Congregational church.

DEA. JOHN GROUT.

Dea. John Grout, who lived in the southwest part of the town, came from Westminster to Newfane about the year 1810. He was the fourth in descent from Capt. John Grout of Watertown, Mass., who came here from England about the year 1634, and is believed to have been the son of Richard Grout (or Groutte,) whose lineage has been traced back to the Grudii, a Belgic tribe spoken of by Julius Cæsar. John Grout married Azubah Dunklee of West Brattleboro, in 1811, and in 1836 went there to live, and there died in 1851. He was the father of nine children, of whom eight were sons. Of these, Lewis, the eldest, Admatha, the second, and Henry Martyn studied for the ministry. Admatha, a graduate of Dartmouth College, and of Union Theological Seminary, died in Kansas in 1855. Henry Martyn, a graduate of Williams College, from which he received the honorary title of D. D., died in Concord, Mass., in 1886. Of the living, aside from Lewis in West Brattleboro, one resides in Kansas, one in Illinois, one in California, and one in Medford, Mass.

REV. LEWIS GROUT.

Rev. Lewis Grout was born in Newfane, Vt., January 28, 1815, attended Brattleboro Academy in 1834, '5, '6 and '7, and Burr Seminary in Manchester, Vt., in 1838; graduated at Yale College in 1842; taught in a military, classical and mathematical school, at West Point, N. Y., for nearly two years; studied theology at Yale Divinity College two years, 1844 and 1845, and graduated from Andover Theological seminary in 1846. He was ordained as a missionary and married to Miss Lydia Bates, in Springfield, Vt., October 8, 1846; set sail from Boston for South Africa October 10; stopped for a few weeks in Cape Town, and reached Port Natal, Africa, February 15, 1847. Here, among the Zulus, in the District of Natal, he labored as a missionary in the service of the American Board, for fifteen years, and at the end of that time, with health impaired, he returned to America, and landed in Boston, June 7, 1862. Health somewhat restored, he preached a year for the Congregational Church in Saxton's River, and then accepted a call to the church in Feeding Hills, Mass., where he was installed and labored till the first of October, 1865. He then received an appointment from the American Missionary Association as secretary and agent of that society for New Hampshire and Vermont, and in their employ has continued till the present time, now, September, 1876, about eleven years, having his home in West Brattleboro.

He has had two children, one son who died in Natal; the other a daughter, Annie L. Grout, who graduated at Abbott Female Academy, Andover, Mass., in 1870; had charge of Belair Institute, in West Brattleboro, for four years; taught in a Ladies' Seminary in Philadelphia a year, and is now teaching in Atlanta University, Atlanta, Ga.

WILLIAM L. WILLIAMS, the third son of William H. Williams, was a clerk in his father's store during his early youth, and when he attained to his majority he entered into a copartnership with his father in the mercantile business, which he prosecuted successfully for many years. He removed to Dubuque about 1860, and was extensively engaged in business as a produce broker at the time of his decease. He was exceedingly popular in his manners and highly esteemed for his intelligence and sound practical judgment. While residing in Newfane he manifested a lively interest in the growth and prosperity of his native town, was munificent in his donations in aid of all the enterprises that would contribute to its progress and advancement. He gave generously to the poor, was kind to the sick and suffering; he was courteous and affable in his bearing, proverbially honest and upright in all his business relations, modest and familiar in his deportment. His whole life was without reproach and his death at the comparatively early age of fifty, was a source of great regret to all his friends and associates. He accumulated a handsome property which he bequeathed to the two sons of his deceased brother, John W. Williams.

CHARLES K. FIELD.

[BY JUDGE JAMES M. TYLER, OF THE VERMONT SUPREME COURT.]

Charles K. Field, the oldest son of Martin Field, was born in Newfane, April 24, 1803; fitted for college at Amherst, Mass.; entered Middlebury College at the age of 15 and graduated in 1822. After studying law three years in the office of his father he was admitted to the bar in this county and commenced the practice of his profession in Newfane. In 1828 he moved to Wilmington, where he resided for ten years, representing that town in the Legislature in 1835, '36, '37 and '38. He was a delegate to the State Constitutional Convention in 1836. In 1838 he returned to Newfane, where he resided until 1861, representing the town in the Legislature in 1853, '54, '55 and '90, and also representing it in the Constitutional Convention in 1842, '50 and '57. In 1861 he moved to Brattleboro, where he resided until his decease, Sept. 16, 1880. He was elected a member of the Council of Censors in 1863, and chosen president thereof at its first session, and in 1870 represented Brattleboro in the Constitutional Convention. Thus it will be seen that he had large experience in legislative bodies where he always exerted great influence and did much toward shaping the legislation of the State.

Mr. Field inherited many of his father's characteristics, especially his sarcasm, humor and faculty for relating stories, of which he possessed an inexhaustible store. He was a great reader and the best ancient and modern authors were as familiar to him as were his village neighbors. His memory was wonderful; he remembered all of value that he ever read or heard, and had it at instant command, which, with his quick perception, originality, powers of description, wit and humor, made him a most entertaining man in conversation, a brilliant public speaker and a formidable adversary in forensic debate. His judgment of men was unerring. A distinguished jurist of this State once said of him, that it made little difference what men said to him, he seemed to look right into their minds and read their real thoughts. He was a skillful lawyer, few men wielding a keener rapier than he, and he apparently possessed every requisite of a most effective jury advocate; but though he always commanded a large practice, he mainly left the trial of jury cases to others, regarding that as an uncertain and unsatisfactory field of enterprise. He was widely known throughout this State and highly regarded for his brilliant abilities. He possessed a kind sympathetic heart, retained the strongest attachment for his friends, and was an honest man. He was the last of that generation of men composed of the Bradley's, the Kellogg's, the Shafter's and the Fields,' who for more than half a century gave eminence to the bar of Windham county, and whose names will always shine in the galaxy of Vermont's distinguished men.

Mere casual acquaintances were sometimes repelled by his somewhat rough exterior and blunt remarks, but those who knew him intimately looked below the surface into his heart and esteemed and loved him.

Mr. Burnham, in his sketch of Mr. Field, in his history of Brattleboro, quoted Byron's couplet upon Sheridan,

"God never made but one such man,
And broke the die in moulding Sheridan."

Mr. Field was married in 1828 to Julia A. Kellogg of Cooperstown, N. Y., by whom he had four children, three of whom survived him, Mrs. E. P. Jewett of Montpelier, Mrs. H. C. Willard of Brattleboro and Henry K. Field of San Francisco.

JOHN WHEELER.

John Wheeler, one of the early settlers of Newfane, was a descendant of the fourth generation, from Thomas Wheeler, of Concord, Mass., who was living there in 1640. Capt. Thomas Wheeler and Shadrach Hapgood, with twenty others, went to Brookfield to treat with the Indians in 1675. They were drawn into ambush, where Capt. Thomas Wheeler was wounded and Hapgood was killed. A descendant of the one married a descendant of the other in 1717, and were the parents of John Wheeler, born 1735.

John Wheeler's wife was Jedidah Bigelow of Marlboro, Mass.

Their children were,

Darius Wheeler, born in 1761, married Francis Balcom and went to Alleghany county, N. Y., about the year 1815.

Susanna Wheeler, born in 1762, married Jonas Stockwell of Dummerston Hill.

Thomas Wheeler, born in 1765, married Amy Wood of Dummerston, settled in Newfane, where he died about the year 1813, and his widow afterwards became the second wife of Elijah Elmer, Esq., of Newfane.

Mary Wheeler, born in 1767, married Joel Stockwell of Dummerston Hill.

Elizabeth Wheeler, born in 1769, married Daniel Taylor, Jr. of Newfane.

Catherine Wheeler, born in 1771, married Gamaliel Arnold of Dummerston Hill.

The children of Thomas and Amy Wheeler were:

Austin Wheeler, born in 1797, went to Waterloo with Hezekiah Robinson, in 1821. Married first, Charlotte Sophia, daughter of Luke and Charlotte Kenney Knowlton. His second wife was Charlotte, daughter of Samuel and Sylvia Keep Miller of Dummerston. His third wife was Melona Ann, daughter of George and Orilla Pease Williams of Newfane. He settled in Brome, Quebec, where he died in 1866.

George Wheeler, born in 1799, married Ferona, daughter of George and Orilla Pease Williams. He lives in Newfane.

Thomas Wheeler, born in 1801, married Julia Lucy, daughter of Jason Duncan of Newfane, now living in Muskegon, Mich.

Franklin Wheeler, born in 1803, died unmarried in Newfane, in 1843.

Julianna Maria Wheeler, born in 1807, married Asa Blunt of Bolton, Quebec.

Laura Ann Wheeler, born in 1809, married Luke Morgan Knowlton, of Brome, Quebec, died in 1845.

John Elhanan Wheeler, born in 1812, married Mary Ann Roylance of New York city, died in Kewanee, Ill., in 1867. He was employed for many years by Mr. Greeley as foreman in the office of the New York Tribune, and still later was one of the editors of the Chicago Tribune. He was a man of genius and good literary taste.

REV. OTIS WARREN.

[BY REV. HOSEA F. BALLOU.]

Died at his residence in Fayetteville, (Newfane,) Vt., May 17, 1867, Rev. Otis Warren, in his fifty-ninth year.

He was born in Pomfret, Vt., November 23, 1807. His father, Oliver Warren, died when Otis was but seven years old, leaving him and three younger sisters in the care of an affectionate and faithful mother. At the age of fourteen he was apprenticed to learn the cabinet-maker's trade, in Barnard, and as it was his natural inclination to do well whatever he did, he became an exact and efficient mechanic.

Having become intensely interested in the doctrine of a universal Father and an all-efficient Saviour, he procured the works of Ballou, Balfour, Hudson and others. These with a pocket Bible were his constant companions, generally having a well-worn book upon his bench or in his hand, and midnight and often the gray light of morning would find him with unclosed eyes and book.

The sacred Scriptures became familiar to him as "household words," and a determination to become a teacher in our spiritual Israel was fixed in his mind.

October 30, 1832, he married

Miss Emily, second daughter of Isaiah Tinkham, Esq., of Pomfret, a lady of many accomplishments, and every virtue, his constant companion and able coadjutor in his public labors and domestic life.

After studying awhile with the lamented Rev. A. Bugbee, he preached his first sermon in West Brattleboro, in the summer of 1833. In the autumn he returned to his native town and preached there and in the vicinity, until he received an invitation to become pastor of the Union Society, in Newfane, Vt., to which place he with his family removed in August, 1836, where he was ordained the September following, and where he lived in happiness and peace with the society and acquaintances, in a ministry of more than twenty years. His standing may be known from the fact that for four years he represented the town of Newfane in the Legislature of Vermont, and was twenty-nine consecutive years elected town clerk, and held the office at the time of his death.

LONGEVITY—LONG MARRIED LIFE.

BY J. J. GREEN.

The first white woman and undoubtedly the oldest person that ever lived in town, was Mrs. Jane Hazelton, who died on the Franklin farm, February 16, 1810, at the advanced age of one hundred and three years, eleven months and eleven days. A venerable lady who well remembers this centenarian, says of her, that the day she was one hundred years old she spun a full day's work, and then called her son and told him to set her wheel away, as she had spun her last thread. Tradition says that Mrs. Dyer was the first white woman that ever wintered within what was then supposed to be the chartered limits of Fane. We find her death recorded November 27, 1789, at the age of eighty-nine, and that of Joseph Dyer, September 2, 1790, at the age of ninety. The names of Ebenezer Dyer, who is reported in Thompson's Gazetteer as one of the original trio of settlers, is not mentioned in the town records or Hezekiah Taylor's notes; but inasmuch as the early historians have handed down the name, it is probable that there was such a name in the family. We have been able to obtain the least authentic knowledge of this family of either of the original three.

Isaac Goodnough and wife lived in the married state sixty-six years. She died October 8, 1804, aged eighty-seven, having been a member of the church seventy-two years. He died July 6, 1805, aged ninety-two. Thomas Green and wife lived together sixty years, dying July 10 and 24, 1804, at the age of eighty. Artemas Bruce and wife were married fifty-five years. He died July 31, 1811, aged eighty-four. She died the 29th of August, following, aged seventy-eight. The first grown person whose death we find recorded by the Rev. Mr. Taylor, is that of Ebenezer Merrick, who was killed by a falling tree, January 9, 1779, aged seventy-five. April 20 and 21, 1795, five children died in town under twelve years of age.

WINDHAM COUNTY SAVINGS BANK.

BY MILON DAVIDSON OF NEWFANE.

The Windham County Savings Bank, located at Newfane, Vt., was chartered in 1853, and in December of the same year was organized with the following officers: Hon. John Roberts, President; Emery Wheelock, Vice President; Austin Birchard, Treasurer.

BOARD OF TRUSTEES:

Wm. R. Shafter, William Harris, Jas. H. Phelps, Daniel Read, Preston F. Perry, Lewis F. Walker, Thomas White, Jonas Twitchell, William L. Williams, Aaron C. Robinson, John Rice, jr. Marshall Newton, Franklin Sawyer, Jacob Dunklee, jr., Charles K. Field.

COMMITTEE OF FINANCE:

William L. Williams, John Rice, jr., Jonas Twitchell, Charles K. Field, Franklin Sawyer.

The first deposit was made Feb. 7, 1854. Amount, $2.00. From this small beginning it has increased to over half a million. Its growth and standing at the expiration of one year, and at the close of each decade thereafter, may be learned from the following figures:

	Deposits.	Surplus.	Resources.
Jan. 1855,	$11,677.82	$259.72	$11,521.73
Jan. 1865,	93,497.28	3,714.89	97,212.17
Jan. 1875,	176,509.13	5,358.67	181,867.80
Jan. 1885,	397,735.17	16,780.58	414,515.75
Jan. 1891,	504,687.06	37,197.73	541,884.79

In its early days the bank kept its papers and transacted its business in a small room in the dwelling house of the treasurer, afterwards and until 1883, in a building which it owned, but rented most of it for a store. Since 1883 it has occupied a fine brick building, erected in the village of Newfane, for the purposes of the bank. It is one of the most substantial edifices of the kind in the state. From the first the institution has been under conservative management, and to this fact alone has been largely due its past prosperity.

Its presidents have been, Hon. John Roberts, from 1853 to 1869, Col. Jonas Twitchell from 1869 to 1878, Dea. Samuel D. Winslow, from 1879. to 1891, when he tendered his resignation.

Its treasurers have been, Austin Birchard from 1853 to 1874, and Milon Davidson from 1874 to 1891, and he is the present incumbent. The officers at this date are, ——— President; N. M. Batchelder, Vice President; Milon Davidson, Treasurer. Board of Trustees, Wm. T. Bruce, I. K. Batchelder, P. H. Rutter, H. H. Holbrook, John B. Stebbins, E. B. Batchelder, N. M. Batchelder, W. C. Halladay, B. C. Eager, E. C. Benedict, A. A. Wyman.

Board of Investment, I. K. Batchelder, Wm. T. Bruce, B. C. Eager, M. Davidson, P. H. Rutter. Auditors, N. M. Batchelder, W. C. Halladay, H. H. Holbrook.

[BY M. O. HOWE, OF NEWFANE, SUPERVISOR FOR VERMONT OF U. S. CENSUS OF 1890.]

One hundred and twenty years ago, or in 1771, three years before its organization as a town, there were 52 inhabitants in Newfane. By the several U. S. censuses the population of the town is given as follows:

1791, 660.	1840, 1,403.
1800, 1,000.	1850, 1,304.
1810, 1,276.	1860, 1,191.
1820, 1,506.	1870, 1,113.
1830, 1,441.	1880, 1,031.
1890, 952.

These figures show a loss of population in each decade since 1820, and a total loss of 554 since that date. The decline of population in Newfane has something more than a local interest, for similar conditions have led to a like result in more than half the towns of the State. A loss of population occurred generally in the farming towns; only two towns in Windham county (Brattleboro and Rockingham) have as large a population as they had sixty years ago, and the growth of these two is in their prosperous villages. The loss of population in Newfane cannot justly be accredited to the want of a fertile soil or less attractive homes than can generally be found elsewhere. Statistics of agricultural products and their values prove beyond refutation that the farmers of Vermont realize more profit from their labor and investments than the average farmer in any one of more than thirty other States, yet our people emigrate and often settle in a less desirable country than they leave.

There are two direct causes for the decrease of population in Newfane, which, without seeking for any precedent cause, fully account for it; these are: (1) A low birth rate; (2) Emigration. In the early history of the town families of from eight to twelve children were not uncommon. At this time it is rare to find a family with more than four or five children, and a large number of families have none. The average number of persons in a Newfane family, as found by the census of 1890, was only 3.76. The average annual birth rate in the United States is estimated by good authorities at about 35 per thousand of living inhabitants. The average number of births in Newfane for the past 30 years, as shown by a compilation from the registration reports, was as follows:

Average annual number of births for ten years ending with
1880	17.1
1890	17.

Average annual births for 30 years, 17.27.

At the normal birth rate the whole number of births in 30 years would have been about 1155

The whole number of births in the past 30 years was ----- 518

Deficiency ----- 637

There are no complete records from which the birth rate at the time when the town had more than 1,500 inhabitants can be ascertained, but it was then, probably, above rather than below the normal rate, or more than twice as great as at the present time. In 1824 the number of children in the common schools of Newfane, as stated in the town history, was 518. Last year (1890) the number of scholars in town attending any school was 184. In 1824 the children in the schools were 34.5 per cent of the total population; they are now but 19.3 per cent.

The proportion of deaths to whole number of inhabitants, for the period covered by the registration reports, has been about the same in Newfane as the general average for the country. For the decade ending with 1870 the annual average of deaths in town was 21.3; for the decade ending with 1880, 18.1; for the decade ending 1890, 17.1. The annual death rate for 1,000 inhabitants for the thirty years was about 17. The whole number of deaths in the thirty years was about 566. The deaths excelled the births for the corresponding period by 48. The loss in population during the same period was 241, which leaves a loss of 193 to be accounted for by the excess of emigration over immigration.

Of the first cause of the decline in our population I forbear to comment here. Our loss from emigration has been the country's gain; for Newfane, like other country towns of New England, has sent out many persons who have helped to develop other localities and to give sterling character to other communities. Of late, the people of the town have a better appreciation of the privileges of their own homes, and there is reason to believe that hereafter there will be fewer removals from the old homesteads, and that the population may be increased by additions from abroad.

THE PONDVILLE BAPTIST CHURCH,
FORMERLY CALLED MARLBORO AND NEWFANE.

This church was organized October 29th, 1794, from members of the Dummerston church, fifteen males and seven females. At the close of the council, the infant church met and elected John Phillips, jr., as clerk, who served them in that capacity, with the interruption of only two or three years, till 1840, when Joseph Morse, came into office. These two men served the church in the capacity of clerk for more than eighty years.

In 1802, Nehemiah Fisher was called deacon, and the membership doubled in two years.

In 1803, Eld. Benj. Cole was preacher, and was still with them in August of 1804.

In November, 1804, Matthew Bennett was authorized to improve his gifts.

In 1806, James Ball and Mansfield Bruce were chosen deacons, the latter of whom, with twenty others, were added to this little church during the last seven months of this year.

In March, 1807, the church "voted, that it is the deacons' duty to call on brethren that do not go to meeting, to know the reason and invite them to their duty."

In July, 1809, Dea. N. Fisher was licensed to preach, and Bro. John Phillips and Stephen Otis chosen deacons. In September of the same year, Dea. M. Bruce was ordained and became the first settled and salaried pastor of the church, and remained such till the close of 1818. During the last years of his pastorate, he did not preach all the time to this people; the rest of the time was occupied by their licensed deacon, Nehemiah Fisher. Elder Bruce baptised into this church, 85 converts.

From the close of Eld. Howe's pastorate till the commencement of Foster Hartwell's in October, 1884, the church was supplied one year by a licentiate named Caleb Smith. Eld. Hartwell closed his labors about September, 1848. They were destitute a short time, when Rev. C. L. Baker supplied them till the fall of 1849; and, sometime before September, 1850, Rev. A. H. Stearns became pastor, and was pastor three years. During this time he received into the church thirty-six by baptism and nine by letter.

In 1852 the church passed the following resolution:

"Resolved, That we disapprove of all secret societies, whether it be Odd Fellowship, Freemasonry, or called by any other name."

After a destitution of about one year, Rev. J. P. Huntington became pastor, and was pastor till about the last of 1856. In January, 1857, Bro. Baldwin labored as an Evangelist. In March following, I. C. Carpenter became pastor. Twenty-two baptisms were reported in the association letter as the result of this revival. Eld. Carpenter remained pastor till March, 1862, and was followed in the pastorate by C. D. Fuller in July next. The latter was pastor till March, 1864, when J. M. Willmarth succeeded him in this office till April, 1867.

From the last date till December, 1868, the church was destitute of a pastor, but not destitute of revival interest, as several were converted and added to the church. At that time, S. S. White became pastor, closing in April, 1871. During the winter of 1870 and 1871 the church was refreshed, and nine were added by baptism. From April, 1871, to June, 1872, they were without a regular preacher, but were supplied at intervals. During this time they repaired their house of worship at an expense of about $1,500. In June, 1872, John A. Rich became pastor and continued in that relation till September, 1873. He was succeeded in February, 1874, by A. J. Walker, who preached two years. During Mr. Walker's pastorate twenty-six were added to the church. William Beavins was pastor from April 1876, to March, 1879; ——— Shepardson from June, 1879, to April, 1882; Wallace Crocker from April, 1882, to August, 1884; Geo. Green from October, 1884; E. F. Mitchell from May, 1886, to April, 1889, and was succeeded by E. F. Hatfield the present pastor.

Since 1802, there have been added to this church, by baptism, 400; 8 have been licensed to preach, the most of whom were subsequently ordained, and 8 have been called to the deacon's office.

Present membership of the church is about 100.

The following vote, passed September 5, 1810, shows the early practice of the church on the subject of the Lord's Supper:

"WHEREAS, The church has formally given liberty to those members that were received into this church to commune with an unbaptized denomination, we now see our error; and now, voted, to unfellowship the practice."

In 1817 the church built their first meeting house within the limits of the town of Marlboro.

The church was supplied by Dea. N. Fisher during 1819 and a part of 1820, when Eld. Paul Hines became pastor and served as such for two years. The church was prospered during his pastorate, and forty-three were added by baptism. From the close of Elder Hines' labors till the ordination of Phineas Howe, the church was supplied with preaching by Dea. N. Fisher, assisted, in 1823, by N. McCulloch.

With the exception of three years, from 1832 to 1835, when D. H. Grant and other licentiates supplied the church, Eld. Phineas Howe was pastor till 1842. During this pastorate the church enjoyed, at least, four periods of revival, and nearly one hundred and seventy-five were added by baptism, and had numbered as many as one hundred and ninety-five in 1841.

In 1838 a man 97 years of age was baptized, who had waited 67 years to become fit for the ordinance.

About 1840 a new meeting house was built, and the location changed to Pondville. This change created a dissatisfaction in a part of the membership, who, for a time, held a separate meeting. This same meeting house was extensively repaired at an expense of $1,500, and re-dedicated May 30, 1872.

FIRST CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH.

FROM A CENTENNIAL DISCOURSE DELIVERED AT NEWFANE, JULY 5TH, 1874, BY REV.
CHARLES BURNHAM.

The town was organized May 17, 1774. The church was organized and the first pastor, the Rev. Hezekiah Taylor, was settled about six weeks later, on June 30, 1774.

This was the eleventh Congregational church organized in the State. It was organized at a time which, emphatically, tried men's souls. It was only two years before the Declaration of Independence, when the whole country was agitated by those events which resulted in the Revolutionary war. Here there were neither roads nor bridges; neither horses, oxen, nor wagons, and the traveler must guess his way along, or find it by marked trees. All supplies must be brought on foot from Hinsdale, 20 miles distant.

The church, at its organization, consisted of the following persons: Luke Knowlton and wife, Thomas Green and wife, John Wheeler and wife, Jonathan Park and wife, and the wife of Mr. Henry Balcom. On the fourteenth of December, 1774, the church made choice of Luke Knowlton, Esq., as Deacon. Moses Kenney was chosen the 2d Deacon, March 11, 1783. Brother Knowlton, was appointed to wait on the communion table and read the psalm. To the younger portion of this audience this statement may need some explanation. One hundred years ago books were scarce, and there might have been but one hymn book in the whole congregation, and that in the hands of the minister. He would select the psalm, and hand the book to the deacon, who would read two lines. Then the chorister, pitchpipe in hand, would pitch the tune, and the singers would sing them. The deacon would then read two more, which would be sung, and so on to the end of the psalm.

We find upon the nineteenth of November, 1781, a town meeting was called "To see if the inhabitants of Newfane would vote the Rev. Mr. Taylor to be their minister." Also, "To see what means they would choose in regard to having the salary of the Rev. Mr. Taylor assessed upon the inhabitants." At this meeting it was "Voted unanimously that the town approve of and accept the Rev. Mr. Taylor to be minister of the gospel for said town." Also, "Voted to raise two hundred HARD DOLLARS to pay the salary due to the Rev. Mr. Taylor on the thirtieth day of December next." Also, "Voted a salary of sixty pounds, meaning two hundred Spanish milled dollars, per annum, to be assessed annually so long as the Rev. Mr. Taylor, remains a minister of the gospel in said town." Thus it appears that the minister's salary was raised by assessment, the same as other taxes, on all inhabitants. At that time this was well enough as the people were all of one way of thinking, or were all Congregationalists.

Let us consider their efforts to build a meeting house.

September 17, 1792, at a town meeting, the following action was taken: "Voted to build a meeting-house, forty feet by fifty. Voted to set said house betwixt the court house and Mr. Taylor's lane. Voted the sum of fifty pounds for the purpose of setting up a frame for a meeting-house. Voted to appoint Lieut. Ward Eager, Capt. Ephraim Holland, Deacon Moses Kenney and Mr. Ebenezer Morse a building committee."

After many delays, embarrassments and changes, on the 8th of January, 1798, arrangements were made, by which the materials for the house were to be delivered at the place of building. One man agreed to furnish four sills of specified dimensions, for a certain price; another undertook to furnish the plates, rafters, or braces, and so on. In this way the materials for the house were furnished by some twenty or thirty persons. On the 17th of July, 1799, the house was raised. The raising of a meeting-house in those days, was an affair of great importance and the master workman must have picked men, tried and true. Accordingly the men were selected from all the neighboring towns, and to distinguish them from all others, each wore a handkerchief around his head. Col. Tyler, of Townshend, fell from the frame and was taken up for dead; but he revived at length, and in due time recovered. On the 12th of November, 1799, a contract was made by the building committee with Mr. Joseph Pond, of Warwick, Mass., to finish the house. The materials were to be all furnished for him except the sash and pews, which were to be made at Warwick and brought to this place. The workmen were to be furnished with board while here, and twenty-five gallons of West India rum was to be supplied for their use. Mr. Pond was to do the work "in a workman-like manner," and to receive therefor $1146; $50 in cash within one year from date, and $1096 was to be paid in beef at cash price in the month of October next ensuing after date. Mr. Pond's receipt for his pay on the contract bears date November 19, 1800. The whole cost of the house as shown by the bill was $3,731.32.

During the pastorate of the Rev. Mr. Taylor, of something more than thirty-seven years, there were received into the church, not including the nine at its organization, one hundred and twenty-six members forty-eight males, and seventy-eight females.

The Rev. Jonathan Nye, the second pastor of this church, was installed November 6, 1811, and was dismissed December 29, 1819. During his pastorate of eight years and more, there were received into the church eighty-eight members, twenty-seven males and sixty-one females.

The Rev. Chandler Bates, the third pastor, was settled July 4, 1821, and was dismissed January 12, 1831. During his pastorate of nearly ten years, eighty-five were received into the church, eighteen males and sixty-seven females.

In 1832-3 the Rev. C. M. Brown supplied the pulpit and received six into church fellowship, one male and five females. Mr. Brown preached the first temperance sermon in the place.

In 1833, the Rev. Rodger C. Hatch labored here eight weeks. The Rev. John F. Griswold was installed pastor of this church April 1, 1834, and was dismissed July 30, 1839. Rev. L. S. Coburn was settled here October 2, 1839, and this present house was dedicated to the worship of God, at the same time. Because of continued ill health, Mr. Coburn was dismissed June 14, 1842.

May 18, 1843, the Rev. Dana B. Bradford was installed pastor of this church, and was dismissed June 10, 1845. The Rev. Darwin Adams was installed pastor of the church, January 28, 1846, and was dismissed February 21, 1850. The Rev. Mr. Plimpton supplied about ten months, in 1850, and was followed by Rev. Charles Whiting, who continued here till his death, in May, 1855. The Rev. Mr. Estey supplied about six months, in 1855, and was followed by the Rev. Mr. Eastman in 1856. The Rev. Mr. Bixby came in 1857, and remained five or six years. He was dismissed from the church in May, 1863, and was succeeded by the Rev. Benjamin Ober, who continued about five years, and was followed by the Rev. Messrs. Parkinson, Chase, Shurtleff and Dow, who averaged about one year each.

During the past hundred years this church has had twenty pastors and acting pastors, beside those who have supplied for a few weeks only. The average pastorate has been less than five years.

The whole number of members in this church from its organization until this time, has been four hundred and seventy-one; one hundred and eighty-eight males, and two hundred and eighty-three females. The present number of members is ninety-five; twenty-four males, and seventy-one females.

The first Sabbath School was opened here in the summer of 1818, by Miss Lucy Burnap, sister of Dea. Asa Burnap.

Seven Congregational ministers have here been nurtured, trained and sent forth into the world to do their work.

The Rev. Bliss Burnap was brought up in the family of the Rev. Aaron Crosby; he was a good man, and still lives to bless the world by his example, faith and prayers. He has preached in Malone and Bangor, N. Y., and in other places of which I am not informed.

The Rev. Luke Whitcomb was born in this town in 1789. He possessed a strong mind, and was fond of books, and ardently desired an education. After many struggles he fitted for college, and was admitted to the Junior class, at Middlebury, where he graduated in due course. He preached in several places while a licentiate, but soon received a call to settle in Townshend, Vt., which he accepted. The church at Townshend has been made distracted by divisions, but by his wise and judicious labors, it became united and prosperous. This was his only settlement, which continued about five years, until his death, Jan. 2, 1821.

The Rev. Hollis Read graduated at Williams college, and was sent by the A. B. C. F. M., as a missionary to the Mahratta mission, in India. Here he continued till the failure of his health led him to return to his native land, where he still lives. He is the author of a number of works of great value; "God in History," "India and her People," "The Palace of the Great King," "The Footprints of Satan in History," a counterpart "God in History," and a prize essay, "Commerce and Christianity." This last is a work of rare merit, and does honor to the head and heart of its author.

Rev. Ephraim H. Newton, D. D., was born in Newfane, June 13, 1787. In his younger days he assisted his father in the blacksmith's shop, but having an ardent desire for knowledge, and after many hard struggles he fitted for college and entered at Middlebury, in 1806, graduating in 1810. He then entered the Theological Seminary, at Andover, and graduated there in 1813. His first settlement was at Marlboro, Vt., March 16, 1814. His ministry there continued nearly twenty years and was very successful. 133 additions were made to the church under his ministry. He was afterwards settled at Glen's Falls, N. Y., where he continued more than three and a half years. In 1837 he was settled at Cambridge, Washington county, N. Y. In each of these places he was greatly blessed in his labors. He died Oct. 26, 1864.

The Rev. Lewis Grout was born in the southwestern part of Newfane, January 28, 1815, the eldest of nine children, of whom eight were sons.

Rev. Admatha Grout was born in Newfane, February 19, 1817, fitted for college at Brattleboro Academy, graduated at Dartmouth College 1845, and at Union Theological Seminary, in 1851. But failing health did not allow of his being settled in the ministry. He died in Kansas, in 1855.

Rev. Henry Martyn Grout, brother of Lewis and Admatha, was born May 14, 1831. Graduated at Williams College, in 1854, after which he taught for a time as principal of the Brattleboro Academy, and subsequently as principal of Monson Academy. He was licensed to preach in 1856, and labored for a time in Marlboro. He was ordained and installed over a church in Putney, September 1, 1858. Subsequent to this he was called to the church in West Rutland, where he was installed, August 26, 1862. His next pastorate, a term of four years, was over the church in West Springfield, Mass. He is now settled in Concord, Mass. He was, for several years, associate editor in the literary department of the Congregationalist of Boston.

The pastorate of Rev. Charles Burnham commenced in May, 1874, and continued to January, 1880. Mr. Burnham was succeeded by Rev. George Porter, who preached about two years, and was followed by Rev. W. W. Nason for two years. Then came Rev. George W. Lawrence for one year, Rev. William H. Marble for two years, and Rev. C. H. Smith, the present pastor, who entered his fifth year August 1, 1891.

METHODISM IN NEWFANE.

An organized society was formed in 1830, under the direction of Guy Beckley and James M. Fuller, members of the Vermont Conference, who, for about two years, divided their time between Fayetteville, Williamsville and Wardsboro. They were succeeded in this town, in 1832, by Wm. H. Hodges, who preached at the two villages, alternately, most of the time till 1838. Then followed Elder Guernsey, till May, 1839, after which time, till 1848, the society was destitute of preaching, with the exception of occasional supplies. E. B. Morgan was stationed at Williamsville, by Conference, in 1848, followed by John A. Wood in 1850, O. S. Morris in 1851 and '52, C. D. Ingraham in 1853, and Simeon Spencer in 1862. In addition to the above, the society was often supplied, temporarily, by local preachers. The public services of the society were held at Fayetteville, in the Court House and in Union church; at Williamsville, in Wm. H. Williams' hall, and afterward in the church, a half interest in which, until its sale to the First Universalist society in 1868, was controlled by this denomination.

In 1878 Conference united Williamsville and East Dover as one charge and stationed A. S. Maxham here. Mr. Maxham was followed by J. E. Knapp in 1881, Geo. F. Arms in 1882, Frank Handy in 1885, J. A. Steele in 1888, and F. H. Roberts in 1891. In 1881 the society erected at Williamsville a church at a cost of about $3000, and in 1885 a parsonage at a cost of $1500, from funds contributed mostly by Mrs. William H. Williams, one of the original members of the society.

FIRST UNIVERSALIST SOCIETY.

The present society was organized in 1825. That Universalism existed in town, in an organized form, at a much earlier period, however, is shown by the following extract from the first volume of town records:

"NEWFANE, AUGUST YE 14, 1787.

This may certify all persons whom it may concern that the following persons, whose names are herein inserted, are professors of the doctrine of Universal Salvation by Jesus Christ, and are constant attenders to hear the preaching of the same, and also do contribute to support the preaching of that doctrine, viz: " * * * * *

It also appears, from the same source, that there was inserted in the warrant for the annual March meeting, in 1820, an article which reads as follows:

"8th. To see if said Town will vote to permit the Universalists to occupy the Meeting House four Sabbaths in each year;" which article, according to the record of the meeting, it was voted to dismiss. In November, 1825, a new society was organized by Charles Hudson, under the name of "The First Restorationist Society in Newfane," the constitution being signed by Josiah Taft and 70 others. Jonathan Whitcomb was the first regular minister, but there is nothing to indicate the dates of the commencement and expiration of his term. At the annual meeting of the society, Nov. 23, 1827, it was "Voted that the committee should hire Mr. Wm. Balch to preach one-fourth of the Sabbaths in eight months, to commence in March or April, on condition that Mr. B. does not want more than five dollars per Sabbath, and his boarding." From information received from Mr. Balch, it seems that he preached his first sermon in Newfane, and the fifth in his ministry, at the schoolhouse in Williamsville, September 23, 1827, and, occasionally, at other places in town till the following April, at which time he commenced a regular engagement with the society for one-half the time, which was continued till November 15, 1829. From the latter date to 1836 the society was supplied for short periods by A. L. Pettee, — Maynard, Matthew Hale Smith, and others, but was destitute of preaching the greater portion of the time. Otis Warren became pastor in 1836, which relation he occupied till 1859.

At a meeting of the society, held December 10, 1839, it was voted that the old constitution be considered null and void, and a new constitution was adopted, under the name of "The First Universalist Society of Newfane."

W. W. Hayward was preacher in charge from May, 1860, to March, 1862; M. B. Newell from June, 1862, to June, 1863; and Joseph Barber during the summer of 1865, and till 1871, the society was wholly destitute of preaching. In 1870 the meeting house at Williamsville was extensively repaired, and was dedicated June 28, 1871, as a Universalist house of worship. N. C. Hodgden was preacher from July, 1871, to September, 1872; D. C. White from the latter date till the spring of 1874. From the close of Mr. White's term the pulpit was supplied by different persons till October, 1874, at which time Mrs. R. A. D. Tabor commenced her labors, which were terminated in April, 1876.

Lucius Holmes was pastor 1878-80, followed by J. H. Farnsworth, State missionary, 1880-81, Edward Smilie, 1881-83, and William N. Barber, 1884-89. Mr. Barber's five years term rounded up a ministry of half a century. Most of the public services of the society, prior to 1836, were held at Fayetteville, at first in the court house, but in the Union church after its dedication in 1832. From 1836 to 1854, the time of the preacher was divided between the two villages, meetings being held one-half the time in each, respectively.

SCHOOL DISTRICTS AND SCHOOLS.

The first recorded action of Newfane in regard to schools, was taken March 15, 1784, when it was voted to divide the town into five school districts.

At a meeting held September 7, 1790, the town was divided into seven districts, and March 20, 1792, it was again divided into eight districts. March 4, 1799, the 9th district was added to the list, and the sum of one hundred pounds voted for the support of schools. March 22, 1802, the 10th district was formed; March 20, 1809, the 11th district, and March 10, 1817, the 12th and 13th districts.

There are at present ten organized school districts in town.

District No. 1 comprises Whitakerville, and the immediate surrounding territory; No. 2 includes the village of Fayetteville; No. 3 is situated midway between Fayetteville and Williamsville; No. 5 is known as the parish district; No. 6 includes the village of Williamsville; No. 7 occupies the north-west corner of the town; No. 8 includes the village of Pondville; No. 9 is the first district north of Fayetteville; No. 10 embraces the Adams neighborhood; No. 11 takes in Stratton Hill, now called, and is a joint district with No. 14 in Marlboro.

The following table shows the number of weeks of school sustained by the several districts in 1874, the rates per cent raised on the grand list for support of the same, and the population of the town, by districts, in January, 1877:

The practice of school supervision by a committee chosen by the town, commenced in 1828. At the annual March meeting held in that year, Chandler Bates, Roswell M. Field, Geo. A. Morse, Roger Birchard and Huntington Fitch, were chosen a committee to superintend schools. This practice evidently soon came into disrepute, as men of a lower standard of intellect were chosen at each successive election till 1833, when the office was filled by persons said to be chiefly noted for ignorance.

In 1847 the practice was renewed, and Foster Hartwell, Otis Warren and Darwin Adams were chosen superintendents. Since the latter date the position has been occupied by the following persons: 1851, Otis Warren; 1852, '53, O. S. Morris and Otis Warren; 1854, George Fisher and Phineas Howe; 1855, J. P. Huntington; 1856, George Arnold; 1857, Phineas Howe; 1858, '59, Solomon Bixby; 1860 and 1866, D. B. Morse; 1861, W. W. Hayward; 1862, '63, '65, '68, R. M. Pratt; 1864, Benjamin Ober and J. W. Willmarth; 1869, J. W. Croker; 1870, '71, '72, J. H. Merrifield; 1873, '74, '75,

A. M. Merrifield; 1876, '77, '78, Charles Burnham; 1879, '80, '81, '82, '83, '84, M. O. Howe; 1885, '86, H. W. Bailey; 1887, '88, Frank L. Fish; 1891, Charles E. Brown. Member of County Board of Education 1889, '90, J. H. Merrifield.

The inhabitants of this town, quick to detect a necessity for better educational facilities than were afforded by their common schools, took measures, at an early date, to secure the establishment of an academy. An act incorporating the Windham County Grammar School was granted by the Legislature, October 31, 1801, in which the following persons were named as the first board of trustees: Luke Knowlton, Jason Duncan, Asa Wheelock, Samuel Fletcher, Jonas Whitney, James Shafter, Martin Field, Esqs., and Mr. Joseph Ellis. A suitable building was erected, and for several years the institution enjoyed high repute. Many persons who afterward occupied honorable positions in the affairs of the county and State, received their education at this place. This school had a run of about fifteen years, and then became a subject of that general decline which about that time began to attach itself to all the public enterprises of the village on the hill. The academy building was used for several years for the district school purposes and was finally taken down and removed to Fayetteville.

For many years the inhabitants of the town have supported one or more select schools for a portion of the time, which, though not of an academic character, have been very useful as aids to the common school work.

The following is a list of the natives of Newfane who have graduated from colleges:

Ephriam H. Newton,	Middlebury,	1810
Luke Whitcomb,	"	1813
Charles K. Field,	"	1822

The following, though not natives, have received a collegiate education while residents of the town: Calvin Knowlton, moved to New-fane with his father in 1772, fitted for college here, and graduated at Dartmouth in 1784; Edward J. and Samuel R. Warren, sons of Dr. John P. Warren, graduated,—Edward at Dartmouth in 1846, and Samuel at Yale in 1860.

William H. Hodges, graduated at Colby University, Waterville, Maine, in 1851.

THE REVOLUTIONARY WAR.

BY J. J. GREEN.

When our military stores at Bennington became in danger, and the call came for the Green Mountain Boys to rally for the rescue, Lieut. Jonathan Park and others from this grant, volunteered, and after a two day's march reached Bennington in time to participate in the glorious struggle of that memorable day.

The following is all the official record we have been able to find that in any way connects this town with the war for our independence: "March 8, 1781, they voted to raise the soldiers, for the defense of the frontiers, by a town tax."

WAR OF 1812-15

September 29, 1812, a town meeting was called to see if the town would vote to raise the wages of the Cavalry and Militia, that should be compelled to march, to ten dollars per month. They voted to dismiss the article and adjourned without day.

There is a tradition that at one time the militia expected to be called to Plattsburgh, and the company volunteered. Many of the men worked all night, running bullets, making cartridges, etc. But the order came the next day to disband, instead of march. The soldiers who actually enlisted from this town were Lyman Holden, a man by the name of Gambel, a Mr. Bullard, and Nathaniel Holland, who died at Plattsburgh, Oct. 6, 1814. Isaac Hovey, of Williamsville, enlisted in January, 1841, from the town of Craftsbury, and served for a period of eighteen month in the engineer's department. He was in only one engagement, the battle of Bridge-water.

THE PUBLIC SQUARE AND THE OPERA HOUSE.

ROCKINGHAM.

By E. A. DERBY.

ROCKINGHAM.

Rockingham is a post town in the N. E. corner of Windham county. The Connecticut river washes the entire eastern boundary. Williams river runs through the central part and empties into the Connecticut about three miles north of Bellows Falls. Saxton's river is in the southern part of the town.

Some accounts inform us that the first settlements made in this town were commenced by people from Massachusetts who received a charter from that State, and that the place was originally called Fallstown, which was soon after changed to Great Falls, and was again changed to Bellows Falls, after the lands adjoining on both sides of the river were drawn and settled by Benjamin Bellows, who was one of the original proprietors of the town, as well as proprietor's clerk.

If the town was settled previous to 1752, and it is possible it was, the settlers forfeited their charter and abandoned their settlement on account of the Indians, or for some other cogent reason.

At that time settlements in Cheshire County, N. H., and Windham County, Vt., were very rare. White people had traversed the wilderness in this vicinity, observing the inducements offered to settlers; but although the soil, timber, streams, game and fish made the country attractive, it is probable that the numerous savages made the occupancy of the country too hazardous an undertaking for the whites to enter on. In 1744 there were but very few inhabitants between Swanzey and Charlestown No. 4.

Previous to this time settlements had been begun in Vermont, but none had become permanent as far north as Rockingham before 1754. The few people who had attempted to settle were continually harrassed by the French and Indians. At all times they were subject to the attacks of a concealed foe. They could not cultivate the soil, or clear the land without being exposed to danger. The condition of the country, being almost wholly covered with forest, was favorable to the stealthy approach of the cunning savage; and the settler was liable at any instant to be shot down and scalped, or captured and carried into captivity. Their families were in constant danger of being massacred or captured.

Although the soil in this vicinity was everything that the agriculturist could desire, it is probable that the great attraction was fish. At certain seasons of the year the Connecticut literally swarmed with salmon and shad. The falls impeded their progress up the river, and, as a consequence, the eddy below was sometimes fairly packed with them.

The fact that people were attracted to this vicinity for fishing rather than for farming purposes, together with some other circumstances, tended to retard the early growth and prosperity of the town. As late as 1764, after the present charter had been obtained from Governor Wentworth, it was doubted that the town contained a large enough permanent population to retain the charter, and he took testimony from Michael Lovell and Benjamin Bellows, two of the principal proprietors, in regard to the matter. They both testified that "there were then twenty-five families settled in the town of Rockingham, who had already cultivated lands, and had so far improved them by actual settlement as to fulfill the conditions of the charter;" and this testimony was so conclusive that all further attempts to render the charter void were abandoned, and Rockingham became a town.

In early times the courts of this district were held at Chester. But as a large majority of the settlers were located on or near the Connecticut, they very naturally made an effort to have the courts assemble at some more convenient point. In conformity with this plan, the inhabitants of the town assembled on the 2d day of December, 1771, and "agreed to pay 70 pounds, lawful currency, towards the erection of county buildings, provided Rockingham be made the shire town." This was a liberal offer, but "by extraordinary exertions and by the influence of persons in authority," the courts were removed to Westminster, where was erected the court house which was afterward made famous by the ' Westminster massacre."

At this time the courts were managed by officers of the King. The people were divided into two parties, Whigs and Tories, the former comprising those who were opposed to all authority not in conformity with the Continental Congress, while the latter abided by the authority of the crown, and considered that a royal proclamation was all that was necessary to keep the people in subjection to the King's officers.

In 1774, a committee of correspondence in regard to the friends of liberty was appointed, and on this committee were Moses Wright and Jonathan Burt of Rockingham. It was their purpose to throw off the yoke of despotism, and to secure this purpose they had resolved that neither life or property should be spared.

On Sunday, March 12, 1775, a party of Whigs from Rockingham went down to Westminster to dissuade the King's officers from opening the courts, Monday; and thus were the people of this town among those friends of freedom who first resisted the King's officers, causing the first blood of the Revolution to be shed on "Court House Hill," in the town of Westminster. Capt. Stephen Sargeant, with his company of Rockingham militia, assisted in driving the court party from the house, and in securing them after the massacre; thus they lighted the torch of war that soon after blazed at Lexington and Bunker Hill.

Several of the Rockingham militia were wounded in this affray, and Philip Safford, lieutenant of the company, when surrounded by the Tories, knocked down ten of them with his bludgeon, and although he received several severe cuts from the sword of Sheriff Patterson, retired from the field daring the whole posse of King George to combat the Rockingham militia.

The Indians when on the war path, or when on hunting and fishing excursions, always halted a while at Bellows Falls to rest, and consequently the town was slow in growth, and continually disturbed by marauding parties.

In the year 1755, one Joseph

Blanchard "numbered all the inhabitants from Brattleboro to Hartford in Vermont" and reported "that there were not more than 60 families then settled in all that territory."

In the spring of 1704 the war party that went from Canada to destroy Deerfield, Mass., passed through Rockingham on their return. The day was Sunday, and they stopped to give their prisoners an opportunity to rest.

While stopping there the Rev. John Williams—the ancestor of the Indian branch of the Williams family, which has been famous on account of the Rev. Eleazer Williams, who attempted to identify himself and Louis XVII, the lost dauphin of France,—preached a sermon, which was undoubtedly the first sermon that was preached in this town. His text was Lam. 1:18.

Said township was by charter, bounded as follows: Beginning at the northeast corner of Westminster and running up by the Connecticut river until it extends six miles upon a straight line northerly to a stake and stones upon the bank of said river, in Hickup meadow,—thence running due west six miles to a stake and stones—thence running southerly six miles to the northwesterly corner of Westminster—thence running due east to the bounds first mentioned; and that the same be and is incorporated into a township by the name of Rockingham, and the inhabitants that do or shall hereafter inhabit said township are hereby declared to be enfranchised with and instituted to all the privileges and immunities that other towns within our said Province by law exercise and enjoy.

GRANTEES.

The names of the grantees of Rockingham, under the charter of George II, were as follows: Samuel Johnson, Ezra Farnsworth, Isaac Parker, John Kilburn, Sylvanus Hastings, Josiah Willard, Nathan

Benning Wentworth was commissioned governor of the Province of New Hampshire, July 3, 1741. He manifested considerable interest in the early settlement of Rockingham because he knew that large quantities of the best masting timber that could be obtained in the province were growing here. He resided at Portsmouth, N. H., but he had heard such favorable reports of the timber on "the river of the pines" that he came here to make personal examination, and to take measures "for the better securing the masting trees from being cut and felled." He caused the first saw-mills in town to be erected, one of which was located on Williams' river at the place now known as Brockway's mills, and the other near the mouth of Saxtons river. Gov. Wentworth received large official fees from the King of England, and also invariably reserved for himself in every township that he granted, 500 acres of the best and richest land for the purposes of speculation. When Rockingham was chartered, John Kilburn visited Gov. Wentworth and represented that the best lands lay back of the river. But the governor could not be induced to make his reservation except where he thought there was timber. Kilburn, failing to secure the lots he desired here, changed his tactics and pretended to be very anxious to secure some lots on the other side of the river, directly opposite the falls; the governor was equally loth to give up his choice of lots on that side, thinking that the best land must be near the falls; but he gave Kilburn the choice of any lots above or below the lands lying and being on Fall mountain. He finally concluded to take lands below, securing the best lands in Walpole and some on Williams' river, while the governor took the mountain range which was comparatively worthless, and to which John Kilburn gave the name of "Governor's Garden," a name which is retained to this day.

The town charter specified that the "first legal meeting of the proprietors" should be held on the last Wednesday of March, 1753. In conformity to this provision a meeting was held on the 28th of March, and Benjamin Bellows presided as moderator, in accordance with a provision of the charter to that effect. At this meeting it was voted "To lay out to each proprietor a house lot, and that the 72 house lots be laid out in three or more several places. That all the meadows, or intervale land lying on Connecticut river and up Williams' river, he divided into 72 lots, being one for each proprietor." A committee consisting of Andrew Gardner, Benj. Bellows, Jonathan Bigelow, Stephen Farnsworth and Asahel Stebens, was chosen for laying out the lands; and this committee was also authorized "to lay out all ye meadow and intervale land lying upon all ye small rivers, into 72 lots, and to take a plan of all ye lands in said town." The committee was also directed to "couple all ye various lots into equal divisions, in all making 72, so that ye drawing might be made all at the same time, so that in drawing, each of the 72 original proprietors would at once come into possession of all his lands. In consequence of this arrangement every proprietor received a house-lot, a river-lot and lot on some small stream as his equal share in the lands of the town. The committee to lay out lands was also directed by the proprietors "To select and lay out six acres for a meeting house place." It was voted that if any man should move upon any lands in the town before the meadow lands were laid out, he should have the liberty to take the lot upon which he had moved or done labor, provided it be on Williams river, without drawing.

Previous to adjournment Benjamin Bellows was chosen proprietor's clerk and collector of taxes. Andrew Gardner, Sylvanus Hastings, and John Grant were chosen assessors.

At this meeting the town was first properly and legally organized.

The original proprietors wished for perfect equality in dividing the town lands, and they had agreed to be satisfied with such lots as fell to them in the drawing. Selfishness was not so rampant in the hearts of the people then as it is now. Their sense of mutual dependence on each other for safety begat a sentiment of common interest in the general prosperity and welfare of the community. The settlers came together as one family and decided that each member should share equally the privileges of their joint proprietorship. Only a few town officers were needed. The proprietors were content to begin their town existence with a clerk, a committee, a collector of taxes, and town assessors.

May 4, 1754, Benjamin Bellows, clerk of the town, gave notice by request of ten of the legal inhabitants, that there would be a town meeting at the house of Mr. Jonathan Bigelow, in said town, in the Province of New Hampshire, on Wednesday, the 29th day of May. At this meeting Esquire Bellows presided, according to the provision of the charter, and this aided him to become a great man among the early settlers. It was his good fortune to become possessed of many valuable lots in Rockingham, though he resided in Walpole. After accepting the report of the committee to lay out lots, "ye lands were drawn by lots as laid out." Benjamin Bellows took the lower meadow and the lands round said meadow for 21 house lots, he also took land on Saxton's river, in all 48 acres, for 16 three acre meadow lots, "as coupled to ye house lots afore named," and he also had "liberty to pick five more three acre meadow lots in any undivided meadow lands where he might choose to select the same." Bonds were required and given by all the drawers of house lots to have men on them by the last of March, 1755; otherwise the lots would revert to the town. He aided materially in the early settlements and was highly respected as a citizen and town officer. From the fact that he owned the lower meadow, (a part of which is owned by his descendants to this day), the Great Falls finally came to be called Bellows Falls.

At the May meeting it was voted that six acres of land be taken from the north end of house lot No. 3, being 33 rods square, and that the same be set off for the use of the town, for the purpose of buiding thereon a meeting-house, and that a road twelve rods wide be laid out through said land. It was voted that a tax of 20 shillings be paid by each proprietor for the purpose of making roads.

Benjamin Bellows and John Kilburn were directly and largely interested in the settlement and prosperity of Rockingham. They resided in Walpole, where may still be found numerous descendants of each, but owned lands here. They were public spirited men and in full sympathy with the best interests of all the settlers in this vicinity. They provided places of shelter and safety, where the people could easily defend themselves against the attacks of the Indians; and in times of danger they invariably resorted to the same.

The old Bellows fort stood on the north end of a hill near the house where the family afterwards resided, and which is still occupied by a grandson of Esq. Bellows. It was well located for defense against the Indians, and commanded an extensive view of the adjoining country.

He kept a large number of men in his employ, all of whom were well armed; and he also had one heavy iron gun, furnished by the royal government for the public protection.

John Kilburn's house which partook somewhat of the nature of a fort without being one, was nearly two miles further north, located on the low terrace. A desperate Indian fight occurred here Aug. 17, 1755. Four hundred Indians demanded of Kilburn that he and his party should surrender. But, although his force, all told, consisted of but four men and two women, he indignantly refused to surrender, and in reply to the chief who promised "good quarter," he replied, "be-gone you black rascal, or I'll quarter you!" The fight immediately commenced. The Indians fired on the house from the high terrace on the east, and the roof was soon completely riddled. The women worked with a will loading the guns, of which they had a number, and casting bullets. They melted up their pewter spoons and dishes, and when these were exhausted they suspended blankets in the chamber to catch the Indian balls which were sent back with deadly effect into the savage ranks. The unequal contest continued all the afternoon till nearly dark, when the Indians, thinking that Kilburn must have a regiment of men in the house, gave up the fight and returned to Canada, and never dared to molest Walpole again. Only one person in the house was injured. A man named Peak was wounded in the hip by carelessly exposing himself at a port-hole, and afterward died for want of medical treatment.

John Kilburn lived to the good old age of 85 years; died April, 1789.

The first bridge across the Connecticut was built at Bellows Falls in 1785, and till 1796 was the only bridge crossing the river.

The building of this bridge was a great achievement. Isaiah Thomas in the Massachusetts Spy, Feb. 10, 1785, notices it as follows: "We hear from Walpole, State of New Hampshire, that Col. Enoch Hale hath erected a bridge across Connecticut river on the Great Falls, at his own expense. This bridge is thought to exceed any ever built in America in strength, beauty and public utility. This bridge is 360 feet in length and about 60 feet above high water mark.

Hale's bridge, as it was called, was 365 feet long, and was supported in the middle by a pier built on the large rock which divides the channel into two streams at high water. From the bridge an interesting view of the falls was had. The falls were then regarded as presenting "one of the most stupendous spectacles in nature." At that time the scene was much wilder than now. Large trees covered the banks to the water's edge—the volume of water was greater than now and more rapid. The Great Falls as well as the bridge attracted much attention from the traveling public, and travelers made it a point to stop and examine the wonders of the place.

After long-continued rains, and when the snow melts suddenly in the spring, the river rises very rapidly and often to a great height. Freshets occur yearly, and are sometimes so extensive that great damage is done.

About 1797 there was a great freshet which carried away the upper locks and did much damage.

Yet it was not without its benefits. At that time there was (and is now) a place known as the "stone-hole," from which stone had been quarried to build a dam near where the saw-mill now stands. Below this dam was a swampy mud-hole. The freshet carried this dam away and with it vast quantities of rocks and earth which completely filled the swamp and formed a tract of valuable land whereon shops and mills were built which stood many years till destroyed by fire.

Since then several severe freshets have occurred, noticeable among which was one in May, 1818, one in September, 1828, another in February, 1839, when much damage was done to mills and bridges. At this time a bridge over the Connecticut, at Charlestown was carried away and came down the river in two parts, the largest part swept majestically over the dam and rapids. In 1841 there was another destructive freshet. The guard gates of the canal were not equal to the pressure, and gave way, letting a volume of water through that made a breach in the canal that soon extended from 15 to 100 feet in width. The quantity of earth moved, was estimated at 7000 cubic yards, and the damage to the canal and locks at $3000. The whole rise of water in the eddy below the falls was 22½ feet. In April, 1862, was a freshet which threw this and all previously recorded freshets completely in the shade. The water rose to a point higher than it was ever known to reach before. Great alarm prevailed concerning the safety of many places in and about the village of Bellows Falls.

THE GREAT FRESHET OF OCT 3, 1869.

The damage done to the town was almost beyond compute. At Bartonsville the Williams river overflowed its banks and made a short cut across a bow, sweeping away the highway, portions of the railroad track, the depot and several dwellings. Bridges were lifted from their foundations and swept down the stream. The water inundated the meadows and carried away a great many fields of corn. Saxton's river rose with a sudden fierceness that was terribly destructive to property. The village of Saxton's River suffered severely, the damage done to that place being estimated at $75,000. A wool-pulling establishment, belonging to L. C. Hubbard, was carried away, with all its contents. Mr. Hubbard's loss was estimated at about $15,000. Messrs. J. A. Farnsworth, J. F. Alexander, and Benjamin Scofield lost heavily. A fine meadow farm a short distance below the village, belonging to a young man named Barber, was damaged to the amount of $5000. The river left its channel and cut a new one the entire length of the meadow.

It was one of the most remarkable floods of the present century. A large number of lives were lost.

TOWN REPRESENTATION AND TOWN CLERKS.

The State of Vermont began to legislate for the people in 1778. The General Assembly held its first session at Windsor, commencing March 12, and continuing 15 days. The first Assembly passed a few temporary laws but we find no record of them. They resolved, however, "that the plain word of God, as contained in the Scriptures, to be the law of the land."

Rockingham sent as delegates to this convention two men of considerable influence, Jona. Webb and Reuben Jones.

The following persons have represented this town in the General Assembly, and we add with them the names of the several town clerks.

Benjamin Bellows was clerk for the town proprietors from 1752 to 1760, when Joshua Webb was chosen first town clerk. He held the office one year, when Moses Wright was elected. From 1779 to 1788 the town sent two representatives, since which time it has sent but one.

TOWN HALL, BELLOWS FALLS.

ROCKINGHAM.—Continued.

BY B. H. ALLBEE.

Geologically, Rockingham is well worth the attention of the most learned in that science. Many of the characteristics in this respect are strongly marked. The rocks are mostly azoic, and the principal veins are gneiss, what Prof. Hitchcock called the Green Mountain gneiss, calciferous mica schist, clay slate, and talcose schist, distributed in parallel ranges extending from north to south and extending from west to east, in the order named, varying in width from one to three miles. What is known as the fourth geological section of Vermont begins at Bellows Falls, and many excellent specimens have been placed in the State cabinet from here. Twenty varieties of minerals are found, some very rare and beautiful.

Great changes have taken place in the Connecticut valley in past ages and at Bellows Falls is seen the remains of the cause which led to the last great change in the valley above. The conclusion is that the Connecticut valley is the product of erosion, extending over millions of years probably, and that the surface, if not the bed of the lake, which formerly filled the present valley, was once as high as Ascutney mountain, and the only possible outlet for this vast body of water was at Union, a mountain town of New Hampshire, which has a water-worn gorge through which the waters of Connecticut river once flowed over into the Merrimac valley beyond. At that time there was a lake above the present falls 800 feet deep, or as deep as Mt. Kilburn is high. Gradually the rocky barrier was worn away and the succession of terraces marks the various levels of the lake as the waters settled from year to year.

These terraces are objects of common observation to all who visit the town, and extend not only along Connecticut river, but alongside Williams and Saxton's river. Between Williams and Connecticut rivers there is a clearly defined sea beach. This beach is now 700 feet above the level of the ocean.

CAMBRIDGEPORT.

This is a post village situated on Saxton's river, three miles west of Saxton's River, containing about twenty dwellings, one church, stores and a soapstone manufactory and other necessary shops. It was named from J. T. Cambridge, who began the clothiers business there in 1825, and was named by Esquire Reed, then living in Saxton's River.

The first settlement of Cambridgeport was in 1792. A Mr. Adams went from the settlement at Saxton's River, making his way by marked trees, to what is now Cambridgeport and built a hut, moving his family there in the same year. He was dissatisfied, or other causes conspired to cause him to repent of his undertaking, for he remained only a short time, and no other attempts at settlement were made for some years. Men by the name of Bulling, in 1810, bought a tract of 1000 acres, including the present site of the village, on which they erected some mills. In 1812 Nathaniel Bennett bought the mills and built two dwelling houses, and in 1814 Simeon Evans opened the first store. The same year the first road was laid out, running east of the present factory pond and over the hills into Grafton. The same Mr. Evans built a tavern. He died in 1819. As before stated, Mr. Cambridge began the clothiers trade in 1825, but soon after fire destroyed the mills with a quantity of cloth. In 1838, the present Union church was built and the Methodists, Baptists, Universalists and Congregationalists took turns in supplying preaching. The same year, a factory was erected by Royal Earl, John Campbell, Josiah Stoddard and Roswell Minard. This company worked it a few years, when it fell into the hands of Ithamer Balls, he sold it to George Perry, Benjamin Schofield and others. It was burned in 1860, but was immediately rebuilt and it was finally burned, never to be rebuilt. A man by the name of Cochran was the first blacksmith in 1819, and a hatter, Mr. Mitchell, came the same year; a man by the name of Howard opened a law office there in 1840, but soon died.

ROCKINGHAM.

Rockingham is a post village in the centre of the town, on a branch of Williams river. It was formerly quite a business center. It has a Congregational church, built in 1787, the oldest in town and with the possible exception of one or two, is the oldest in Vermont. Inside, the old fashioned pews, the high pulpit with suspended sounding board and the gallery on three sides. The village derives its chief interest from the fact that it contained the town house and in early times the people convened there for public worship. Since the coming of the railroad, the village, though only half a mile from the station, has declined in importance and the business mainly goes to other and larger places.

is a small post village on Williams river and in the extreme north-western part of the town. It is little more than a hamlet now, though previous to 1869 it was an important and growing manufacturing centre. It was named from Jerry Barton, one of the first settlers in that locality. Now it has a railroad station, post and express offices, one or two small manufactories and 20 to 30 dwellings. It is a busy place, and is rich in agricultural resources.

Its manufacturing was growing, up to October, 1869, but the flood of that year stopped the growth of the place. There is one school, but no established church, though religious services are frequently held in the school house by clergymen from different parts of the town.

BROCKWAY'S MILLS

is a hamlet located on Williams river between Rockingham and Bartonsville.

The water power is furnished by a fall in Williams river of 20 feet or more, with a gorge below. The mills a few years ago manufactured wood buttons and the bell-shaped ornaments which were japanned and had the appearance of jet. When the work was begun there was only one other shop like it in the United States.

The first census of Rockingham was taken in 1771 and the population then numbered 225, 50 of whom were married and heads of families. The enumeration was as follows: 48 white males under 16 years of age; 62 over 16; 4 over 60; 52 white females under 16; 57 over 16; one colored male and one colored female. From that year forward the population increased rapidly, and in 20 years, 1791, had increased to 1235, and in 1890 it was over 5000.

Joshua Webb and Reuben Jones were the first delegates from Rockingham to the first general assembly of Vermont, which convened at Windsor, March 12, 1778.

DR. RUEBEN JONES

was one of the early settlers of Rockingham and for some time was the only physician and surgeon in town. The doctor was a man of extreme patriotism and a pronounced whig. He was clerk of the meeting held at Westminster, Apr. 11, 1775, to "devise means to resist the progress of oppression." In company with Joshua Webb he was a delegate to the Dorset convention of Sept. 25, 1776, and for three years represented Rockingham in the general assembly. At the time of the court troubles in Westminster, Dr. Jones mounted his horse and rode all the way to Dummerston to call the people to arms to resist the encroachments of the party of oppression. In all questions where patriotism was involved, the doctor was found on the side of his country. He was hospitable and generous to the extreme, and used money so lavishly that he became deeply loaded with debt and was confined in the debtors prison in 1785. He escaped and was re-arrested but was finally rescued from the officers by his friends. A short time after he removed to Chester; Dr. Cutler having arrived in town; and, afterward represented Chester in the general assembly. In character, he was an enthusiast and always warmly advocated any cause he espoused and no doubt did much to aid his town and state in some of those dark hours before, during and after the Revolution.

ELIAS OLCOTT.

The name of Olcott has been familiar in this town since 1763, when Elias Olcott came from Bolton, Conn., at the age of 19 years. He married Sybil Dutton who died Aug. 27, 1802, aged 75 years. Mr. Olcott died Oct. 29, 1794. His son, Elias, was born in Rockingham and married Fanny Hastings of Charlestown, N. H., he died in 1854, aged 84. Elias, a son of Elias, jr., was born in town and married Charlotte Divoll of this town, who died Apr. 7, 1858. Oscar D., a son, lives on Atkinson Street in Bellows Falls and is prominent in town affairs. He is now treasurer of the town and enjoys the wealth that has accumulated through successive generations of Olcotts. The farm on which the first Olcott settled, still remains in the family, having never passed from their hands since 1763.

EBENEZER ALLBEE

was the original of a vast family of Allbees who sprang from this town. He was born in Massachusetts and came to Rockingham previous to the revolution, and in the military officers of Windham county are found the names of many Allbees who achieved distinction in patriotic service. Ebenezer married Rachel Avery of Rockingham, and raised a family of 10 children. Ebenezer's son John was born in Rockingham Feb. 18, 1778, and raised a family of 12 children. Lewis, the fifth son, now lives in town, and Burton H., a grandson of Obadiah, the third son, is also a resident. John died at the age of 58. Samuel, the oldest son of John, lived on the old homestead until his death, which occurred three years ago, at the advanced age of 95. A daughter of Samuel, Jane, married Carlton E. Webb, a descendant of the Webbs who played such an important part in early days. Lewis married a granddaughter of Capt. William Thayer, Sarah K., and they now live on the farm upon which Capt. William Thayer settled when he came from Massachusetts in 1789. He has accumulated a large property. Children: Leonard, Ann and William Pitt.

There was another branch of the family founded by Deacon Albee, who came from Massachusetts in early times and settled on the Walter Wiley place. He had a son John, who married Sophia Smith, and raised a numerous family. The Albees have always taken a prominent part in the affairs of the town, and a large number are now settled within the borders of the town, comprising not only farmers, but lawyers, doctors, journalists and merchants.

JOSHUA WEBB

was a native of Windham, Conn., and came to Westminster in 1766. In 1767 he removed to the northwest part of Rockingham and stayed a year, after which he returned to Westminster, where he remained until the spring of 1777, and settled on the farm which has been in the Webb family ever since, six generations having lived upon it. Joshua Webb was a remarkable man in many ways. He was the first representative and held that office for 15 successive years. He married Hannah Abbe of Windham, Conn., by whom he had 11 children, all born in Connecticut. He died in this town April 17, 1808, aged 86. His wife died in 1815, aged 90. His son Calvin came to Rockingham with him and settled on the farm with his father. Ethan B., son of Calvin, was born on the same farm and spent his life there, dying March 15, 1872, aged 88 years. He married Fanny Burnham of Chester, who died Sept. 24, 1876, aged 79. Three children, Sarah, Carleton E. and Emely, have always lived in this town. Carleton is a prominent man in town and is now town officer. There are other members of the family in this town and those immediately around, all of whom are much respected. Much of the ability of the ancestors has been transmitted to the descendants. Such families never die out, but are always remembered.

JONATHAN BARRY

was a native of Lynn, Mass., and came to Rockingham among the first settlers. He bought a large tract of land in the southwest corner of the town, which he divided equally among his sons, Samuel, John, Joel and Asa. Mr. Barry was one of the first deacons of the old Congregational church. He took a conspicuous part in church and town affairs. His son John married Thankful L. Cone of Westminster. Joel, born in Rockingham, married Hannah, daughter of Samuel Ober, and had three children, all of whom are now living, Kendall P., in Saxton's River, Mary A., in Marlboro, N. H., and Lucius M., in Wardsboro, Vt. Kendall P., who married Clarissa Perry, a native of Hancock, N. H., has two sons living in this town, Lucius P. and Milton P. Milton P. is a prominent business man of Saxton's River.

SAMUEL OBER

was born in Jeffrey, N. H., and came to Rockingham in early times crossing the Connecticut on a raft of logs in company with Messrs. Bellows and Lovell. He first settled near the centre of the town, but afterward removed to Saxton's River and bought 200 acres of land which he occupied while he lived, and died at the age of 88 years. His son Isaac was born in town and spent most of his life here with the exception of a year or more spent at Manchester, Vt., where he married Lydia Wilkins. He died in 1859 or 1860. The Ober family is well known and has many influential members.

BRIGADICE BROWN

came from Cohasset, Mass., and was one of the first settlers of Springfield, Vt., to which town he went on horseback, with his young wife, and a party of friends in 1792. They camped in the forest while the company prepared log houses, and afterward lived in the wilderness and reared a family of children. Abel, one of the younger sons, married Priscilla Hodgkins of Chester and raised a family of ten children, one of whom, Amos H., the youngest son, is now a resident of Bellows Falls. He was born in Springfield. In 1878 he bought, in company with his son, a stove and tin business in Bellows Falls, which they conducted for some years. Mr. Brown has been bailiff of Bellows Falls corporation and has held other important offices of trust and responsibility. He has two children, Nellie and Frank H., who was at one time secretary to Gov. Farnham and later was proprietor of the Bellows Falls Times. He shared with his father in the hardware business, and is now one of the proprietors of the Waban Paper mills at Charles River, Mass. He has a wife and one child.

SAMUEL AND RUFUS GUILD

were twin brothers born in Dedham, Mass., where they married Annie and Mary Hoadley, sisters, natives of New Hampshire, and in 1804 they came to Bellows Falls engaging in the lumber business. Twenty years later Samuel was killed while at work. His son Samuel, was a paper maker and set up the first paper machine ever used in Vermont. For many years he was a foreman in the mills at Bellows Falls, where he married Roxanna Stevens and died at an advanced age. He had several sons and daughters, of whom George O. Guild, who has been a merchant in Bellows Falls for 30 years, and was postmaster under Cleveland. Mr. Guild has recently purchased 15 acres of land and intends to build a paper mill at an early day.

DR. SETH M. BLAKE

is a son of Joseph and Prudence Blake and was born in Brookfield, Vt., Aug. 21, 1817. In 1839 he came to Bellows Falls and began work in the office of the Bellows Falls Gazette, published by John W. Moore. In June, 1843, in company with G. F. Bailey, he purchased the Gazette published it in company one year, when in 1844 he purchased Mr. Bailey's interest and conducted it alone until 1846.

In 1847 he opened a dental office in Bellows Falls and practiced his profession for 30 years. During these years his work as a lecturer and writer attests to his ability. He married Martha J. Glover of Concord, N. H., Aug. 16, 1842, and they have a family of six sons and two daughters, of whom seven, as well as the parents are yet alive. Frederick J. is an artist at Bellows Falls, and is making himself famous. Others are in responsible and lucrative positions.

Dr. Blake was the first man to pen a word in favor of the extension of the Fitchburg railroad from Keene here. It was in an editorial published in his paper in 1843, and he has lived to see the town entered from four different directions, connecting it with all the great commercial centres of New England and New York. He has always been a student, more especially on astronomical subjects. At his home on Atkinson street in Bellows Falls he has an observatory on his house, in which is mounted a telescope powerful enough to enable one to view the more important celestial bodies.

DANIEL CAMPBELL, M. D.,

was born in Westminster, March 8, 1820. His father was Edward R. Campbell. The family are directly descended from the house of Argyle in Scotland. Daniel is a relative of Dr. John Campbell of Putney and Dr. Alexander Campbell of Rockingham. Dr. Campbell was educated in the common schools and at the Burr & Burton academy at Manchester, Vt. He spent his vacations in teaching, to help himself along. At the Vermont Medical college at Woodstock and at the Pittsfield, Mass., Medical college he obtained his medical education, receiving his degree from the latter place. For a year or more after his graduation, in 1842, he was demonstrator of anatomy at the Berkshire Medical college, Pittsfield, from which he had just graduated, and was associated in practice with Prof. H. H. Childs, at that time lieutenant-governor of Massachusetts. He left Pittsfield and came to Westminster, where he married Julia A. Hall, daughter of Capt. Edward Hall. They have a family of eight children, most of whom are now living. He practiced in Westminster West ten years and then moved to Saxton's River, where he has been in practice 35 years. Some years ago he was offered the chair of theory and practice at Dartmouth college, but preferred his country practice. He represented Rockingham in the Legislature in 1864-65. In 1880 he was defeated for Congress by James M. Tyler of Brattleboro.

Of his family there are now living Flora E., wife of Henry Frost; Harriet J., wife of Preston H. Hadley, cashier of the Bellows Falls National bank; Clara O., wife of George R. Wales, proprietor of one of the leading dry goods houses of Bellows Falls, and Edward R., who follows his father's profession at Bellows Falls. Two children died young and two are at home in Saxton's River. Dr. Campbell has made a reputation which few physicians in the country are able to attain.

HON. JABEZ DELANO BRIDGMAN was born in Grafton, June 10, 1828, and was a son of Dr. B. H. Bridgman. He received an academic education, and when 20 years old entered the office of C. I. Walker and George B. Kellogg of Saxton's River, as a law student, and when one year later Walker & Kellogg dissolved partnership, he accompanied Mr. Walker to Bellows Falls, where he completed his studies and was admitted to the bar in 1851. About that time Mr. Walker accepted a professorship in a Detroit, Mich., law school, and Mr. Bridgman purchased his library and continued his practice. A few years after he was married to Sarah, daughter of William Conant of Bellows Falls. In 1857-58 he represented the town in the Legislature, and was elected senator in 1880. He enlisted in the 16th Vt. Vols., was chosen adjutant but served only a few months when he resigned and returned to his law practice. He died, April 7, 1887. His partner, G. A. Weston, continues the business.

JAMES HENRY WILLIAMS was born in Chester, Jan. 16, 1813. In February, 1834, he came to Bellows Falls and entered the employ of the Bellows Falls Bank, remaining there until June, 1839, when he was elected cashier of the bank at Woodstock. That position he held until June, 1841, when he was chosen cashier of the Cheshire bank at Keene. In 1847 he was selected as cashier of the National bank of Bellows Falls, succeeding Hon. William Henry, who was elected to Congress that year. In 1872, Mr. Williams was elected president of the bank, holding the position up to his death, Aug. 13, 1881. In 1847 he was mainly instrumental in the formation of the Bellows Falls Savings institution, of which he was treasurer for many years. He was instrumental in founding the Episcopal school, St. Agnes' Halls, and in the erection of Union and Centennial blocks. At the time of his death he was an officer in every railroad company whose lines run into Bellows Falls, and had been a director in the Rutland railroad from the formation of the company in 1847.

His son, James H., is now president of the bank, and prominently identified with the Episcopal church, and to his late wife is due the beautiful chapel and parish house of Immanuel church. She gave the money for its erection and furnishing, but lived only a short time after its dedication. Mr. Williams is an officer in a number of railroad companies and a member of the State Legislature.

Another son, John H., is secretary of the Bellows Falls Savings institution. He has been elected a director in the Vermont Valley Railroad company.

HON. A. N. SWAIN

was born in Reading, Vt., July 12, 1828, and when 19 years old went into the Journal office at Windsor to learn the printer's trade. After serving his apprenticeship, he went to Brattleboro where he resided over two years. In 1856 he married Susan W. Putnam, and came to Bellows Falls and began the publication of the Bellows Falls Times, of which he was editor and proprietor 33 years, selling out in September, 1888 to Frank H. Brown. Mr. Swain was an able newspaper writer and always stood for what was best and truest in men and party principles. All through the dark hours before, during and after the war, the Bellows Falls Times spoke fearlessly for the right. Its editor became the leader of the better part of the population and his reputation as a fearless exponent of principles extended far beyond the confines of his town and the utterances of the Times were quoted far and near. Swain of the Times; McIndoe of the Vermont Journal; Stone of the St. Johnsbury Caledonian and Greene of the Woodstock Standard! What a quartette of noble workers in the cause of truth and right. Today only Mr. Swain is left, but the works of all live after them.

In 1870 he was a member of the constitutional convention, and met as colleagues, such men as Hon. Edward J. Phelps and others of almost similar prominence, in revising the constitution of the State.

He considers it the most important appointment of his life.

In 1872 Mr. Swain represented this town in the Legislature and again in 1876. In 1888 he was elected to the State Senate and served one term. He was appointed on the Normal School educational committee. He is now enjoying the well earned fruits of his labors, in his pleasant home on Westminster Street in Bellows Falls. There he and his excellent wife are spending their life's decline in peace and enjoyment. Mr. Swain is a justice of the peace, which makes him police tustice of Bellows Falls. He is president of the Rockingham Free Library association. He is a living example of the prizes which can be won in country journalism. Mr. Swain is entitled to the comfort he is now enjoying.

MILITARY.

In Revolutionary times Rockingham was a strong Whig town and very decided opposition to the Tories was manifested, and the people of the town were among the first to resist the king's officers. The Rockingham militia, composed of 40 men or over, commanded by Capt. Stephen Sargent, aided in driving the British from the Westminster court house the 13th day of March, 1775, when the Revolutionary war really opened. Philip Safford, a lieutenant in the company, fought bravely while surrounded by Tories and though badly wounded by Sheriff Patterson's sword, it is said that he "knocked down ten of his adversaries with his bludgeon, making good his escape and daring the whole posse of King George to fight the Rockingham militia." A committee of inspection consisting of Moses Wright, Joseph Wood, William Simonds, Oliver Lovell and Ebenezer Fuller were chosen in July, 1775, and at the same time the following military officers were appointed: Joseph Wood, captain; Charles Richard, lieutenant; and Isaac Stowell, ensign. The meeting of the committee was held at Jehiel Webb's house, and voted "to deal summarily with all who should speak against the common cause." This committee was dismissed several times and as often chosen again, indicating that there must have been much opposition to its existence or its actions, or both.

The loyalty of the mass of the people never was questioned, however, and in 1777 a meeting was held to consider means for levying men to fill Col. Warner's regiment, or to raise money for that purpose. It was voted, however, "to do our equal proportion in maintaining and supporting the just cause of America." Thus was the town ranged on the side of the struggling federation of States and cast its lot with the whole State in aiding to carry on the war. Another meeting was held June 23, and the town decided to receive ammunition consisting of powder, bullets and flints, of the committee, sent from the State of New York. Up to this meeting the names of 55 men are found who had taken the oath of allegiance. The names of 20 are recorded as having marched to Ticonderoga and 22 marched to Manchester, some probably being present at the battle of Bennington. The records do not show how extensive may have been other soldiers from this town during the Revolution, but, inasmuch as loyal men everywhere gave up every other consideration to fight for the independence of the nation, it is probable that many a sanguinary Revolutionary battlefield saw some of Rockingham's sturdy sons.

Whatever may have been the state of feeling in the war of 1812, no record appears that the town took any particular part in that period of fighting. Indeed, the war of 1812 was so much a war on the water that there may have been no call for any special display of patriotism on the part of Rockingham men.

In the Mexican war a few are found, but not so many as in the Revolution. One reason probably was, that there were more men and the war was so short fewer were needed, comparatively. A few soldiers of that war are probably buried in some of our churchyards, but none are left to tell the tale now inside the limits of the town.

When the battle cry was again sounded in 1861, the men of Rockingham responded nobly. In common with every town in the State the insult to the flag stirred their hearts and sent a wave of patriotism over the town, which culminated in a meeting, April 24, 1861, at which among others, the following resolution was adopted:

"Resolved: That we, citizens of Bellows Falls, here in meeting assembled, do pledge to every patriot of Bellows Falls who will volunteer to defend our country from assaults of rebels, that we will see that his wants and the wants of his family while he is engaged in the service of his country are supplied."

The exertions in raising money for bounties, enlisting troops, private subscriptions, and the aid of the women, will compare with that for dozens of other Vermont towns. Under the spirit and impulse of the resolution quoted, the town furnished 269 men, among whom 39 were substitutes, and 32 citizens paid commutation fees. The details of those dark days, when the stability of the Union wavered in the balance, are the same as for every town. Hope, fear, doubt, hung alternately over the hearts of the people, until the final stand at Appomattox Court House, and Lee's army laid down its arms forever. Then the Rockingham boys came "marching home" and settled on the farms, or went into the workshop once more. From that time on the history of the town has been one of peace.

The most conspicuous soldier developed by the rebellion was Gen. Lewis A. Grant, now assistant secretary of war. He was an attorney in Belows Falls about war times, but rose in the service to be a brigadier general, and commanded the Old Vermont Brigade, which became so famous in fight. Others just as gal-	lant and brave bared their breasts to the storm, but General Grant was the greatest among men who were all great.

BELLOWS FALLS.

By B. H. ALLBEE.

BELLOWS FALLS.

Bellows Falls has no separate history such as most villages have. In the light of history the village is a part of the town, and its records are a part of the records of the town. It has been impossible to separate the two so as to make a clear sketch which should contain only Bellows Falls history. Rockingham, the township, is one of the best situated in Vermont. The falls in the river at this point make a water power hard to be equaled, and the junction of the two valleys afford the opportunity for railroad development which has been taken advantage of in the past two decades.

The early settlers were from Massachusetts, and began work in the town of Rockingham as early as 1753, and it is supposed that their first work was done not far from the present site of Bellows Falls village. The records have the deeds recorded near the village at an early date.

CHURCHES.

The first church organized within the limits of Bellows Falls was Immanuel Episcopal church, founded by Dr. Samuel Cutler and 17 others, in 1798. For many years the society met for worship with only the services of a lay reader, and no record of any clergyman appears previous to 1810. Up to 1816 the meetings were held in the centre of the town, but March 20, 1816, a meeting was held to "Devise means to procure funds for a church building." A committee composed of Dr. Cutler, Edward H. Campbell, and William Atkinson were appointed, and from that time the society has been located in the village. January 15, 1817, the church was named Immanuel church, and Rev. George T. Chapman invited to become its pastor, and a church building was erected. July 1, 1863, it was decided to build a new church, and plans and specifications for a Gothic church of stone to seat about 500 were obtained and work begun. December 25, 1867, the new church was opened for service for the first time. During the winter of 1890 the parish house and Schouler Memorial chapel, given by Mrs. James H. Williams, was dedicated, and now the church has buildings and grounds valued at nearly $75,000.

The Methodist Episcopal church was organized in 1836 by Rev. Elijah Mason, the first pastor. It consisted then of 42 members, including persons from Rockingham and Bellows Falls. They built their church the same year, but it was remodeled in 1881. It will now seat 400 people and is valued at $10,000. The society has a bequest of $1500.

John A. Furmworth

St. Charles Roman Catholic church was organized in 1857, with 100 members. Rev. Charles O'Reilly was the first pastor. They have a beautiful church edifice and a membership of 800 or more. Rev. Edward Reynolds is the present pastor.

The First Universalist parish of Bellows Falls was organized in January, 1879, by Rev. J. H. Farnsworth. The growth of the society has been rapid and it now numbers upwards of 100 members. The society owns a beautiful house of worship.

SCHOOLS.

Bellows Falls early acknowledged the need of schools. It is not known just where the first school house was located, nor when founded, but it is safe to say that it was not long after the town itself was founded. There is now a graded school with a high school in connection, where one may fit for college or business. The village has three school buildings and a fourth in the process of erection, and employs 17 teachers.

NEWSPAPERS.

Bellows Falls has a number of newspapers. Years ago there was the old Bellows Falls Intelligencer, and afterwards the Bellows Falls Argus, and contemporary with that for, at least a portion of the time, the Gazette, published by John W. Moore. The Argus was published by Hiram Atkins, who afterwards founded the Argus and Patriot at Montpelier. In 1856, A. N. Swain founded the Bellows Falls Times. Since then it has been the only paper. Some years ago a rival was started but lived only a short time. The Times has taken a new lease of life under new management and is in a fair way to become as successful as any in the State.

LIBRARY.

There is an excellent town library containing 4500 well selected volumes on current topics and miscellaneous subjects, free to the people of the town. It was founded by voluntary work in different directions, and now the town makes an annual appropriation for the benefit of the library, considering it a necessity.

BUSINESS ENTERPRISES.

Business is what has built up Bellows Falls and it is business which is now sending it ahead in growth faster than most towns in the State. It has unsurpassed transportation facilities. The Connecticut River railroad gives it an outlet to New York and the manufacturing cities south of us in Massachusetts. This road connects at Windsor with the Central Vermont which allows quick and easy passage from the West. The Cheshire division of the Fitchburg is the outlet to Boston, distant only 114 miles. Northward, over the Rutland road, is the tributary country of Vermont.

Paper of various sorts is the great manufacture. It is the one great industry. The Fall Mountain Paper Company is the largest in the world. The company controls immense interests here. Other important firms are John T. Moore & Sons, manufacturers of manillas; Wyman Flint & Sons, manillas; John Robertson & Son, tissues, and others manufacturing various grades of different papers. In all about 1000 men are employed and the yearly output is nearly, if not quite, 100,000 tons.

The Vermont Farm Machine Company is the largest manufacturers of dairy machinery in the world. They own the patents for the famous Cooley creamer and the machines are all made here. They employ a good number of hands. C. W. Osgood & Son have a large paper-making machine foundry and machine shop so that they can turn out a complete machine. They will occupy their new building soon which is 160 feet long and 60 feet wide. They employ about 100 hands. These are the principal manufactories.

The village has been built up because of the immense power of the river here, which falls 60 feet in a distance of comparatively a few rods—less than half a mile. That power is not yet one-half utilized.

SOCIAL CLUBS.

The Young Men's Institute, connected with the Congregational church, is a sort of social club which has a reading room in the vestry of the church and through the winter months has weekly meetings with lectures or talks on different subjects of interest. There is a flourishing lodge of Masons, both camp and canton of Odd Fellows, Golden Cross, Red Men, G. A. R., W. R. C., S. of V., and other social and fraternal orders having a large membership. Beside these there are purely social clubs.

SAXON RIVER SEMINARY.

For the following sketch the writer is indebted to professor L. F. Ward of Westminster.

This Seminary was started in 1842, and was furnished with a handsome and convenient building by the citizens of the place, among whom Dr. R. A. Severance, Joseph Leach, Hon. Daniel Kellogg, George Perry, Fletcher Perry, Hon. David Chandler, were early and liberal in their donations.

Rev. D. H. Ranney was the first principal, remaining in charge some two years. Miss Margaret Mann, Miss Howlett, and Miss Ellen Gregory were the preceptresses during the same time.

Reuben Hubbard Washburn, the second principal, also remained two years. Miss Gertrude Hyde, now Mrs. N. S. Sharp, Miss Sarah Warren of Ludlow, Miss Whittlesey, and Lucien Sherman of Dover, were Mr. Washburn's able assistants.

Under Rev. D. H. Ranney and

Mr. Washburn, the seminary was prosperous. Mr. Colby was the third principal. The fourth was L. F. Ward, who continued the school from 1847 to 1852. His assistants were Miss Marion Ward, Miss Jane Smith, Mrs. Butterfield of Grafton, Miss Fanny Arnold, and Mrs. E. M. Ward.

Rev. J. M. Wilmarth next succeeded as principal, a man noted for his missionary efforts in Europe, for his critical scholarship, especially in the French literature, and as a divine rather than as a teacher. During the next three years the Seminary was in charge of Rev. W. N. Wilbur, and enjoyed a high degree of prosperity. Afterwards it was taught by Mr. Frost, by M. D. L. Colleston, now a professor in a college in Minnesota, and by D. L. Aldrich as late as 1866, since which time it has been suspended.

From 1842 to 1854, Hon. Daniel Kellogg was president of the board of trustees.

VERMONT ACADEMY, SAXTON'S RIVER, VERMONT.

The first public movement towards the establishment of the Vermont Academy was made at the annual meeting of the Vermont Baptist State convention, held at Windsor, Nov. 10, 1869, when the following resolutions were adopted:

Resolved: That the time has come when the Baptists of Vermont should awake to an increased interest in the subject of general education, and should express that interest by taking immediate steps to secure the establishment and adequate endowment of a first-class Literary and Scientific Institute for the education of our youth of both sexes.

A committee of seven was appointed to take the necessary preliminary measures for carrying the resolution into effect, consisting of the Revs. T. H. Archibald, G. S. Chase, W. L. Palmer, M. A. Willcox, S. F. Brown, Hon. R. J. Jones, William M. Pingry.

VERMONT ACADEMY,
SAXTON'S RIVER.

Theophilus Holt

During the ensuing year the committee pursued their work with renewed zeal. At the end of the second year they made their final report to the meeting of the convention held at Burlington.

At this meeting, Oct. 4 and 5, 1871, a board of trustees was appointed, consisting of eleven persons, among whose duties, as prescribed by the convention in a resolution, were those of establishing and locating the new institution, of raising an endowment of $100,000, exclusive of grounds, buildings and apparatus, and of securing from the General Assembly of the State an act of incorporation. Judge Wm. M. Pingry of Perkinsville was the first president of the board and continued in office until his death in May, 1885. His successor in office was Col. L. K. Fuller of Brattleboro, who still continues in said office.

At the meeting of the convention at Brattleboro, Oct. 3, 1872, the board of trustees was increased to fifteen, and an act of incorporation was shortly after passed by the General Assembly of the State, which was approved Nov. 26, 1872.

Mr. Charles L. Jones of Cambridge, Mass., a native of Saxtons River, had for some years purposed giving a generous sum of money for the establishment of an academy in that place; he had invited citizens of the place to join him in the enterprise, and his invitation had been cordially accepted and a considerable sum of money had already been pledged.

On the 28th of August, following, the board decided to accept the offer aforesaid and to locate the academy at Saxtons River.

In a circular issued Sept. 11, 1872, the board, through a committee, announced that Mr. Jones had pledged $20,000, citizens of Saxtons River $30,000, and Baptists in other parts of the State $20,000.

In 1876 the school was opened, with Horace Mann Willard, A. M., for principal. He continued in that relation for thirteen years, when he was succeeded by the present principal, George Abner Williams, A. M., Ph. D.

Number of graduates in 12 years, 89 young men, 88 young women.

Graduates of Vermont Academy have studied or are now studying at Yale, Brown, Harvard, Amherst, Middlebury, University of Vermont, Lehigh, Boston University, Wesleyan, Wellesley, Smith, Vassar, Oberlin, University of Michigan, Williams, State University of Colorado, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Dartmouth, Newton Theological Seminary, Law schools of Harvard, Boston University, Michigan State University, Medical Schools of Vermont University, College of Physicians and Surgeons of New York.

The students of Vermont Academy have come from 18 States and territories, and also from Quebec and Nova Scotia.

The original purchase of land contained 36 acres, embracing a plateau about 30 feet above the village to the north of it; and a beautiful maple grove. Recently Col. L. K. Fuller, president of the board of trustees, has purchased and presented to the academy 30 acres of land lying immediately north of the original purchase. The buildings already erected are, Jones Hall, Farnsworth Hall, Fuller Hall and Proctor Hall; the Sturtevant House, or the principal's house; this is built of wood, the others are brick buildings. These buildings, as well as the public rooms, are heated by steam, and they are also supplied by pure spring water.

The location of the school is excellent. Saxtons River is four and a half miles west from Bellows Falls, an important railroad junction.

Pecuniary aid is furnished deserving students from the income of seven scholarships of $1000 each, and from private benevolence. Some of the pupils earn a part of their expenses by work. Opportunity for self-help will be furnished on the new farm. Tuition is free to the children of all pastors and of all deceased pastors of Vermont of whatever denomination.

THEOPHILUS HOIT

was born in Westmoreland, N. H., Feb. 19, 1813, and was the elder of the two sons of Theophilus and Sabrina (Shaw) Hoit. He lived with his parents, assisting on the farm summers until 15 years of age, when he went to Sharon, Vt., to learn the trade of wool carding, cloth shearing and weaving ingrain carpets. Such business was thriving then when every one spun their own wool for cloth yarn. While at Sharon he also learned to manufacture cassimeres, and in April, 1833, he began work for Faulkner & Colony of Keene, N. H., who, at that period, were quite extensive wool carders and cloth dressers. He remained there two years and then moved to Saxtons River in March, 1835, where he manufactured satinetts for J. F. Butler, who failed soon after. The business was continued, however, by Ami Smith, who formed a partnership with Wentworth & Bingham, the firm being known as Smith, Wentworth & Bingham. Mr. Hoit stayed with these firms until 1836, when, taking the money he had saved, he started for the West; then, as now, the prospective point of all who hope to improve their financial condition. He worked in Chicago on the streets, drove a freight team, worked as carpenter, farmer, and as clerk in a store in Milwaukee. The Yankee characteristics aided him wonderfully in his plucky fight for fortune. Next he run a saw mill at Niles, Mich., where he invested his money in city lots, and watched it vanish in 1837. In May of 1838, he returned to Saxtons River and went to work for Ami Smith, in the old woolen factory, and stayed until 1846, when he began the manufacture of woolen yarn, but sold out the business the following spring. In April, 1847, Smith's factory was burned, and the following May the property was bought by Mr. Hoit, George Perry and John A. Farnsworth. They built the present woolen factory and began the manufacture of cassimeres under the firm name of George Perry & Co. They had marked success and in February, 1857, extended it by fitting up the old mill at Cambridgeport. In this venture the original firm associated with themselves Fletcher Perry and Benjamin Scofield, but the death of George Perry in 1858 caused a dissolution of the partnership, which finally resulted in Mr. Hoit's continuing the business under the firm name of Farnsworth & Hoit. The firm conducted a prosperous business until August, 1866, when feeble health compelled Mr. Hoit to sell his interest to John F. Alexander, and he has since lived in retirement in a quiet home in Saxtons River, where he has always resided since his marriage to Mary D. Chandler, daughter of Abel Chandler of Petersham, Mass., March 13, 1839. Mr. and Mrs. Hoit have had two daughters; Ellen, born November 28, 1839, married to Henry D. Holton, M. D., November 19, 1862, and Abby, born March 14, 1845, married to Charles L. Hubbard, June 4, 1867. Mr. Hoit has been a member of the Baptist church for 35 years. A marked characteristic is conscientiousness, which has given him the strict integrity noticeable throughout his entire business career. His extreme modesty has prevented his acceptance of any office of trust, though frequently urged to do so by his townsmen. His beneficence has been liberal but unostentatious; a few know its extent. He was prominently identified with the enterprise which secured the location of Vermont Academy at Saxtons River, contributing to its funds at one time, five thousand dollars. He is now enjoying the decline of life in a pleasant home, where peacefulness and content reign.

from Antrim, N. H. in 1807. Here the family lived the life of all New England farmers, and the children learned to work and live useful lives. George Perry was born in Rockingham, March 6, 1807. His early life was such as is common to every farmer's son in New England. He received the usual amount of education, snatching it from the usual round of labor. April 2, 1828, the year that he was 21 he married Hannah Chandler, daughter of Abel Chandler, and they settled on a farm, remaining three years. After that he moved to Saxtons River, and in partnership with his brother, Fletcher, began the manufacture of tinware. In 1847 he went in company with John A. Farnsworth and Theophilus Hoyt, erecting a large woolen mill and doing an extensive business under the firm name of George Perry & Co. He remained in the business until he died, August 22, 1858. The marriage of Mr. and Mrs. Perry was blessed with two children, Solon, born November 12, 1829, now in business in Boston, and Mary P., born September 26, 1839, wife of John A. Alexander of Saxtons River. Mr. Perry was never a member of a church, but always contributed liberally to the support of churches. He was always much interested in the welfare of his town, and especially his home village. He was often called by his fellow men to fill positions of honor and trust, and in 1857 was elected State Senator from Windham county, and would have been re-elected had not failing health prevented a return.

was born in Alstead, N. H., April 4, 1797, and died in Bellows Falls, August 7, 1882. He represented Alstead in the New Hampshire Legislature in 1828-29, and 1832. After his removal to Bellows Falls he represented Rockingham in the Vermont Legislature in 1838-39-48-49-52-53-56, and was County Senator in 1851-52. He was one of the original incorporators of the Bellows Falls Savings Institution, and at the first election of the stockholders was elected vice-president of the organization, and trustee. He was trustee until 1866 when he resigned because of his election as a director in the Bellows Falls National Bank. He was a director of the old Bellows Falls bank for many years, or up to its re-incorporation under the National Banking Act, when he was elected a director of the new bank as above stated. He held the office up to 1879, when he retired because of his great age and infirmities. He was treasurer of the town of Rockingham from 1846 to 1870, a period of 33 years. He was also treasurer of the Bellows Falls school district for about the same length of time. Soon after his removal to Bellows Falls he became a vestryman in Immanuel church, being first elected in 1839, and he served as a member of the committee who had in charge the erecting of the present beautiful building. His business career in town extended over many years, beginning in company with his brother Merrick, and later his son, under the firm name of A. & J. H. Wentworth. He was an honored member of the F. & A. M. May 1, 1819, he married Lucy Warren of Alstead, who died May 26, 1863. After that he married Caroline L. Chase of Bellows Falls, who died only a few weeks ago. Colonel Wentworth was a man of strong personality and did much for the town of his adoption, not only during his service in the Legislature, but as a faithful and efficient town office.

BELLOWS FALLS CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH.

The establishment of a Congregational church is due to the efforts of Mrs. Mary Walker, wife of Judge Charles Walker of Detroit, Mich., who moved here from Saxtons River in 1848. To them belongs the honor of first moving to establish a Congregational service, which developed into the present church. The enthusiasm manifested attracted the attention of others of that denominational preference, and they soon had assistance in their undertaking.

At the outset, few favored the building of a house of worship, and a proposition was made to establish the service in connection with the Methodists, if such an arrangement were possible, meeting alternate Sundays here and at Rockingham until the growth of the society should warrant the building of a church. A majority, however, finally favored a building of their own.

The organization was effected July 23, 1850. C. J. Walker, C. F. Hall, H. H. Stone, C. F. Pease, A. F. Gibson, H. Albee, George S. Norcross, and presumably others, met at Mr. Walker's office and signed their names to articles of association, according to the provisions of chapter 81 of the Revised Statutes of Vermont, as then existing, to be known as the "First Congregational Society of Bellows Falls." These articles declared the purpose of such association to be, First: "The support of the Gospel and maintenance of public worship according to the policy of the Orthodox Congregational churches of New England." Second: "To procure, hold and keep in repair a house of public worship."

The first meeting of the society was held at the office of Mr. Walker at 8 o'clock in the evening of the same day, and organized by the choice of H. H. Stone, moderator, and C. J. Walker, clerk.

The church was organized Friday, August 9, 1850, at 10 o'clock, A. M., at the Methodist church, by an ecclesiastical council of 16 members, representing all the surrounding churches in Vermont and New Hampshire. Eight presented satisfactory articles of faith and covenant, and were duly acknowledged a Congregational church by appropriate public exercises.

December 18, 1850, the society, by a unanimous vote, affirmed the expediency of taking immediate measures to erect a house for the society, appointing a committee of five to draw up plans, limiting the cost to $2,000. The lot was bought of Russell Hyde by Mr. Walker for $300. December 3, 1851, a meeting was held in the vestry of the new church, but no record of final completion can be found. The only intimation is found in the record of ordination of J. G. Wilson, December 12, 1851, the early prayer being characterized as "introductory and dedicatory."

The first regular minister was Rev. Joel R. Arnold from Waterbury, Conn., then living at Westminster West. There have been 16 pastors and stated officers, including the present, Rev. J. Ellsworth Fullerton, who came here from Massachusetts, and has been with the church about 14 months. The church has grown, and is now in a very prosperous condition. The average length of pastorate, and stated supplies has been about two and one-half years.

FUTURE OF BELLOWS FALLS.

The past and present of Bellows Falls have been fully touched up. The development from a mere country village to a business centre, almost as important as any in Vermont, has been slow, but solid. There has been no mushroom growth, no undue expansion, but a steady increase in business enterprises, and a corresponding development of water power, and shipping interests. What has been done has been the result of ordinary commercial development, a taking advantage of natural elements which conduce to success in manufacturing, rather than a reaching out for new industries and calling them in by showing their proprietors the opportunities offered. For that reason the foundation of the town's growth has been more solid, more substantial and is now more certain to be permanent. The advantages which nature has lavished upon this town has compelled men, who wished to establish great industries, to come here. They couldn't do otherwise if they followed their business instincts.

This being the case with the past it is easy to see what the future will bring. A Board of Trade, comprising in its membership all the active business men of the village, was formed in May, 1891. It took them sometime to get organized and acquire a thorough understanding, not only of their own town, but of the lines of action likely to have the best results. The year 1892 found them equipped for work and looking out for the commercial interests of the village. Success followed their efforts, even sooner than the most sanguine dared anticipate. But their work only began in 1892. With each year that followed, more and more work was laid out for the Board and more commercial problems came up for settlement.

In the hands of an active, judicious Board of Trade, the future of such a village is sure. There can be no question that Bellows Falls, with its mighty water power, its great shipping facilities and its young, active, enthusiastic business men, men who believe in their town and its possibilities, has a future of growth and development before her, which few, even among her most enthusiastic friends, hardly appreciate, as yet. The tide of capital which has flowed West and South so long has stopped. Turned back on itself it needs opportunities for investment which will bring sure, if small, returns. The return of this capital is what is to develop Vermont manufacturing villages, and Bellows Falls, with all her natural and acquired advantages, will be one of the first to feel the quickening hand of applied capital. Manufacturing must increase, if that increases, shipping facilities must be augmented, and Bellows Falls must grow and develop as never before in her history.

EXPLANATION.

To purchasers and readers of this book, I wish to say a word of explanation. I was asked to complete an unfinished history of Rockingham, which had been written years before, and parts of the manuscript lost. I was asked to fill in the places lost. This I have done as well as possible with the limited space at my command, and I trust that all who read will do so charitably, for when space must be economized, readableness must be sacrificed for fact. The work, while not what should have been done, is elaborated as much as space would allow.

STRATTON.

STRATTON.

The town of Stratton is situated upon the western border of Windham County, and, in the earliest subdivision of the State, was included within the area known as Bennington County. It was, originally, six miles square, containing 23,040 acres, but by the addition of Stratton Gore 1000 acres, in 1799, and a portion of the town of Somerset, about 2000 acres, on the south, in 1858, it now has 26,040 acres, an area considerably larger than most of the towns in the State. It lies upon the eastern slope of the Green Mountain range, extending nearly to the ridge, and some portions of the western line passing west of the highest points of the mountain.

Stratton is bounded north by Winhall, east by Jamaica and Wardsboro, south by Wilmington and Somerset, and West by Sunderland.

In 1851, a bill passed both Houses of the Legislature and was approved by the Governor, annexing a portion of Somerset to Stratton, to take effect if certain conditions were complied with, within a specified time. But those conditions were not complied with, and the boundaries remained as before. The subject was kept in agitation until 1858, when the desired changes were made.

The three principal branches of West River take their rise in the west part of this town, and flow eastward through it. The Deerfield river also has its source here, flowing southward.

The township has two beautiful ponds, referred to in "Geology of Vermont" as "Jones Pond" and "Holman's Pond," but better known by the residents, as "Stratton Pond" and "North Pond." The former is situated in the southwest part of the town. It is about one and one-third miles in length and nearly three-fourths of a mile wide. The "North Pond" is situated in the northwest corner of the town, and is one mile long and a little more than half a mile wide. This is the source of West river, whose waters unite with the Connecticut, a little north of Brattleboro.

Stratton mountain is another prominent feature of the scenery. It is about 3,335 feet above the level of the ocean. This mountain is covered with evergreens, mostly spruce, to the very summit.

GEOLOGY.

The rock formation of this town is almost entirely metamorphic, and mostly of that peculiar form of gneiss usually denominated the Green mountain gneiss, which is almost entirely wanting in feldspar. The strike is N. 30° E., and the inclination about 45° east. There is an elegant variety of saccharoid azoic lime-stone, or, dalomite, on the farm of Rufus Lyman, Esq., in that part of the town formerly belonging to Somerset. There are two beds near each other, the widest of which is about four rods wide, and the other is only ten feet wide.

An analysis of this rock shows it to be carbonate of lime 65.41, carbonate of magnesia 30.05, carbonate of the protoxide of iron 1.61, insoluble matter 2.58. It is used for the manufacture of lime to a limited extent.

POTHOLES.

In a depression of the high ridge, in the south part of Stratton, which separates the waters of the Deerfield and West rivers, is a large pothole, far up upon the side of a ledge of solid gneiss, 3,235 feet above the level of the ocean, so peculiar in its form, and so magnificent in its proportions, considering the hardness of the rock in which it is formed, that it attracts many visitors. Its existence was scarcely known until it was visited and examined and described by Charles H. Hitchcock of the geological surveying party.

This hole is a little north of the crest of the hill, from which it is inferred that the stream which flowed over this spot and by whose agency it was formed, must have flowed northerly. This is not certain, however. Mr. H. P. Goodall, who first visited this spot with Mr. Hitchcock, and afterwards with others, thus described it: "The hole is 10 feet 8 inches deep, and in diameter $2\frac{1}{2}$ feet. Immediately behind the hole, the rock rises 20 feet; some 30 rods further back is an elevation of 200 feet. The form of the hole is screw-like, the thread making three complete turns before reaching the bottom, which is shaped like that of a caldron kettle."

The rock is Green mountain gneiss, dipping 35° east. It is solid, without seam, or crack, and will hold water like a stone-jar. The hole is nearly perpendicular, though it commences at the top, from a steep declivity.

EARLY HISTORY.

Some 14 years before the opening of the war of the Revolution, some of the citizens of Worcester county, Massachusetts, had their attention called to the high lands upon the eastern slope of the Green mountains, now known as Stratton, and to their excited imaginations they became a veritable Eldorado, and July, 1761, a charter of this township was secured from Gov. Benning Wentworth of New Hampshire. An exploring party was sent out and steps were taken to colonize the township, but these preliminary measures were not entirely successful. No permanent settlement was effected until after the close of the war. At the date of the granting of this charter, only one of the towns on her border had been chartered. That was Sunderland. The description of the township as given in the original charter follows: "Beginning at the northeast corner of Sunderland, from thence due east six miles, from thence due south six miles, from thence due west six miles, to the southeast corner of Sunderland, thence due north by the east line of Sunderland aforesaid, to the bound first mentioned."

The project of an immediate settlement was interfered with by various causes and it was not until Dec. 26, 1781, that we have any record of a proprietors' meeting. This meeting was held at Grafton, Worcester county, Mass., and was organized by the election of Jacob Stevens, moderator, and Edward Rawson, clerk. This record refers to Stratton as belonging to Bennington county.

The first proprietors' meeting within the limits of the town, of which there is record, was held on Sept. 16, 1784, Jacob Stevens, moderator; Jonathan Philips, clerk. Among those present and participating were: William McFarland, John Campbell of Putney; Paul Thurston, Edward Rawson, John Blood of Pownal; Timothy Morsman and Oliver Morsman. Jonathan Philips continued to serve as proprietors' clerk until Oct. 5, 1787; Jared Blood, to May 27, 1789; Joseph Patch, to June 24, 1791; Asa Philips, to Sept. 7, 1795.

FIRST SETTLERS.

The first settlers in the town were Timothy and Oliver Morsman, who removed from Worcester County, Mass., in the summer of 1783.

Oliver Morsman began to clear up the land, and built himself a log-house upon the west half of the 5th lot in the 4th range, now known as the Adams lot.

His brother, Timothy, pitched his tent not far from Stratton pond, and near the south line of the town. He raised a family of children, one daughter, married and settled in Stratton.

Among those who came quite early were Asa Philips, Solomon Gale, Samuel Boutell, Bille Mann, Joseph Patch, Mr. Wetherbee, Abel Grout, Austin Bissell.

The first white child born in town was a girl, daughter of Solomon Gale. The first male child born in the town, was Asa Philips, son of Asa and Polly Philips, Aug. 13, 1785. The first death was that of Betsey Boutell, daughter of Samuel and Elizabeth Boutell, May 24, 1796. The first marriage occurred September, 1791. The parties were Jonas Woodward and Miss Polly Morsman. The first record of transfer of real estate is of a deed by Jonathan Philips. This instrument was executed at Newfane, Sept. 26, 1784, before Luke Knowlton, Justice of the Peace.

The first tavern was kept by Joseph Patch. The first grist-mill was built by a Mr. Graves. Saw-mills were erected by Wetherbee, Jacob Batchelder and Mr. Philips, at about the same time.

ORGANIZATION.

Soon after Vermont's declaration of independence in 1787, the citizens of this thriving burgh determined to perfect their organization as a town. A meeting was called for that purpose in a neighboring town, which met at the house of Oliver Morsman, May 31, 1788. At this meeting Timothy Morsman, Solomon Gale and Benjamin Hobbs, were elected selectmen; Asa Philips, town clerk; Sanford Bixby, treasurer; Joseph Patch, constable.

The following are the names of all the town clerks: Asa Philips, Stephen Thayer, Asa Philips, Thomas Lathrop, Thomas W. Millet, Ezra Estabrook, Richard Scott, Asa Philips, Elias Bassett, Benjamin Thatcher, Richard Scott, Freeman Wyman, LaFayette Sheldon.

The first freeman's meeting was held in 1799, when Samuel Boutell was elected to represent the town in the General Assembly.

The town of Stratton was represented in the General Assembly, by Samuel Boutell, Bille Mann, Abel Grout, Richard Scott, Stephen Ballard, Benjamin Thacher, David Rice, 1836-7-8, 40, 43; Joseph Blodgett, 1839, 48; Asahel Kidder, 1841; John N. Glazier, 1842, 55-56; Amos Parsons, Jr., 1844-45-46-47; John Underwood, 1849, Rufus Lyman, 1851-53; Stephen Grout, 1854; Melvin A. Knowlton, 1857-58-59, 68-69; Henry W. Estabrook, 1860-61; Jacob B. Grout, 1862-63, 70; Jonas N. Smith, 1864; Newton N. Glazier, 1865, 67; Joseph Tripp 1866 and Geo. M. Smith, 1890.

Samuel Boutell was appointed justice of the peace in 1799 and he served in that capacity 22 years. Richard Scott served as justice 25 years; Moses Forrester, 14 years; John N. Glazier, 22 years.

CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH.

The early settlers of Stratton were true descendants of the old Puritan stock from which they sprung, and the deep religious sentiment which pervaded their life and character, found its legitimate channel in true blue Congregationalism. The Congregational church of Stratton was organized Aug. 30, 1801, with only 9 members; The first deacons were Francis Kidder and Samuel Bixby.

The first church was organized by Rev. James Tufts and Rev. Gersham C. Lyman of Marlboro. Among the first ministers who preached to this people was the venerable Rev. Mr. Payson, father of Edward Payson, whose name is a familiar household word.

The first church edifice erected in Stratton was built mainly by the Congregational church and society, in 1807. Its location was near the center of the town.

BAPTIST CHURCH.

Near the beginning of the century a Baptist church was organized. In 1825 its membership numbered about 40. The first deacons were J. Greenwood and John Glazier.

FREE-WILL BAPTISTS.

July 13, 1857, a Free-will Baptist church of eight members was organized by Rev. I. J. Hoadley and Chester M. Prescott. The first deacon was David Eddy. The church continued to grow in number. Rev. Mr. Prescott continued with this church only a few years. Since Mr. Prescott's removal the church has been supplied by Rev. John B. Randall, John Parker, Joseph Tripp, and John C. Ball.

CEMETERIES.

The first burial ground in Stratton was upon the lot situated a little west of the Adams lot. This place was used for burial purposes until 1803. The next place used for this purpose was a lot near the center of the town. The present cemeteries are one at the centre on the old Asa Philips' farm, given by him for that purpose, one at the north part of the town, and one in the south part.

EDUCATION

early received the attention of the sturdy pioneers. They divided the town into districts, and most of these districts have since maintained their four months school per year. Although educational advantages have been so limited, with only two months schooling of an indifferent character in the year for boys above 12 years of age, a goodly number of young men have worked their way through college and into honorable and useful careers in life. It required earnest and determined purpose to meet and overcome the obstacles thrown in their way by poverty and lack of advantages.

MILITARY RECORD.

Three at least of the early settlers of Stratton had seen service in the war for independence—Bille Mann, Jonathan Marsh, Bissell and Abel Grout.

William M. Fuller served as a soldier in the Mexican war and was detailed to go to California.

WAR OF THE REBELLION.

Stratton responded nobly to the call for men to volunteer to put down the rebellion of 1861. Every call of the adjutant general was responded to with the enlistment of her full complement of men. There was no shrinking or sending worthless substitutes, but with patriotic motives these young men took their lives in their hands and went forth to do and to endure, for the preservation of their country's honor.

The following were accredited to this town in the filling of the quotas:

George Clough enlisted Jan. 13, 1862, mustered into Co. H, 8th Reg., Feb. 12, 1862; age 30 years; re-enlisted March 5, 1864; mustered out June 28, 1865.

Samuel G. Conant enlisted Aug. 30, 1862, mustered in Co. A, 2d Reg., Sep. 15, 1862, age 23; discharged Dec. 29, 1864.

George E. Eager enlisted in Co. H, 9th Reg., June 28, 1862, mustered into the U. S. service July 9, 1862, age 28; mustered out June 13, 1865.

Newton N. Glazier enlisted as a private in Co. G, 11th Reg., Aug. 11, 1862, mustered into service Sep. 1, 1862, age 23; promoted corporal Nov. 23, 1862; 2d lieutenant Co. A, Nov. 2, 1863; 1st lieutenant same company Jan. 21, 1864; lost his left arm by a gunshot wound in the battle near Spottsylvania Court House, May 18, 1864; discharged Sep. 3, 1864.

Jason E. Goss enlisted June 13, 1862, mustered in Co. K, 9th Reg., July 9, 1862, age 24; mustered out June 13, 1865.

James Grout enlisted June 13, 1862; mustered as corporal in Co. K, 9th Reg., July 9, 1862, age 30 years; died March 2, 1863.

Jeremiah D. Styles enlisted Dec. 21, 1863, age 34; mustered a recruit in Co. D, 8th Regt.; mustered out June 28, 1865.

Others who were or had been recently residents of Stratton, entering the service from other towns were Capt. John Pike, Jonathan Babcock, Oscar F. Perry, Chauncey F. Perry and Lyman Pike.

INCIDENTS AND SKETCHES.

The department of biography and incident is very defective. It is impossible to secure information of the earliest settlers whose descendants have removed to parts unknown, or so far away that they cannot be found within the time to which I am limited. By the valuable aid of Jacob B. Grout, Esq. of Stratton; Rev. N. Newton Glazier of Montpelier, and Elijah M. Torrey, Esq. of Dorset, and others, I am able to give the following sketches:

TIMOTHY MORSMAN,

who with his brother Oliver, were the first permanent settlers in the town, was a rough and ready, though kind hearted man.

LYMAN BATCHELLER,

born in Stratton, March 20, 1795, was the son of Jacob and Lois (Rice) Batcheller. He lived in this town until after his marriage, when he removed to Arlington and from thence to Wallingford in 1835, where he became known as the head of the firm of Batcheller & Sons, whose forks are used all over the country and in Great Britain.

THE GLAZIER FAMILY.

When quite a young man, John Glazier settled in Stratton, about the beginning of the present century. He was a man of iron constitution, well fitted for the hardships of pioneer life, had a vigorous mind which naturally constituted him a leader, and he was frequently honored by being called to fill positions of responsibility and trust. He was for many years a deacon in the Baptist church.

Their second son, Lyman, entered upon the work of the ministry. He was ordained and settled over the Baptist church in Ira, this State, but died at the early age of 24.

John N. Glazier, another son, remained in his native town, became prominent in its business affairs.

Frank J., oldest son of John N. Glazier, was born in 1829. He commenced to prepare for the ministry. He died at the age of 25 years, before finishing his course at Madison University.

N. Newton, second son of John N. Glazier, was born in 1838. He prepared for college at Leland Seminary, Townshend, graduated at Brown University in 1866, at Newton Theological Institution in 1869. He accepted a call to become pastor of the Baptist church in Montpelier. He represented the town of Stratton in the Legislatures of 1865 and 67.

DEATH OF MRS. BLAKE.

In the winter of 1821, an event of thrilling interest which occurred near the west line of this town upon the road crossing the mountain, startled and touched the sympathies of the people far and wide. Mr. Harrison Blake started late in the afternoon of a cold, stormy day, from Arlington, to cross the mountain with a horse and sleigh, having his wife and infant daughter with him. At that time "the nine-mile woods" were between the last inhabitant on the west side of the mountain and Torrey's tavern, the first house near the road, on the east side. In the small hours of the night, he had reached a point about two miles from Torrey's, his horse was unable to proceed. Wrapping his overcoat about his wife and child, he started forward on foot, with the hope of procuring assistance. He was only able to advance about half a mile. He broke a limb from a tree, which he would put into the snow before him and draw himself to it. He wallowed on, struggling for dear lives bravely, until he could struggle no longer, shouting meanwhile at the top of his voice.

Mr. Hale, whose wife was ill, started early that morning for a physician, and on his way, told Johnson Richardson, whose father was over the mountain, what his boys had heard. Young Richardson hastened in the direction indicated and found Mr. Blake badly frozen, yet able by pointing to make him understand that there were two more further on. Richardson procured assistance and four of the party carried Blake from the mountain. The others went on and found Mrs. Blake still alive but fatally frozen. Going still further on they found the horse and sleigh, and near them, laid in the snow what appeared to be a bundle of clothing. As they unrolled it they found an over coat and cloak wrapped around her smiling babe.

This child's name was Rebecca, and she was brought up by her grandparents in Marlboro. She married Ezra Dean. Mr. Blake lived a number of years after this occurrence.

SAMUEL NEWELL GROUT.

Rev. Samuel Newell Grout was born in Stratton, July 5, 1818. He was the son of Dea. Abel Grout, born in Brattleboro, and Theodocia (Batcheller) Grout, born in Brookfield, Mass. He fitted for college at Burr Seminary; graduated from Middlebury college in 1846, and at Andover Theological Seminary in 1849. He went to Missouri in the fall of the same year and commenced his life work under the direction and patronage of the Home Missionary Society. Since that time, he has labored in various places in Missouri, Illinois and Iowa. He is now located at Elmore, Richardson Co., Nebraska.

[BY ELIJAH M. TORREY.]

LUTHER TORREY

came to Stratton from Ware, Mass., March, 1820. He was born in Conn., July 21, 1786, and died Jan. 10, 1851. He married Miss Eunice Hyde, who survived him 20 years. By her he had 6 sons and 3 daughters. He was a man of positive opinions and strong prejudices—was somewhat aristocratic in his notions, was a Congregationalist and whig, was at one time a tavern-keeper and farmer; but, when the use and sale of intoxicating liquors began to be preached against as sinful, he laid aside his glass, took down his bar and sign and became, thenceforth, a farmer and lumberman.

His house was near the grounds whereon the great whig convention of 1840 was held; and when the East and the West, the North and the South, to the number of 15,000 men, met together. Whereon was a well finished log cabin, 50 feet wide and 100 feet in length; where were exposed to view roasted pigs with knives and forks stuck in their backs—giving the poor man an ocular indication of his bill of fare, when Harrison and Tyler should be in the chair. The orator of the day was "The God-like" Daniel Webster.

GEORGE E. WAIT,

the son of a farmer, was born in Stratton, and there spent most of his boyhood. He was a student in Burr Seminary in 1847; prepared for college at Newbury; entered the Wesleyan University in 1850; graduated in 1854; settled in Geneseo, Ill., in 1855; studied law and was admitted to the bar in 1857; elected county judge of Henry county in 1861, held the office six years; commissioned colonel by Gov. Yates at the commencement of our civil war. mayor of Geneseo in 1866 and 1867; elected in 1869 and served as a member of the constitutional convention for the 46th representative district which included the county of Henry. That convention was composed of the very best men of the State, and was in session five months. Wait was an active and influential member. He was chairman of the committee on retrenchments and reforms; and as such exposed the enormous frauds perpetrated on the people by special legislation, and was the first to recommend to the convention a provision in the constitution prohibiting special legislation, which was adopted. Judge Wait is now a member of the Republican State Central Committee for the 21st Congressional District,—and enjoys a good reputation as a lawyer and an enterprising business man. In 1859 he married Miss Hattie N. Well of Connecticut. They have three daughters.

ELISHA HYDE TORREY, youngest child of Luther Torrey, was born in Stratton, July 4, 1831. He entered Middlebury college in 1852. In the fall term of his senior year he was sick and compelled to leave college, never to return. Having regained his health he engaged in teaching, which he has made the business of his life. He was one year a teacher in the drawing school of Warring & Bisbee, successors to Charles Bartlett, College Hill, Poughkeepsie, and subsequently for five years principal teacher of Latin and Greek, and vice-principal in the military boarding school of Charles Warring, Poughkeepsie. He is married and has one son.

ELIJAH M. TORREY, eighth child of Luther Torrey, was born in Stratton, Jan. 12, 1828, and there passed much of his boyhood. Prepared for college at Burr & Leland seminaries. Entered Middlebury college in 1850; graduated in 1854; became soon after principal of the High school at Windsor; resigned, accepted the position of "Master of Order," in the large boarding school for boys of all ages, of Charles Bartlett, College Hill, Poughkeepsie. In 1858 was principal teacher of Latin and Mathematics in the boarding school for both sexes of Rev. E. Seymour, Bloomfield, N. J.; in 1859, settled in Jamaica and became a farmer; was town representative in 1862, '63, '64; chosen to prepare a "Soldiers' Record" for the town, under an Act of the Legislature of 1864; in 1860, married Miss Cornelia A. Bufum; they had two sons and four daughters.

SOMERSET.

By HOLLIS TOWN.

SOMERSET.

But little is known to the writer of the early settlement of this town except what the records show. It was chartered by Gov. Wentworth, Sept. 9, 1761; was originally six miles square; is situated in the western part of Windham county, in lat. 42°, 58' and long. 4°, 8' and is bounded north by Stratton, east by Dover and a part of Wardsboro, south by Searsbury and a part of Wilmington, and west by Glastenbury. It lies 14 miles northeast from Bennington and 16 northwest from Brattleboro. The township is but little settled, and is very mountainous. The most noted mountain is Mount Pisgah, which extends along the eastern part of the township. Deerfield river is the principal stream. It runs through the township from north to south. The first inhabitants, or the greater portion of them, settled in the east part of the town. Daniel Rice, Bezael Waste, Eben Most, David Babcock and Jonathan Richardson, settled in the northwesterly part of the town near the Great Meadows (so-called) situated upon the east branch of the Deerfield river. The early settlers in the east part of the town were James Parmele, John Parmele, Percy Rice, William Lawton, Silas Crosby, Ephraim Hodges, Jacob Williams and Peter Leach.

THE NAMES OF THE GRANTEES OF SOMERSET.

Thomas Denny, John Houghton, Judah Moor, David Hall, Nehemiah Wright, Moses Gelb, Henry King, Daniel Jones, Benj. Sanderson, Jonathan Nail, Daniel Quory, Noah Jones, Nathan Sargent, Jos. Chaplin, Asa Stores, Peris Rice, Timothy Nurse, Samuel Robinson, Ebenezer Fisk, Jacob Fisk, Andrew Haskil, Jonas Fay, Samuel Ruggles, John Haskil, Solomon Green, John Moffat, John Beauneau, Elijah Williams, John Bird, Elisha Goddard, Samuel Trask, Amos Putman, Jonathan Waters, Jr., Jonathan Sibley, Johnson Walter, Abijah Tucker, Phineas Jones, Robt. Henry, Matthias Weston, Bartholomew Woodbury, Benj. Lewiston, Sam'l Deany, Ebenezer Chaplin, John Fletcher, Jonathan Stone, Wm. Houshard, Seth Washmore, Joseph Plummer, Wilder Willard, Ichabod Odel, James Taylor, John Putnam, Elijah Dickinson, Obediah Dickinson, Daniel Watson, Willard Stevens, Moses Singlebury, Ephraim Rice, Richard Dodge, Thomas Beard, Lampson Sheaf, Esq., John Downing, Esq.

The town was organized in 1792. The first freeman's meeting held in 1799.

The first town meeting was warned by Isaac Wheeler, Esq., of Whittington, held Nov. 19, 1792, at the dwelling house of Oliver Kimp-ton. Silas Crosby, moderator; James Parmele, town clerk; John Parmele, Percy Rice, Bezaleel Waste, selectmen; James Parmele, treasurer; Percy Rice, constable. This town was never run into divisions and allotted as most towns were. It was run in pitches; each proprietor made a survey of his lands. The several surveys marked upon the map of the town are as follows: Hazeltine's survey; Rice, Waste and Babcock's first and second surveys; Wm. Williams' first and second surveys; Luke Knowlton, Levi Hall, Isaac Wheeler, Nathan Wheeler and Richards' survey of Scott lands. Nearly all the inhabitants lived in the east part of the town until about 1840, when a new settlement commenced in the westerly part of the town, and the town meetings were always held in the east part until 1853, when a vote of the town was taken to hold the town meetings one-half the time at a new school house near the geographical centre of the town and the freeman's meetings at the present place. Meantime the inhabitants on the east side of the mountain were making every effort to be set-off to Dover and Wardsboro. In 1858 they succeeded in being annexed to Wilmington and Stratton, a strip two miles wide and four miles long to Wilmington, and two by two miles to Stratton, leaving the present town of Somerset four miles by six. The town of Wilmington refused to take the pauper resident on the territory set to Wilmington. The case went up to the supreme court and was decided against Wilmington. The present town of Somerset is comparatively level, especially the northwesterly portions, with a large amount of spruce and hard wood timber, together with good water power. The soil is rich and fertile, well adapted for English grain, grass and potatoes. Rev. Stephen Hitchcock was the first settled minister. There has been no settled minister in Somerset for more than 40 years. About 1835, a meeting-house was built just in the edge or just over the line between Somerset and Dover, the inhabitants of Somerset uniting with the Dover people in building the meeting-house, also in forming a church. The Rev. Daniel Leonard was the founder of this church and pastor for many years. About 1855, a society or church was formed of reformed Methodist. They have no resident minister. Rev. Thaddeus Cutler and Farnum Sprague have been their principal ministers. Hazeltown Rice, Esq., and Ephriam Rice, Esq., were both town clerks for many years, and both represented the town, Ephriam Rice 13 years. I do not know as there were any soldiers in the 1812 or Mexican war from this town. In the last war there was from this town in Co. I, fourth Vt., Otis H. Pike, Ahar P. Pike, and Edward Lincoln. In the seventh Vt., Deliverance Pike, Oscar Pike, Asa Burnap and Lewis Corse. In the 8th Vt., John M. Pike, Capt. Co. G, S. G. Stone and Timothy O. Negus. In 1st Vt. cavalry, Edward Rice and Daniel Burnet. There were drafted, Oscar W. Cutler; paid commutation, Emery I. Curtis. Eli Hall served but don't know to what regiment he was assigned; Charles Lowe, not accepted; Peter M. Stone, the town hired a substitute for him.

It appears from a letter I have just received from Mr. George E. Rice of West Dover, there was one soldier in the revolution from Somerset, Mr. Rice's grandfather; but the letter tells its own story.

LETTER FROM AN OLD MAN IN DOVER.

The first settler in Somerset was Daniel Rice, my grandfather. In 1776, he settled on the farm I now own; his nearest neighbor was in Wilmington, about 7 miles. He built himself a shanty and kept bachelor hall for two or three years. He came from Hardwick, Mass. In 1777, he was at Wilmington after his weekly supply of provision, when he heard that the British army was marching towards Bennington. Went back to his shanty, took his gun and what ammunition he had, and crossed the Green Mountain through the wilderness and was in the battle of Bennington, Aug. 16, 1777. Was in the army three months, then went to Hardwick, Mass., and stayed through the winter. The next spring he returned to Somerset, and two of his brothers with him, Percy and Simeon. Percy purchased a large tract of land, part of it in Somerset and part in what was then Wardsboro. He built in Wardsboro on the farm now occupied by Abel Johnson. He was killed by the caving in of a well he was digging near his house. Daniel Rice married Sally Ball from New Bradford, Mass., in 1778, built a log house in which he lived six years, then built a framed house; went on horse back to Greenfield, Mass., after his nails, which were made by hand; the clapboard were split and shaved.

His children were: Daniel, Hazelton, David, Ephraim, Ashur, Susanah, Melinthy and Sally.

Daniel Rice's first purchase of land was 670 acres, for which he paid $640. He afterwards purchased several hundred acres of Col. Hazeltine and ran in debt for it, which caused him trouble. He was to pay for it in cattle and sheep; a mad dog bit 20 of his cattle; they went mad and died; he was unable to meet his payments. Col. Hazeltine got a writ out against his body and sent a sheriff from Windsor to serve it. Mr. Rice heard of it and avoided him by staying on the mountain west of his house the most of the time one summer. Burton was watching for him the most of the time for six months. On one occasion some of the boys saw him looking around in the woods near the house. Daniel, the oldest son, dressed himself in his father's clothes and started for the woods. Burton saw him and gave chase. Daniel managed to run around a deep mire or stump hole. Burton rushed for him, and went into the mud hole; he had considerable difficulty in extricating himself. When he came out he was covered with mud and slime. Daniel stood by and asked him what he was in there for; what he was after. He tried to get a clean suit to wear home, but failed, and went as he was. Never came back to serve his writ. The suit was settled by the Colonel giving Mr. Rice a longer time to make his payments.

I do not know why this town was called Somerset. Daniel Rice first settled and built a log house upon the great meadow. A heavy fall of rain caused the river to rise and overflow the meadow some two or three feet. Mrs. Rice and children were there alone. But Mr. Rice hastened home and with a horse brought them out safely. A saw and grist mill was built at the lower end of the meadow, but was not kept running a great length of time. Daniel Rice in a few years moved over upon the east side of the town, where he lived to a good old age and died there. His son Ephraim lived upon the same farm and died there. George E. Rice, his son, now lives on the farm.

No postoffice was ever established in Somerset until 1870. At the setting of Congress in December, 1869, a petition was sent the postmaster-general to establish a postoffice in Somerset, and the department did establish a special postoffice in Somerset, Windham county, Vt., and appointed Hollis Town, Jr., postmaster. We carry and receive our mails at Searsburg postoffice. The first mail was carried the fourth day of March, 1870.

DEATHS BY ACCIDENT.

Three men have been killed in the new settled part of the town since 1841. In 1842 Samuel Mathews was killed instantly by the falling of a lodged tree. He was advanced in years. In 1858 Samuel Read was killed instantly in the same way, aged 38 years. On the morning of March 8, 1870, Hatsel P. Lyons took his ax and went to the woods to cut logs, and did not return at noon as usual. His wife feeling alarmed about him went to the woods and found him dead. He had lodged a spruce tree against a large birch tree. On arriving that morning he proceeded to cut down the birch tree, and in falling the main blow struck him on the back. It is not known whether it killed him instantly or not. He was a robust young man 28 years old. He left an infant son seven months old, whose mother died when it was a few days old. His sad death occurred but five days after his second marriage.

TOWNSHEND.

By JUDGE JAMES H. PHELPS.

TOWNSHEND.

The oldest towns in the present county of Windham were granted by the Colonial government of New Hampshire, when Benning Wentworth was governor of that province. Their corporate names remind one of the Earl of Halifax, the Duke of Marlborough, the Earl of Wilmington, the Marquis of Rockingham, Francis Fane and Charles Townshend, who were distinguished members of the ministries at whose pleasure Gov. Wentworth held his office.

Of New Hampshire Grants on the east side of the Green Mountains, the seventh in chronological order was called Townshend. This town is situated a little north of the geographical center of Windham county, and at the time Acton was annexed was bounded N. by Acton and Athens, E. by Athens and Brookline, S. by Brookline and Newfane, W. by Wardsboro, Jamaica and Windham. While on the E. and S. the bounds of 1840 remain at the present day.

Within the limits of the town are four neighborhoods: the East Village, West Village, Harmonyville, and Simpsonville. Of these, the largest is the East Village, which is the business center.

West river in passing through the southwesterly part of the town receives the waters of Acton brook, Fair brook, Negro brook, Jay brook, and Mill brook. Fletcher brook is a tributary of Acton brook. Numerous springs and rivulets furnish an abundant supply of pure water. The land rises, often gradually, sometimes precipitously, to the ridges by which the valleys are terminated. These divides are of considerable height, and especially in the vicinity of West river, present a succession of rocky hills. Two of these eminences have been named Peaked mountain and Bald mountain, from the peculiarity of their appearance.

The original town has nearly the rock formations which exist in Acton. Fine specimens of water crystals have been found at the south-east part of the town. A ledge upon the James Grey farm affords material for excellent lime. Boulders of granite and syenite that can be split into fence posts are occasionally found. The primitive forest, unbroken, and extending to the summit of the hills, mostly consisting of maple, birch, beech, hemlock and spruce. Among these are intersperced the ash, oak and elm, basswood, cottonwood, butternut and pine.

Two flourishing villages besides many comfortable and desirable dwellings scattered about town, are outgrowths of what has been done here in the way of business. The inhabitants, with few exceptions, have been engaged in agricultural pursuits, and their success has been such that Townshend in 1891 ranks in population as ninth of 23 towns comprising the county of Windham, and the sixth in wealth.

The original proprietors of Townshend obtained title from the crown through the Colonial Governor and council of New Hampshire. The town charter is dated June 20, 1753. It is in the usual form and we now give only the particulars wherein it is supposed to differ from any township charter executed by the same magistracy.

The premises conveyed are bounded as follows: "Beginning at a stake and stones, the northeasterly corner of Fane, thence running six miles N. 20° E. to a stake and stones, thence W. 10° N. to a stake and stones, thence S. 20° W. to the N. W. corner of Fane, thence E. 10° S. by Fane aforesaid, to the N. E. corner thereof, being the stake and stones begun at."

Another portion of the charter is expressed in these words: "The first meeting for the choice of town officers, agreeable to the laws of our said province, shall be held on the last Wednesday in August, next, which meeting shall be notified by John Hazeltine, Esq., who is hereby also appointed the moderator of said first meeting, which he is to notify and govern agreeable to the laws and customs of our said Province, and that the annual meeting forever hereafter, for the choice of such officers of said town, shall be on the second Wednesday in March, annually."

The ownership of the grant was divided into 74 shares, 69 persons whose names are on the back of the charter, took one share each, the other five shares are conveyed in these words: "To His Excellency, Benning Wentworth, Esq., a tract of land to contain five hundred acres, which is to be accounted two of the within shares. One whole share for the incorporated society for Propagating the Gospel in Foreign parts. One whole share for the first settled Minister of the Gospel in said town. One whole glebe for the Ministry of the Church of England as by law established."

The sixty-nine grantees arranged in alphabetical order comprise the the following names:

Theodore Atkinson, Marshall Baker, Moses Baker, Isaac Barnard, Jonathan Barnard, Joshua Barnard, Luke Brown, Abel Chase, jr., Daniel Chase, Moody Chase, Moses Chase, Samuel Chase, Samuel Chase, jr., Alexander Clayton, John Clements, Samuel Daggett, jr., Thomas Denney, John Downing, Joseph Dyer, Elisha Fisk, Ebenezer Fisk, Eleazer Fletcher, Jonathan Fry, Isaac Gale, Josiah Gale, Samuel Gile, Jonathan Hale, David Hall, David Hall, jr., Isaac Harrington, Isaac Harrington, jr., Samuel Hawley, Abner Hazeltine, John Hazeltine, Paul Hazeltine, Silas Hazeltine, Antipas Holland, Jonathan Halman, Solomon Halman, Solomon Halman, jr., James Leland, Phineas Leland, Benjamin Marsh, Isaac Miller, Eliakim Rice, Lemuel Robbins, Abner Sawyer, Sampson Sheafe, Henry Shelburne, Jesse Smith, Samuel Smith, Joseph Sparhawk, John Stowell, Hezekiah Stowell, Jason Wait, Jonathan Wait, Jonathan Wait, jr., Nathaniel Wait, Henry Walker, Hezekiah Ward, Daniel Warner, Jonas Warner, jr., James Wellman, John Wentworth, jr., Richard Wibird, Jonathan Wilson, Benjamin Woodbury, Joshua Woodbury, William Joany. Each of the shares, except those of the governor, represents a little more than three hundred and thirteen acres of land. Records in the town clerk's office show that Rev. Nicolas Dudley and Luke Knowlton, conveyed the rights which belonged to the governor. The ministerial right passed to Rev. Nicolas Dudley, and was located where Deacon Belknap afterwards lived. The glebe seems to have been located upon the steepest part of the rocky hill back of the present residence of Col. Twitchell.

Nothing is known of what became of the original charter. In the town clerk's office there is a copy which was duly authenticated by the Secretary of State of New Hampshire, on the 29th of June, 1774. Upon it is also the following certificate, in compliance likely with some action under a resolution of the General Assembly passed in June, 1779.

"State of Vermont.

Surveyor General's office, Aug.
7, 1780.

The foregoing charter and bounds of the several towns, (Halifax, Marlborough, Fane and Newfane) are recorded in the first book of New Hampshire charters, from page 20 to 28.

Examined by IRA ALLEN,
Surveyor General."

Col. John Hazeltine procured the granting of the township, and the first settlers used to relate that he had names of his neighbors and acquaintances entered as grantees on back of the charter without their knowledge; that soon after the town was granted, he went round and called upon these unadvised proprietors, saying to each: "What shall I give you for a quit claim of your right in Townshend?" The invariable reply was, "I don't know as I have got any right, or interest there." This answer brought out the inquiry, "what is it worth to you then, and what will you take for it?" The satisfactory reply was, "Oh, give us a mug of toddy, and I will deed you all the right I have to anything up there." The liquor would soon be furnished, and under its inspiration a deed would be executed. There may be more fact than fiction in the story, for our land records show that within nine months from date of charter, Col. Hazeltine became owner of sixteen rights for the consideration of one shilling each, which is the sum he would have paid for the toddy, had it been brought in when a deed of one of the rights was delivered to him.

The proprietor's book of records shows what was done by the original grantees to effect a division in severalty of this land, and to forward a settlement of the town; it also contains the pitches of land made by the proprietors, and laid out by committees appointed for that purpose; but no conveyance from grantor to grantee was recorded therein.

We now present a copy of the proprietor's record prior to the year 1755.

Warning and proceedings of first meeting of the proprietors.

July the 24th, 1753.

I, the subscriber, being appointed by the governor and council of New Hampshire government to notify the grantees of a new township, viz: Townshend, to attend the first meeting on the last Wednesday of August in this present year; you are hereby notified to attend the first meeting of the grantees of Townshend, in the Province of New Hampshire, said meeting to be held at the house of Mr. Luke Brown, innholder, in Worcester, at ten of the clock in the forenoon of the last Wednesday of Aug. 1753; to choose town officers for said Townshend, agreeably to the laws of the Province of New Hampshire; and likewise to choose proprietor's officers for the township of Townshend; and also to transact any other affairs, matters or things that the said proprietors or grantees shall think proper to encourage, promote and forward the settlement of the said town of Townshend.

JOHN HAZELTINE.

At a meeting of the grantees of the township in the Province of New Hampshire, regularly assembled and met at the house of Mr. Luke Brown, on the last Wednesday of August, at ten of the clock in the forenoon, in the year 1753. Said meeting was authorized and appointed by his excellency, the governor, and the honorable council of said Province of New Hampshire, in and by the charter of said Townshend; and likewise John Hazeltine appointed moderator of said meetings; at said meeting the following votes were passed, or the things hereafter mentioned were transacted.

Ira Allen

1. William Young, chosen town clerk for said Townshend, and likewise clerk for said grantees in land affairs, and sworn to the faithful discharge of his office in the meeting.

2. John Hazeltine, Esq., Isaac Barnard, Esq., and Mr. Benjamin Woodbury, Benjamin Marsh, and William Young, chosen selectmen.

3. William Young and Thomas Denney, chosen assessors.

4. Jonathan Haile, chosen treasurer, and was sworn to the faithful discharge of said office in said meeting.

5. Abner Hazeltine, chosen constable and collector.

6. Voted, that the above named selectmen be a committee to prosecute affairs respecting the settlement of said Townshend, and agreeable to such directions as shall be hereafter given them.

7. Voted, that said committee proceed to run the lines or bounds of said township, agreeable to the charter, as soon as may be; likewise that tract of land noted in the charter of which each grantee is to be allotted one acre.

8. Voted, that said committee then proceed and lay out seventy-two lots, each lot to contain as a standard either forty or fifty acres, as said committee upon viewing said township shall judge convenient or most proper; and that said lots be laid out quantity for quality; and also five hundred acres in one tract for his excellency, Benning Wentworth, agreeably to the charter.

9. Voted, that a tax of two dollars be assessed on each right, and that said tax be paid to the treasurer at or before next meeting for drawing of the lots. Voted, also, that any of the grantees which shall neglect or refuse to pay said tax as above shall be secluded the privilege of drawing his or their lot or lots.

10. Voted, that the above named committee be a committee to appoint meetings of said grantees for the future; and that they notify all such meetings as they shall appoint by posting up notifications in writing, 14 days before the meeting, at the dwelling houses of Mr. Luke Brown in Worcester, Jonathan Haile and Samuel Buck in Sutton; and that in said notifications be inserted the time when and place where, of such meetings, together with the articles to be acted upon by said grantees when met.

11. Voted, that the charges or expenses of this meeting, viz: five pounds, five shillings and three pence, old tenor, be paid by the treasurer, Mr. Jonathan Haile, out of the public money of said society or grantees.

Then said meeting was dissolved.

Test,

WILLIAM YOUNG, P. Clerk.

While the French and Indian war was raging, a settlement of the town was impracticable, and proceedings of proprietors were suspended during the eventful years from 1754 to 1761. The victory of Wolfe in 1759 and the capitulation of Vaudreuil in 1760, followed by the treaties of Fontainebleau and Paris, severed Canada and the districts east of it from the control of France. French and Indian incursions, which had so long scourged the people of New England, were to be feared no longer. A frontier of wide extent had been opened for settlement under the quiet and security of English rule. Provincial soldiers discharged upon the surrender of the French in Canada, and resolute adventurers flocked hither to occupy and become owners of the land known as the Hampshire Grants.

Settlement of the town was commenced by John Baird, Thomas Baird and Col. John Hazeltine, about the first of June, 1761. Nothing was done this season, except to build a log hut and commence work upon the lots taken by the new comers. Years ago, the following anecdote was in circulation about the first settlement of the town. The story is given as we wrote it from the lips of an old gentleman:

At a meeting in Massachusetts of the grantees, old Col. Hazeltine got it so fixed that the proprietor who should get here first, with the intention to settle, might have the first choice of lots which had been surveyed. The two Bairds were present; they saw what the Colonel was up to, and mistrusted that he would be in Townshend as soon as possible, to take up the best lots. They determined to get in ahead of him, and started for this town at close of the meeting. Col. Hazeltine went home and passed the night. Early in the morning he said to his wife, "I am going to Townshend." He was soon on his way and without an unnecessary halt, came to what is now called the Elder Hodges farm, in Newfane, where he stopped over night. Starting in good season the next day and hurrying on, it was not late when he forded West river where the lower bridge stands. On reaching the bank, he saw a smoke and near it found the two Bairds engaged in clearing a spot for their cabin. Instantly comprehending the situation, the old gentleman, with a low bow and bland good-by, gave the bridle reins a jerk or two, put spurs to his horse, rode on and selected lots farther up the river.

The land taken up by Col. Hazeltine in 1761, was situated in the west part of the town, where he soon afterwards built a log fort upon the meadow now owned by Deacon Pierce. During the same season, the Bairds located their rights near the ford of West river. Joseph Tyler of Uxbridge, and John Howe of Framingham, commenced their clearings in 1764; the former, upon the present Bridge farm near the east village; the latter, upon the Hiram Howe farm in school district No. 7. John Burt of Killingly, Conn., and Paul Hazeltine of Uxbridge, came in 1765. None of the settlers remained here, however, during the winter months prior to 1766.

By an order in council passed on the 20th day of July, 1764, King George the III declared the western bank of Connecticut river to be the boundary line between his province of New Hampshire and New York. This order was proclaimed by Gov. Colden of New York, on the 10th day of April, 1765; and the governor of New Hampshire by proclamation, recommended to the proprietors and settlers of "the grants," submission and due obedience to the authority and laws of the colony of New York.

The proprietors of Townshend were neither alarmed nor made indignant by the transfer of jurisdiction to New York. Management and control of their proprietary interest were little changed thereby. Whatever opposition was made to these land-titles proved to be of a yielding nature, and they submitted to the new authority. In due time, their New Hampshire charter was confirmed by the government of New York, in response to a petition for that purpose. Agreeably to a colonial statute of New York, deeds and conveyances of any interest in real estate were recorded in the secretary's office of the colony, or in the county records of the county where the real estate was situated. This law was in force while the town remained under the jurisdiction of New York.

MEETING OF THE PROPRIETORS, APRIL 5, 1774.

Notice is hereby given to the proprietors of Townshend, lying on West river, so-called, to meet at the house of Paul Hazeltine, in said Townshend, on the first Tuesday of April next, at 10 o'clock in the morning, then and there to act on the following articles:

1. To choose a moderator for the meeting.
2. To see if the proprietors aforesaid will stand by Paul Hazeltine aforesaid in the suit which said

Paul Hazeltine is to answer, the third Tuesday of April next, at the city hall in New York, by being by the Supreme Court made defendant; or lose the land on which he now lives.

Attest,

JOHN HAZELTINE.

March 22, 1774.

Met at time and place agreeably to the notification for said meeting.

Voted, to send a man to New York, with power of substitution, to get Mr. Paul Hazeltine made defendant in the suit depending between Luke Knowlton, Esq., and John Taylor.

To choose a committee to notify the proprietors of 'Fane and New Marlboro' to perambulate the lines of our towns with us, if they will, and if they refuse, said committee to go with a surveyor and measure the lines of the towns of aforesaid, as they shall think proper. Voted, that John Hazeltine, Esq., William Hayward, Joseph Tyler, Benjamin Howe and Ezra Holbrook, be a committee to do the service spoken of.

The division line between the proprietors of Townshend and Newfane had not been mutually established, and the suit above named probably was one of the results of this unmarked boundary. But however this may be, or whatever may have been the object or result of the suit aforesaid, no attempt was ever made to dispossess any claimant under the New Hampshire charter of this town by virtue of title emanating from the government of New York. A third division of 50 acres of land to each right was ordered on the 29th day of May, 1780. The last meeting of the proprietors was held on the 7th day of October, 1782.

PROPRIETORS' CLERKS.

1753, Aug. 29, William Young; 1761, May 25, James Taylor; 1766, April 21, Joshua Wood; 1769, May 10, Samuel Fletcher; 1778, June 18, Amos Holbrook; 1782, Oct. 7, Joshua Wood.

Persons to whom the township were divided and names, are entered upon the proprietors' book as land owners: Asa Austin, John Barnard, John Barnard, jr., Joshua Barnard, Joshua Barnard, jr., Thomas Barnes, Daniel Blanchard, Eben Burt, Capt. John Burt, Dr. Jonas Butterfield, Joseph Chamberlin's heirs, Amariah Chase, Lieut. Henry Chase, Joseph Chase, Jonathan Clayton, Moses Cook, Caleb Darling, Lieut. Amri Doolittle, John Dresser, Rev. Nicholas Dudley, Wid. Elizabeth Dyer, John Dyer, Joseph Dyer, Cyrus Fay, Thomas Fay, John Fish, Josiah Fish, Esq., Benjamin Fletcher, Samuel Fletcher, Jonas Gray, Caleb Hayward, Eli Hayward, Levi Hayward, Silas Hayward, William Hayward, John Hazeltine, Esq., John Hazeltine, son of Silas; Paul Hazeltine, Peter Hazeltine, heirs Silas Hazeltine, Silas Hazeltine, jr., Caleb Hill, John B. Hinds, Amos Holbrook, Asa Holbrook, Elias Holbrook, Ezra Holbrook, Moses Holbrook, Peter Holbrook, Timothy Holbrook, Antipas Holland, heirs; John Holland, Benjamin Howe, John Howe, John Howe, jr., Michael Johnson, William Johnson, Dr. Moses Ranney, Enos Lincoln, David Lindsey, Thomas Lowe, Mathew Martin, Benjamin Murdock, Ebenezer Ober, Samuel Parkhurst, Lovett Partridge, Jesse Penniman, Bailly Ransom, Gardner Ransom, Stephen Ransom, Thomas Ransom, Benjamin Ray, Thomas Read, Thomas Rice, Lemuel Robbins, William Robbins, Abner Sawyer, Ephriam Shepard, David Smith, Amariah Taft, Ebenezer Taft, Lyman Taft, Joseph Tyler, Esq., Susannah Tyler, widow; Wm. Utley, jr., James Walden, Jeshurun Walker, Timothy Walker, William Ward, James Watkins, James Watkins' heirs, Patience Watkins, widow; Edward White, Ensign Samuel Wiswell, Dr. John Wood, Dr. Joshua Wood, Thomas Wood.

By division of the original rights into parts and sale thereof, the number of land owners was increased from 74 to 98, which is the number to whom the town was laid out on pitch and survey. Distributions of the land was so correctly done by the proprietors' committees, that courts have never been called upon to decide more land cases from Townshend than from any town where the land was lotted and drawn for in the usual way. No minute or record has been preserved of what was done at any town meeting in Townshend previous to March, 1781. By an official signature of Samuel Fletcher, it was shown that a constable, who was a resident town officer, was serving here on the 6th day of May, 1771. Probably the town was organized a few weeks before May of the year 1771, and in conformity with the law of New York, requiring certain town officers to be chosen annually on the day named in the charter, or on the first Tuesday in April. The writer of an article in Thompson's Gazetteer however, says: "The first meeting for the transaction of town business was on the 30th of May, 1771."

The following is a copy of the census of Townshend, taken early in 1771, pursuant to directions from the governor of New York:

Heads of families in the town of Townshend: John Burt, Moses Cook, Benjamin Field, Benjamin Fletcher, Samuel Fletcher, Isaac A. Hart, Paul Haywood, William Hayward, John Hazeltine, Esq., Paul Hazeltine, Peter Hazeltine, Moses Holbrook, John Hopkins, Benjamin Howe, John Howe, John Howe, jr., William Johnson, David Lindsey, Mathew Martin, Benjamin Murdock, Ebenezer Ober, Thomas Read, Benjamin Street, Joseph Tyler.

Number of heads of families, 25; males under 16, 33; males above 16 and under 60, 40; males 60 and upwards, 1; females under 16, 35; females above 16, 26; total, 35; blacks, females above 16, 1; grand total, 136.

SAMUEL FLETCHER,

Constable.

Townshend, May 6, 1771.

In May, 1774, a committee of correspondence, numbering 51 members, was appointed in the city of New York, for the purpose of drawing out and uniting the sentiments of the people in opposition to the Boston Port Bill and other laws of Parliament, and creating that public opinion of which the first Continental Congress, with its resolves and recommendations, was the outcome. Meetings of the people in Cumberland county were held to consider the measures and policy of the British government relating to the administration of the English colonies in North America. The first of these meetings was a convention which assembled at Westminster on the 19th day of October, 1774; 18 delegates from 12 towns were present, and John Hazeltine, a delegate from Townshend, was appointed chairman of the meeting. That assembly had under consideration a letter from Isaac Low, chairman of the committee of correspondence of New York, also the Act of the British Parliament laying a tax or duty on tea, for the purpose of raising a revenue in America; the Boston Port Bill, so called; and divers other late Acts of the British Parliament. After sundry debates on the subject matter of Mr. Low's letter, and on the Acts of Parliament above named, the convention made a statement of certain rights that belonged to English colonists in America, and then passed the following among other resolutions:

"11. That we will defend our king while he reigns over us, his subjects, and wish his reign may be long and glorious, so will we defend our just rights as British subjects, against any power that shall attempt to deprive us of them, while breath is in our nostrils, and blood in our veins."

Warrants for calling a county convention on the 7th day of February, 1775, were signed by John Hazeltine, on the 30th day of the preceding January. This body met at Westminster and delegates from 12 towns were in attendance. John Hazeltine was chosen moderator. This convention recommended it to their constituents, "To choose a man for their supervisor at the next annual meeting, such as they would choose if they were to send him to New York as their assemblyman; that so the supervisors may select two men out of their body, such as they shall think most proper, which they, the supervisors of the county are desired to return to their constituents for their consideration and approbation by a regular vote, when called upon to choose assemblymen in said county."

A standing committee of correspondence, consisting of 28 members from 21 towns, was appointed to correspond with the committees of correspondence elsewhere. John Hazeltine was appointed chairman of the committee of correspondence; and he was "Empowered to call the county together, by way of their delegates, on any important emergency." It was ordered that on the application of the committee of three towns to our chairman, it be in his power to call a meeting of the committee if he shall think proper, but on application of five towns by the committees, that then a meeting shall be called immediately."

No record has been preserved of the election of town officers in this town for the years, 1775 and 1776. The Dorset convention of July 24, 1776, was the first representative which decided that an appeal to the inhabitants of the Grants should be made to have them form the same into a separate State. Townshend was the only town on the East side of the Green Mountains, represented in that Assembly.

The first step taken by the convention towards the making of the appeal was to declare its purpose in the form of a resolution, "that application be made to the inhabitants of said Grants to form the same into a separate district." A committee was then raised to exhibit the proceedings of the convention to the inhabitants on the East side of the mountain, and to treat with said inhabitants relative to their associating with that assembly. Capt. Herman Allen, Col. William Marsh and Dr. Jonas Fay, in conjunction with Capt. Samuel Fletcher and Mr. Josiah Fisk, the two delegates from this town, were chosen the committee. Dr. Jonas Fay, Col. Thomas Chittendon and Lieut. Ira Allen were appointed to prepare instructions for said committee. So influential and energetic a committee under so able guidance would be likely to succeed, when success was possible.

When the convention above named was held inhabitants on the West side of the Green Mountains very generally favored the movement for a new State. On the East side of the mountains, however, the new State party did not number one-half of the people. But the party was growing fast. The convention proposed to ruin an adverse majority by sending the wisest and most sagacious members of that body to labor for this object with the people on the East side of the mountains.

For this town, the plan of the convention was so thoroughly executed, that by the month of December, 1776, all the inhabitants were in favor of independence of the Grants. Every member of the convention, save one, signed the foregoing association. Among the signers are the names of Samuel Fletcher and Josiah Fisk, the delegates from Townshend. After Nov., 1776, no inhabitants of the town were friendly to the jurisdiction of New York.

MILITARY.

Residents of this town during the Revolutionary war, who were in active military service, served with continental troops, or they belonged to the militia of Vermont. Militiamen of this town were called out by State officers to fight British troops, to defend this State, and to put down insurrection at home. Names of privates and subalterns upon those occasions are unknown to us; but among the commissioned officers were Brig. Gen'l Samuel Fletcher, Capt. Josiah Fisk, Capt. John Burt, Capt. Josiah Tyler. The military company of this town, with Capt. Samuel Fletcher at its head, participated in the battle of Bennington, and continued in the field until the surrender of Burgoyne in the following October. Joseph Tyler, a member of the company, received a pension from Vermont, by reason of a wound received in that engagement. Tradition says that every man belonging to the company was at the front during the campaign of 1777; and no one can doubt the truth of the statement, who knows the character and influence of Capt. Fletcher, or the spirit and patriotism of his townsmen. Of the Vermont militia assembled at Brattleboro in Jan. 1784, in order to crush the Yorkers, the company from this town numbered 53 men and was commanded by Josiah Fisk. In Oct. 1781, a provision tax was laid by the legislature for feeding the troops to be employed in the service of this State during the year 1782.

Dec. 13, 1781, the town voted as follows: That $180 and interest on the same since the year 1777, be immediately assessed, and the same be paid to the committee that borrowed this sum of John Hazeltine, Esq., in the year 1777, for a bounty to the men that went into the service.

During the February session of the Vermont Legislature in 1782, a statute was passed requiring "that there be 300 effective, able-bodied men (including officers) raised in the several towns within the State (except the towns on Connecticut river north of Barnet) to be commanded by 1 major, 5 captains, 10 lieutenants, 20 sergeants, and 20 corporals, and to be allowed 10 drummers and fifers.

In consequence of the country's domestic troubles, the state of affairs on the Indian frontier, our relations with France, and the claim to belligerent rights made by Great Britain, the president, by act of Congress, approved May 9, 1794, was authorized to require of the executives of the several States to take effectual measures, as soon as may be, to organize, arm and equip according to law, and hold to march at a moment's warning, the following proportions respectively, of 80,000 effective militia, officers included, to wit: From the State of Vermont 2139 * * * * *

By reason of orders from Vermont officers to carry into effect the foregoing law of Congress, a town meeting was duly called in this town, "To act on the request of Samuel Fletcher, Esq., and others, to raise a sum of money sufficient to make up the wages of those men who are called upon to march at a moment's warning from this town, to the following sums, viz: For a sergeant, forty-eight shillings per month; corporal and music, forty-four shillings per month; and privates, to forty shillings per month, with what is now allowed them by Congress. Provided the same be not granted them by the Legislature of the State."

Upon this article of the warning the town voted on the 8th day of September. Although this vote of the town was of no consequence, so far as expenditure of money is concerned, still, it is very gratifying to know that the inhabitants of Townshend, in a critical time, promptly gave the response of a generous and loyal people to the call of President Washington.

At this time as in 1794, no resort was had to arms; and the National laws were enforced no further than to have men ready on summons, to take the field.

WAR OF 1812.

We have the following statement dictated to us by Lucius T. Wheelock, in 1869. Early in the spring of 1813, I was engaged in recruiting men for the United States army, and enlisted myself during May of that year, receiving the appointment of sergeant. My commission as ensign is dated in the fall of 1813, and I was second lieutenant when discharged in September, 1815, after war closed. I belonged to the 31st regiment of infantry, commanded by Col. Dana. Of the fights in which I participated, the more important were those at Chateaugay, the Stone Mill, and the battle of Plattsburgh. I remember that Stephen Barnard, Thomas Lowe, Benjamin Shattuck, John Shattuck, Thomas Holbrook, and Thomas Parkhurst enlisted from this town and served in the last war with Great Britain. John Shattuck and Lowe were wounded. Lowe belonged to the 11th regiment of infantry and received a pension during life for wounds received in battle at Lundy's Lane.

WAR FOR THE UNION, 1861-65.

The town paid to this State a bounty of $400.85 for a recruit from the Southern States; also to Mrs. Hutchins $100, being bounty due O. S. Hutchins, a three-years man, who died in hospital before leaving the State for the seat of war.

DISTRICT SCHOOLS.

For the last 40 years there has been from 20 to 28 weeks' schooling yearly in nearly all of the districts. The following were chosen superintending committee of schools, under the statute passed in 1827:

1828, Epaphroditus Ransom, Rev. James Kimball, Rev. Joseph M.

Graves, Dr. W. R. Ranney, Oliver Wilkinson, Jr., Samuel Gray, Dana Bailey; 1829, Charles Phelps, James Kimball, Epaphroditus Ransom, Samuel Gray, Oliver Wilkinson, Jr., Horace Starkweather, W. R. Ranney; 1830, Charles Phelps, W. R. Ranney, James Kimball, Silas Clark, Horace Starkweather, Oliver Wilkinson, Jr., Samuel Gray; 1831, Charles Phelps, Oliver Wilkinson, Jr., Epaphroditus Ransom, Silas Clark, Horace Starkweather, W. R. Ranney, Simeon Chamberlain; 1832, Charles Phelps, W. R. Ranney, Dana Bailey, Simeon Chamberlain, Charles Clark; 1833, Simeon Chamberlain, Charles Phelps, Horatio N. Graves, Epaphroditus Ransom, Oliver Wilkinson, Jr.

1846-50, 1852-54, Rev. Horace Fletcher; 1851, Waitstill R. Ranney; 1853, Rev. John Wood; 1856-59, Claudius B. Smith; 1860-63, Rev. Chester L. Cushman; 1864-66-68, Nelson Winslow; 1867-71, Lincoln E. Shattuck; 1869-70, George H. Houghton; 1872-76, Rev. Franklin W. Olmsted; 1877-78, Prof. C. C. Boynton.

On the 9th of January, 1837, the town appointed Clark Wilkinson, Samuel Gray, and Horace Howe, trustees to receive and take charge of such sum of United States deposit money as the town may be entitled to receive from the treasurer of this State, agreeably to an act of the Legislature thereof, approved Nov. 17, 1836. At the same meeting the town passed the following resolution:

Resolved, As the sense of this meeting, that the money to be deposited in the hands of the trustees shall be loaned to individuals of the town with one or more sureties, in sums not less than fifty dollars, nor over one hundred dollars; preference to be given to those who wish it to pay debts, over those who are in easy circumstances.

The following persons were chosen in the years set against their names, to serve as trustees of the United States deposit money:

Clark Wilkinson, 1837-62, Samuel Gray, 1837-52, Horace Howe, 1837-42, Ralph Brintnall, 1843-45, John Blanchin, 1846-65, Charles D. Bellamy, 1853-58, Charles Clark, 1859-65, Alfred A. Ranney, 1864-65, James H. Phelps, 1866-78.

1847, March 29. The town voted to borrow fifteen hundred dollars of the United States deposit money, for benefit of the town.

SELECT SCHOOLS.

Commencing in 1826 and ending in 1833, during the fall of each year a select school was kept at the West Village. The terms for 1826 and 1827 were kept by Mr. Fisher; those for 1828 and 1829 by Mr. Cressy; and that for 1830 by Mr. Stuart. These gentlemen were college graduates; the first two of Amherst and the last of Middlebury college.

THE LELAND AND GRAY SEMINARY.

What is now the Leland and Gray Seminary at Townshend, was incorporated by the Legislature of Vermont in 1834, under the name of the Leland Classical and English School. The name was given in honor of Lieut. Gov. Leland, a prominent clergyman in the Baptist denomination. The school was organized under the Woodstock Association of Baptist Churches. In 1886, through the efforts of Mr. E. J. Knapp, a fund of over $11,000 was obtained for this school. A. F. Tilton, A. B., was the first principal. Other prominent names appear as instructors. Among them are Moses Lyford, H. L. Wayland, C. B. Smith, Horace Burchard, Edward Judson, Milton Davidson, and C. C. Boynton. D. G. Smyth is the present principal. English and classical studies are taught. Pupils are fitted for any New England college.

MERCHANTS.

The merchants in Townshend, so far back as any record can be found, are a Mr. Harris, a Mr. Evans, Doolittle & Ripley, John P. Marsh, Joe Belknap. When Townshend or Townshend proper was started, these outside stores began to stop business, and all business began to be done at the centre. Shafter & Wilson, E. Lathan, A. Birchard, Eiseck Atwood, N. Cheney, George Lewis Joy, S. F. Thompson, Mr. Converse, S. D. Winslow, W. S. Holland, Abner Johnson, Henry Weatherbee, Starky & Howard, A. Elliott Howard, Howard & Salisbury, Winslow & Goodhue, Frank Thompson, Dunton & Ballou, L. I. Winslow & E. J. Knapp, L. O. Thayer, W. E. Corse.

The different tinmen in town were Wiley & Brintnal, Brintnal & Bellamy, Bellamy & Austin, Austin & Wilson, Wilson & Wiswell, F. B. Ober, O. F. Woods, Charles Clark & Son, Higgins & Kenyon.

PHYSICIANS.

John Hazelton was a son of Paul Hazeltine and grandson of Col. John Hazeltine. We have the doctor's autograph and give his spelling of his surname.

In July, 1775, Dr. Hazelton owned and lived upon the farm where John Sanderson resides. His house and office stood on the old road leading to Windam. The house was built in 1785. His first wife was Lieut. Amzi Doolittle's sister, by whom he had 12 children; seven died in infancy and two others did not attain the age of 10 years. His second wife was Dr. Nathan Week's sister; children 5.

During six months of the year 1781, he served as surgeon of Col. Fletcher's regiment of State troops, and attended upon the garrisons at Castleton and Pittsford. He represented this town in the General Assembly of 1791, '94 and '95. He died in Manchester, Vt., July, 1822.

Waitstill R. Ranney moved his family from Chester, Vt., to this village in 1814, and lived here till the fall of 1815, then he went to Wardsboro and resided until he came back here in the spring of 1820. In 1822 he moved from the village to the farm purchased about that time of Ezekiel Ransom. He lived on this farm until 1837, when he removed to the village of East Townshend and lived there the remainder of his days. He was married twice and had by his first wife 13 children who survived him. He represented Townshend in the Constitutional Convention of 1828, and General Assembly of 1833, and was one of the senators from this county in the Legislatures of 1836, '37, '38. He was elected lieutenant-governor of the State.

As before stated, the children of Dr. Ranney were thirteen in number, all of whom the father gave a liberal education. They were as follows: Dr. Evander W. who settled in practice and died in New York city, Darwin W. who became a teacher and afterwards minister and died in Brattleboro, Stella L. wife of Capt. Sheron Gray, who settled and died in Townshend, Alfred A. died in Colorado, Dr. Henry D. now of New York, Dr. Lafayette, settled and died in New York, Ambrose, a lawyer of Boston, and at one time member of the national legislature, Dr. Stephen E. now of Bennington, Dr. James W. who died in New York, Helen L. wife of a Mr. Bottom of Shaftsbury now dead, Frances L. also married a Mr. Bottom of Shaftsbury now dead, Dr. Martin L. now a physician in New York city, and Mary A. now dead, who married a lawyer in New York.

Moses Chamberlain commenced practice here in February, 1834. He moved to Jamaica after living here about one year, and died in that town. His wife was a daughter of Benjamin Felton, Esq. Anson L. Pettee moved his family in the spring of 1835, and occupied the house that had just been vacated by Dr. Chamberlain. William M. Sadd opened his office here in the fall of 1837. Near the close of 1842 he sold out to John Bement, and left town in 1843; he married a daughter of William Parkhurst, and now resides at Claremont, N. H.

Dana Hyde. Before removing here from Wardsboro, in 1845, he had gained and ever after maintained the reputation of a well instructed practitioner. His wife was a daughter of William Gregory of East Guilford. In 1826 and '27 he represented Guilford, his native town, in the General Assembly; and was Judge of Probate for the district of Marlboro in 1837 and '38. On his way home from a number of professional visits in Jamaica and Wardsboro, he and his son William were drowned while fording the stream below North Wardsboro, in April, 1850.

John W. Gray. Not long after receiving the degree of Doctor of medicine, he came here in 1851. After staying about a year he moved his family to Bennington, Vt. The following Drs. have practiced medicine and lived in this part of the town: Chamberlain, Ranney, Silas Clark, Charles Clark, Acherson Allen, Starkweather, Perry, Ayer, Lovell, Hibbard, Ellis, Downing, Kenyon, Terrill, Osgood, and George Porter.

ATTORNEYS.

Samuel B. Goodhue was admitted to the bar at November term, 1796, of Windham County Court. He opened an office here in 1806, and moved from this town in 1809. He died a patient at the Insane Asylum, Brattleboro, Vt.

Charles Phelps was a son of Timothy Phelps of Marlboro; he was admitted to the bar of Windham County Court in 1807, and came here to reside on the 7th day of September of that year. A pair of saddle-bags, with apparel therein, and the colt upon whose back he rode, constituted the sum total of his property. He married the daughter of Jennes Houghton of Guilford, July 21, 1814, and had six children. His wife and four children survived him. He was elected member of the Vermont Council in 1820-21-22; Judge of Probate for the District of Westminster in 1821-22-24; and a Judge of Windham County Court in 1832-33-34. Holding each of the above named offices for three years.

Popular education always found in him a ready and earnest supporter. Through the purchase of warrants located in Illinois and issued to soldiers of the Revolution, he became owner of numerous tracts of land in that State. Nearly all of these lots amounting to very many thousand dollars in value, were given to Knox College a few months before his death. Down to 1830, his books and dockets contain abundant evidence to show that his professional practice was large and remunerative. At that time his private affairs claimed and thereafter occupied the greater part of his time. His religious training began with the dawn of understanding. The libraries, lectures, public meetings, and religious privileges of a superior order, which are so common in cities, were strong inducements for putting an end to a longer country life. The residence of a daughter in Cincinnati, Ohio, decided the question. In the fall of 1845, he removed with his family to that city, where he died on the 19th day of November 1854.

James H. Phelps, son of Charles Phelps, was born in West Townshend, Vt., September 6, 1817, where he has always made his home. After graduation at Middlebury College in 1835, he studied law with his father, and was admitted to the bar of Windham County Court in 1839. About this time his father decided to close his business in Vermont and remove from the State. Settlement of his affairs, which consisted largely of financial transactions, was placed at first, partly, and then wholly, in charge of the subject of this notice. But the matters to be handled were many, and were of such character that they could not be concluded short of a term of years. A business thus prolonged and which suited the person conducting it could not easily be abandoned, even when the cause of its beginning had ceased to exist. Hence it soon became a chief means of support, and has continued to the present day. The town offices which the people of his native town have conferred upon him need not be mentioned. He was register of the Probate District of Westminster from December 1, 1842, to December 1, 1846; a judge of Windham County Court from December 1, 1846, to 1848; he represented Townshend in the General Assembly of 1848, 1849, 1867, and was State senator in 1854 and 1856. He married Miss Sophia A. Robbins, November 7, 1844. Their children are: Eliza Sophia, (Mrs. Pierce), born June 1, 1851, and Sarah Jane, born October 20, 1853.

Minnus Kenney, John Roberts, Abishai Stoddard, James M. Sharfter, now of San Francisco, practiced for a while after being admitted to the bar at the time John Roberts was here.

Col. John Hazeltine came from Sutton, Mass., in the spring of 1769, and during the rest of his life his home was in this town. He lived in the same house with Samuel Fletcher, his son-in-law.

Col. Hazeltine owned nearly one-fourth of the town. This proprietorship required a large expenditure of time in procuring settlers to improve and possibly buy some of his unoccupied acres. We are informed that his daughters were Rachel, Mrs. Joshua Wood; Jenny, Mrs. Jonas Butterfield; Lucy, Mrs. Joshua Barnard, Mehitable, Mrs. Samuel Fletcher; and Elizabeth, Mrs. Josiah Fish.

His sons were Paul, who died a resident of this town; Asa, who moved from here to Bakersfield, Vt., and died there; Peter, who lived in this town; and Silas, who was a manufacturer in Sutton, Mass. Townshend land records show that Colonel Hazeltine was living September 25, 1777, and that he died prior to June 12, 1778. Of his widow, Mrs. Jane Hazeltine, we have the following account: "Col. Hazeltine left a great portion of his property to General Fletcher, and his widow lived with said Fletcher till she died, (Feb. 16, 1810,) at the age of 104 years. This old lady was very industrious, always spinning at the little wheel as long as she lived. When she was 100 years old it is said that she got up from her wheel and danced."

From the records of Sutton we learn that the Provincial Grant of that town to individuals, is dated May 15, 1704; that Col. Hazeltine was a dealer in lands there from June 15, 1726, to Dec. 29, 1768; and that the births of some of his children are dated as follows: Paul, Nov. 20, 1728; Rachel, Feb. 26, 1730; Abigail, March 14, 1732; Elizabeth, Aug. 9, 1735.

Peter R. Taft. During the winter of 1798-99, his father, Aaron Taft, came to this town from Uxbridge, Mass., and bought the farm where Peter Hazeltine lived, on Taft hill. Peter R., then 14 years of age, accompanied the family. He came all the way on foot and drove the cow. In the winter, like other farmers' boys, he did chores and went to the district school. During the other months, he spent his time in helping his father carry on the farm. His education, however, was under the oversight of his father, who was a college graduate. Fondness for mathematics resulted in his becoming a land surveyor, and receiving the appointment of county surveyor. The duties of this office often made necessary a long attendance on his part at the terms of our County Court. On such occasions he was a willing as well as attentive listener, and so gained a knowledge of many legal principles which a person of his parts would be apt to apply correctly in unfolding the twist of a complicated law-suit. From his first experience as a trial justice, the entire public had great confidence in him as a magistrate. While pursuing his studies, he devoted a portion of his spare moments to reading—a habit which grew with his advancing years. Later in life he was, indeed, a great reader. No person was oftener called upon to fill our town offices. In one position or other his service was almost continuous. This was the case also, in Jamaica, to which town he removed in 1825. When he gave up farming and returned to Townshend, in 1837, its voters, with unanimity, replaced him in the offices which he had so acceptably filled in former years. In the efforts made to establish what is now Leland and Gray Seminary, he took a very active part. As one of the committee for erecting the academy building, his foresight and executive talent were highly appreciated. During his residence in the State he was one of the board of trustees. He was chosen judge of Probate for the district of Westminster in 1830-31-32 and 33; a judge of Windham County Court in 1835-36 and 37; a justice of the peace in 1818 and served 22 years. In the General Assembly of 1818, 20, 22 and 24 he represented Townshend, and in 1827, 33 and 34 he represented Jamaica.

At the age of 25 years he was married to Sylvia Howard of this town, with whom he lived until her death in 1866.

About 1839, his only child, Hon. Alphonzo Taft, commenced the practice of his profession in Cincinnati, Ohio. To that city the father removed from this town in 1841, and died there Jan. 1, 1867.

THE HOWARD FAMILY.

Chapin Howard came to town in 1804, and was engaged in the tanning business at West Townshend. He, in connection with his various partners, continued in that business at West Townshend until the fall of 1832, when he removed to the East Village, where he lived the remainder of his days. In 1834-5-6 he was chosen representative to the General Assembly. At his death he left a widow, a number of daughters and three sons, A. C. Howard, Ormando S. Howard and Banbridge E. Howard.

A. C. HOWARD.

Chapin Howard's eldest son was born in West Townsend, March 29, 1812, and died at his residence in the East Village Jan. 9, 1881. In 1835 he went to Michigan, then a territory, where he invested in real estate and laid the foundation of his future large fortune. March 9, 1841, he was married to Hannah E., daughter of Daniel and Lucy (Stephens) Cobb of Windham, and took his wife to Townshend, where he remained until 1858, when he removed to Chester, Vt., remaining there 10 years, when he purchased the homestead of his deceased father, where he spent the remainder of his days. At the time of his death he was a director of the People's National Bank of Brattleboro. He represented Townshend in the Legislature of 1846 and 1847, and Chester in 1859-60. He was also a member of the constitutional convention of 1870. He bequeathed a legacy of $10,000 for the benefit of the poor of his native town.

ORMANDO S. HOWARD,

second son of Chapin Howard, was born at West Townshend, Jan. 3, 1816, and died at Townshend, July 21, 1889. He was, during his life, a resident of his native town. He was married April 26, 1839, to Mary A. Fisher, and again July, 1852, to Mrs. Lucy M. Upham. He had a son and a daughter by his first wife and two sons and a daughter by his last wife. The sons and last daughter survive him.

JOSEPH TYLER.

Joseph Tyler, born in Uxbridge, Mass., May 21, 1737; died at Townshend, Vt., in the year 1815, aged 78.

Ruth, his wife, died in Townshend, Vt., July, 1825, aged 92.

He removed to Townshend from Uxbridge in the winter of 1766. Three children born to them in Uxbridge were: Lydia, Zacheus and Betsey; children born in Townshend: Ruth, Joseph and Mehitabel.

His first house was a rude log cabin, and surrounded by dense forests in every direction, when he moved his family to Townshend. There were then some 15 families living near him, all of whom, in the spirit of the age, turned out with hand-sleds and went to Brattleboro, 17 miles further down the river to help get his family to the new town. They had no path and had to be guided by the river and marked trees.

Joseph Tyler was a very conscientious, stern man, and was free to rebuke the sins of the early settlers, which caused him to have many enemies. He was no friend to Great Britain and Great Britain no friend of his, as is shown by the British government once offering a reward for his head.

The name of Joseph Tyler appears among the 15 who first formed a Congregational church in Townshend in 1778. The first meeting house was built of logs. The first minister, Rev. Mr. Dudley.

The Revolutionary war stirred the patriotic spirit of Joseph Tyler, and he joined a company of Vermonters, under Capt. Fletcher, and crossed the Green mountains to Ticonderoga and thence to Bennington to join Gen. Stark's command. He was engaged in the Bennington battle and was severely wounded, and was obliged to leave the service and went to his home a disabled man, in consequence of which he was granted a life pension.

Soon after coming home from the army he was made a justice of the peace and was afterwards elected a member of the Legislature for two years.

EBENEZER BRIGHAM,

moved to town before Vermont became a State. He built the house where Deacon J. O. Follet now lives in 1801. There were born to him six children. He was an important man in town affairs. He died in 1840. The children were John, Lyman, Moses, Judith, Wealthy and Whitney, all of whom are now dead, and mostly lived and died in town or adjoining towns. A grandson, Bela B. Brigham, is the only descendant living at this time in Townshend.

WM. JAY, was a son of Wilder Jay, lived many years ago on the farm south of one Ober's present place. His children W. L. Jay, now a prominent lawyer and President of the Sioux National Bank of Sioux City, Iowa. George L. Jay also of Sioux City and President of the Sioux Loan and Trust Company. Helen, who is the wife of a Mr. Hudson, a merchant of St. Louis.

FORBES

Brigham Forbes, born in Uxbridge, Mass., in 1803, came with his father, Moses Forbes, to Townshend, when three years old, and is a much respected old man, who still lives at the age of 88, about half a mile south of the village.

JOSEPH B. WARE,

was born in Putney, Vt., Feb. 2, 1810. In 1839, he married to Mary H. Plummer of Brattleboro. They had five children; only one is now living, J. H. Ware. Mr. Ware represented the town in the Legislature of 1880. The fiftieth anniversary of their marriage was celebrated at their home March 25, 1889.

DEACON SAMUEL GRAY, was born in Townshend in 1796, he died in 1870. He was the only son of Jonas and Hannah Gray. He married Melinda Johnson. Their children were Martha, May, Oscar and Aurilla. He faithfully served his town in various capacities. He was a liberal supporter of Leland and Gray Seminary. At a time of great need he gave the institution five hundred dollars.

COL. JONAS TWITCHELL, was born in Winchester, N. H., about the year 1805. His father died while Jonas was a young boy, and Jonas was bound out to a blacksmith. He consequently learned the blacksmith's trade. At 21 years of age he came to West Townshend and worked as journeyman. He soon after married a Miss Robbins of Jamaica and moved to East Townshend on what was then known as the Tyler place. He then engaged in blacksmithing and farming until his death, Jan. 7, 1878. While on the Tyler place his wife died, and he married for a second wife a Miss Felton of Jamaica. This last wife still survives him and now lives with one of her daughters in Athol, Mass. Col. Twitchell had three daughters and a son by his first wife and two daughters and a son by his last wife. Although Col. Twitchell was not liberally educated, he was a man of good judgment and common sense, represented his town in the Legislature and at various times filled all the offices in the town. He was also president of the Windham County Savings Bank at the time of his death.

HISTORY OF THE BAPTIST CHURCH.

The First Baptist Church was formed on the 20th day of September, 1810, and existed until near the close of 1840. The meeting-house was built in 1817. The acting pastors of the church and society are as follows: Samuel Kingsbury, from ordination in 1808, to 1817; Benjamin I. Lane, fall of 1817, to 1819; ——— Lathrop, Jan. 1820, to June 1821; George Robinson, Dec. 1821, to Dec. 1824; Joseph M. Graves, Jan. 1825, to Jan. 1829; Simeon Chamberlain, Mar. 1831, to Mar. 1834; Hiram A. Graves, spring and summer of 1835; Nathan Ames, 1836; Charles Farrar, spring of 1837, to spring of 1838.

SECOND BAPTIST CHURCH.

At the time of the organization of this body a Baptist church had existed for 17 years at the West Village. It reported to the Woodstock association 103 members, with Rev. J. W. Graves, pastor. Samuel Gray served as clerk for forty years.

On the first Sabbath of January, 1828, it was voted to employ Rev. J. M. Graves one-third of the time. Voted to secure the services of Elder Kinsbury. The next year Rev. Simeon Chamberlain supplied one-half the time.

The next three years are memorable as the transition period of the church. In 1832 Rev. R. M. Ely received a call to be pastor, and moved his family into the community. He was the first pastor of the church, and the first minister to transfer his membership to the church and supply its pulpit. In 1838 Mr. Ely resigned and removed to Chester. Rev. W. D. Upham supplied the church during his vacation, and in December following became its pastor. His pastorate extended through four years and was marked by a continuous revival. In 1844 Horace Fletcher was ordained. Mr. Fletcher had graduated at Dartmouth College at the age of 21, the first scholar in his class. Five years he then spent in teaching and the study of law; was admitted to the bar and had spent 15 years in his practice. Rev. Horace Fletcher grew in intellectual and spiritual strength, as well as influence and reputation, even into old age. The honorary title of D. D., conferred upon him from Hamilton Theological Seminary, was justly earned. After an uninterrupted pastorate of nearly 28 years, he died Nov. 1871.

Rev. R. R. Printice became pastor May 1, 1872. In 1875 Rev. C. P. Frenyear was called to the pastorate. He died May 10, 1876. Rev. T. M. Butler settled 1876; dismissed October 29, 1882. Rev. R. S. Mitchel settled June 30, 1883; dismissed July 9, 1887. Rev. W. D. Athearn settled Oct. 1, 1888; present pastor, 1891.

The First Restorationist Church was organized in 1818, during the ministry of Rev. Russell Streeter, then of Rockingham, who preached in the meeting-house once a month for two years. After Mr. Streeter went away the Restorationists ceased to have preaching at stated intervals.

METHODIST.

Commencing about the year 1830, the Methodist Conference having charge of this circuit sent some very able clergymen who labored as itinerate preachers in this and neighboring towns to about 1836. The first two who entered upon this service were Rev. Mr. Beckley and Rev. Mr. Fuller. They were followed by Rev. Zed. Twitchell and Rev. Mr. Brewster. In September, 1835, a Methodist campmeeting, which continued about a week, was held in a grove. There was a large attendance at this meeting from the Methodist societies at Athens, Newfane, Wardsboro, and Londonderry. From the spring of 1839 to the spring of 1843, the people of West Townshend and vicinity attended the Methodist church. Clergymen: Rev. Harvey Guernsey supplying for first two years of the term, and Rev. William H. Hodges for the last two.

THE FIRST CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH.

Rev. George Porter, in his anniversary sermon, sketches the history and growth of this church in the following manner:

The first town meeting of which we have any positive knowledge, was held on the 30th day of May, 1771. This was ten years after the first settlers began to occupy the town, and when the resident families were 25 in number. When and in what number the inhabitants were formed into a church, the town records say not; but the American Quarterly Register states that Rev. Nicholas Dudley, born at Epping, N. H., graduated at Harvard College in 1767, was ordained at Townshend, Vt., June 21, 1777, and was dismissed in 1780; thus laboring between two and three years. In August, 1794, Rev. Samuel Cheever, D. D., received a call to this church, and remained until 1797. From 1797 the church was supplied by Rev. Hezekiah Taylor, J. Bennington, and Mr. Whitney, neighboring ministers. Mr. Josiah Moulton received a call, remaining about a year. After Mr. Moulton, the next pastor of the church was Simeon Snow, about one year. Rev. William Riddell was born at Coleraine, Mass., Feb. 4, 1778; graduated at Dartmouth in 1793; and was licensed to preach at Newbury, Vt., in January, 1794. He remained in Townshend about three years. He married a daughter of Rev. Samuel Hopkins in 1797, by whom he had seven children, one of whom was the well-known Rev. Samuel Hopkins Riddell.

The church was supplied by ministers from neighboring towns until March, 1815.

L. Whitcomb, ordained and installed Aug. 29, 1815; died in Savannah, Georgia, January 2, 1821. Philetus Clark, was ordained and installed Nov. 21, 1821; dismissed July 6, 1824. James Kimball, ordained and installed Jan. 13, 1825; dismissed Oct. 6, 1830. H. N. Graves, ordained and installed Feb. 5, 1833; dismissed Sept. 14, 1848. John Wood came Jan. 1849, settled June, 1850; dismissed Apr. 11, 1854. Remained as pastor till Nov. 11, 1858. C. L. Cushman, ordained and installed Dec. 22, 1859; dismissed Oct. 15, 1866. A. S. Barton, installed Mar. 12, 1867; dismissed Dec. 13, 1869. F. W. Olmstead, acting pastor; called June 13, 1870; resigned Oct., 1872. George Porter, acting pastor; called July 1, 1877; resigned Oct. 1882. H. H. Actarian, acting pastor; called July 1, 1883. 1891, present pastor, C. T. Switzer.

CEMETERIES.

On the farm of General Fletcher, and a short distance from the present dwelling-house of John S. Fullerton, were buried all who died in the district prior to 1799. Use of this place for burial purposes was abandoned near the close of 1814. Here are the graves of General Fletcher and some members of his family.

Maple Grove Cemetery is situated about 100 rods west of Townshend village on the north side of the road leading from said village to West Townshend, and contains about one acre of land. It was given for a burial ground by Zatter Butterfield. A Mrs. Brown who died in 1812 was the first body buried in the cemetery. It was the only cemetery near the village until about the year 1862. In the vicinity of 1880 Miss Lucy P. Tyler of Somerville, Mass., and a former resident of Townshend, started a fund, the income of which was to be used in caring for the graves and lots of the friends of the donors. The fund has since been increased to $350.

A substantial brick tomb was built at a cost of about $500, the old tombs removed, the wall rebuilt and other work done at a cost of about $300. In 1890 there was $200 expended in grading the grounds with money that the late Daniel Read gave for that purpose.

Oakwood Cemetery is located about 100 rods south of the westerly part of the village of Townshend. The land was bought by the town in the year 1864, and contains about four acres, including the old cemetery, which has been added to it. At the time of purchase a portion of the grounds were laid out into lots, drives and walks; and on June 11, 1884, J. H. Phelps, S. D. Winslow, 2d, and Henry Salisbury were chosen by the town a committee to take charge of said cemetery.

REPRESENTATIVES TO THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY.

1778-79, 1807, Samuel Fletcher; 1780, Silas Hayward; 1781, 1785-90, Dr. Joshua Wood; 1782, no choice; 1783-84, Joseph Tyler; 1791, 1794-95, Dr. John Hazelton; 1792-93-96-1803, Ephriam Wheelock; 1804-06, 1809-11, John Dyer; 1808-12-13, Ezekiel Ransom; 1814-15, Amri Doolittle, jr.; 1816-17-21, Munnis Kenney; 1818, 20, 22, 24, Peter R. Taft; 1819-23, Dana Bailey; 1825, Luke S. Rand; 1826-27, Epaphroditus Ransom; 1828-30, William R. Shafter; 1831, John P. Marsh; 1832, no choice; 1833, Waitstill R. Ranney; 1834-36, Chapin Howard; 1837-39, John H. Brigham; 1840, Samuel F. Thompson; 1841-42, James McShafter; 1843, Nathan Fisher; 1844-45, Henry L. Aiken; 1846-47, Aurelius C. Howard; 1848-49, 1867, James H. Phelps; 1850, William H. Jay; 1851, 53, 1861, Francis D. Sawyer; 1854, Rev. Horace Fletcher; 1855-56, Esek Atwood; 1852, 59, 78-79, Oscar R. Garfield; 1859-60, Abishai Stoddard; 1862, Jonas Twitchell; 1863-64, Ormando S. Howard; 1865-66, John H. Converse; 1868-69, Henry Salisbury; 1870-71, 82-83, Philip H. Rutter; 1872-73, Masenna F. Balou; 1874-75, John S. Fullerton; 1876-77, Rev. Franklin W. Omsted; 1880-81, Joseph B. Ware; 1882-83, Oscar R. Garfield; 1884-85, Philip H. Rutter; 1886-87, Henry Underwood; 1888-89, Choate Howard; 1890-91, E. L. Hastings.

POST-OFFICE AND POST-MASTERS.

The first post-office established in town was in West Townshend, March 23, 1811, and the first post-master was made under Madison and was Chas. Phelps, who retained the office for a long period. The only office in town remained here until

Dec. 25, 1820, when it was removed to the East Village, which is nearer the centre of the town. Amos Doolittle was appointed by Munroe, the first post-master in the new office. The mail was for a long time carried on horseback. In 1824, a gig was first used and trips were made weekly. In 1828, the first coach was used upon the road. In about 1844, service was increased to daily trips each way and thus continued until carried by rail car, Dec. 20, 1880. The following persons were post-masters after Amos Doolittle, with date of their appointment:

O. Doolittle, Dec. 18, 1824; John P. Marsh, May 21, 1825; Epaphroditus Ransom, Sept. 14, 1831; Ezekiel Ransom, Sept. 23, 1834; John Roberts, April 11, 1835; Oscar F. Butterfield, July 21, 1845; Henry M. Weatherbee, May 1, 1851; Oscar F. Butterfield, April 5, 1852; Nathaniel Cheney, Nov. 21, 1861; Henry Salisbury, Sept. 20, 1869; Ann C. Howard, Aug. 14, 1885.

LEGACY OF AURELIUS C. HOWARD.

It is my will, and I hereby direct, that the sum of ten thousand dollars be set apart and given to the town of Townshend, in the County of Windham and State of Vermont, the interest of said ten thousand dollars to be applied in providing for and comfortably supporting the poor of said town of Townshend, so long as my lineal descendants shall not require the same for their support and maintenance. At a meeting duly held on the 19th of Dec. 1881, three trustees, Horace C. Howard, Ormando S. Howard and James H. Phelps were chosen to receive, manage and have the control of the bequest.

BRATTLEBORO AND WHITEHALL RAILROAD CO.

The town of Townshend has 370 shares of stock at $100 each, $37,000.

shares, $600; Ira R. Batchelder, 1 share, $100; N. Pierce, 2 shares, $200; Rev. Mark Carpenter, 3 shares, $300; Daniel Read, 3 shares, $300; Adin Holbrook, 1 share, $100; A. Stoddard, 2 shares, $200; A. C. Howard, 10 shares, $1000; Josiah W. Taft, 1 share, $100; O. S. Howard, 3 shares, $300; S. D. Winslow, 2d, 2 shares, $200. Number shares taken by persons above named, 36 at $100; number shares taken by the town, 370, at $100. Given by tax-payers of Townshend towards building the railroad. Shares of the town were taken on condition that the railroad from Mill Brook, Harmonyville, to Jamaica line, should be located on and not removed from the east or left bank of West river.

INN KEEPERS.

The first tavern keeper in the East Village was a Mr. Butterfield. He was followed by Capt. James Taggart, who kept a good house in the brick building which was long after known as the Ranney residence. Before it was converted into a private residence, Chester Rand kept a hotel, then following Capt. Taggart who, after selling out to Rand, built the present hotel now kept by O. F. Coombs. Taggart had just completed his new hotel when Daniel Webster spoke on the political issues of the day in 1840, on Stratton mountain, to the people of Vermont living both sides of the Green mountains. Webster stopped over night with Capt. Taggart on his way to Stratton. This is the only hotel in the town to-day, and has been occupied by the following inn-keepers after Taggart: Abner Johnson, Allen, Taggart again, Thomas Evans, R. M. Flint, Holbrook and Burke, C. H. Willard and the present occupant, O. F. Coombs.

GRAFTON.

By CHRISTOPHER W. HALL.

GRAFTON.

Boundaries: Chester on the N., Rockingham on the E., S. by Athens and Townshend, W. by Windham: Village about 10 miles from Bellows Falls; a daily stage through from the Falls to Townshend.

THE SURFACE OF THE TOWNSHIP is broken; hills which do not seem to belong to any clearly defined range, rise up in all parts of the town and stand facing each other in all conceivable positions. Yet the soil is fertile, the farmer is repaid for his labor by the yield of the staple products of this section of Vermont. It is a good grazing town. The sunny hillsides yield sweet, rich feed, so that the cattle and horses of Grafton have become widely known as among the best in the State.

SAXTON RIVER,

which rises in Windham and flows southerly through this town, is its principle stream. It furnishes a good waterpower at Houghtonville, Grafton Village and Cambridgeport, at which latter place it flows into Rockingham.

A stream called South Branch, rises also in Windham, flows southerly across the S. W. of Grafton into Townshend, and thence back into Grafton and unites with Saxton River at Grafton Village.

The town was first chartered, Apr. 6, 1754, but as possession was not taken of the grant, it was rechartered, Sept. 1, 1763, by name of Thomlinson.

GRANTEES:

Johnathan Whitney, Nathaniel Holt, Nathaniel Harris, Benoni Boynton, Jr., Johnathan Wood, Benj. Weatherbee, Isaac Holden, Samuel Preston, Jona. Whitcombe, Eleazer Davis, Oliver Corey, Stephen Shattuck, Ezekiel Chase, Thomas Bell, Esq., Jacob Gould, Jr., Jacob Gould, Stephen Goodridge, John Buttrick, Stephen Stickney, Nehemiah Bowers, Nathan Chase, Joseph Worcester, Thomas Warren, William Holt, Phillip Goodridge, Peter Read, Ephriam Whitney, Samuel Larabee, Eleazer Lawrence, Jr., James Preston, Joseph Baker, Jr., John Baker, Jacob Fox, Stephen Chase, Benj. Shattuck, Matthew Livermore, Oliver Gould, Thomas Gould, Jr., Roger King, Zachariah Whitney, Oliver Stickney, James Allen, Simon Tuttle, Simon Tuttle, Jr., Jonas Warren, Oliver Warren, John Fox, Jr., Daniel Fox, John Tomlinson, Jr., Theodore Atkinson, Esq., Dan Warner, Esq., Joshua Stickney, James King, Peter Fox, Thomas Newman, Esq., John Wentworth, Esq., Speaker Sherburne, John Thomlinson, Esq.

On condition of their becoming actual settlers, they were given undisputed title to this tract of land containing 23,050 acres together with 1040 acres free.

The conditions were the same as in all the New Hampshire town charters.

It appears that Thomlinson never was settled by these proprietors. A meeting for the election of town officers was appointed for the 1st Tuesday of Dec. 1763, which was notified by Oliver Corey, who signed himself, moderator.

I find no proof that the town was settled for some years after the last charter was granted. It is said a Mr. Slack was the first settler.

The first permanent settlement was made in the spring of 1780. Samuel Spring built a house and commenced a clearing on the hill between where Samuel Spring, Jr., afterwards lived, and where Daniel Barton now lives. He was accompanied into town by Amos Fisher, Benjamin Wetherbee, and Edward Putnam. They came from Winchester and located in different parts of the town. They were soon followed by David Stickney, Moses and Aaron Putnam, Job Gleason, Thomas Kinney, Asa Fisher and several other families.

The town records on its early history are very meagre, some parts of them having been destroyed. First, is recorded a warrant of Nov. 2, 1781, from Ira Allen, treasurer of the State of Vermont, to Amos Fisher, constable of the town of Thomlinson, notifying him of a tax of 10 s on each 100 acres of land, and to collect it; to seize and dispose of the goods or estate of such person or persons as should refuse or neglect to pay the same, after giving the land owners of the town due notice, "Forthwith to pay the said tax or I shall make sale." The constable did sell at public vendue, Aug. 5, 1782, 118 pieces of land, and 61 of those pieces contained 100 acres and upwards.

The first death recorded was that of Asa Fisher, Jr., son of Asa and Esther Fisher, June 19, 1780.

The first birth recorded was in 1783; the first marriage in 1784.

The first town meeting of which we have any record was in 1783. Aaron Putnam was first town clerk.

They voted to have preaching from the neighboring towns that season and appointed a committee to obtain it.

In 1785, March 21, they voted at the town meeting that each man in town should give one day's work towards clearing off a piece of land to be used for a burying ground.

It was also voted that all their ox sleds should be four feet wide. In this warrant was an article to see if the town would take any steps towards building a meeting house, but no action was taken.

The town meetings were held in private houses till a meeting house was erected, 1793; they were held there until 1857, when the town bought the store of John Barrett and fitted up the second story for a town hall.

In these days, the office of holding the key of the meeting house was invested with considerable dignity. At the annual meeting the key was struck off to the lowest bidder, who was to open the house whenever it should be used that year, and sweep the house five times. The usual price paid for this high trust was 75 cents per year.

Town taxes and other dues were paid in grain. One year, 1788, £30 was raised, the whole paid in rye at 4 s per bushel; money was scarce.

Since the town was organized, there have been many changes; the first was the change of its name from Thomlinson to Grafton, Oct. 31, 1791.

In 1816 its limits were extended to take in parts of Athens and Avery's Gore.

In 1808, John Barrett and Barzillai Burgess, selectmen, determined on being strict guardians of the interests of the town, pursued the old practice general then in the towns of "warning out"—[ordering the departure from the town of all persons they pleased to think liable in the future to need assistance from the town. A law they had the power to promulgate, but not to enforce. See warning out, proceedings and definitions of, in the history of other towns in the past volumes. And, see here!] Among many others, Mr. Daniel Joslyn, an easy, mirth-loving, whole-souled farmer, was warned to leave. Of which he took no notice except to joke over. And the energetic young bachelor, Barrett, little thought that he was commanding his future wife to depart, upon the plea that he believed that she might be at some future time a town pauper. Had the jovial old gentleman seen fit to have obeyed the summons, the people of Grafton would not have been gladdened years afterwards by the genial countenance of that kind old lady, whose sympathetic heart and benevolent hand carried joy and gladness to many a sinking heart, and supplied the wants of so many needy ones.

Also, a young physician came into town with no worldly goods but his saddle bags and a good name. The sleepless eyes of the guardians of the town were immediately upon him. A paper was put into the hands of the constable and read:

"To Caleb Hall, Constable: You are hereby directed to summons Dr. John Butterfield to depart this town forthwith; hereof fail not, but make due return.

JOHN BARRETT, }
BARZILLAI BURGESS, } Selectmen.

And to the fact that the doctor did not obey this mandate, Grafton has ever since owed much of the business energy for which the town has been and is still distinguished. It is a noted fact that no merchant has ever failed in town; on the contrary, all have retired from business with a good property.

The first saw mill was built by Mr. Bolles on land now owned by Metcalf Walker; for building it he was to receive one lot of land. He erected his mill and sawed one log, which gave him a title to the land.

The first grist-mill was built by Dr. Fisher, the first physician, who moved into town in 1780, and also a saw-mill was built on a branch of Saxtons River. These it appears were the first mills.

In 1788 two men from Jaffrey, N. H., opened a store near the Centre, but soon left, and a man from Westminster opened one at the Centre.

In 1782, James Rhoades, a Revolutionary soldier, whose baptism of fire and blood was at Lexington, moved here from Keene, N. H., and built the first framed house. It had but two or three rooms and the windows were of ising-glass.

In 1824, there were 11 school districts, 10 school houses, 4 saw-mills, 3 grist-mills, 2 fulling mills, 2 carding machines, 3 stores, 2 tanneries, which would indicate nearly as much business as at the present. Many old trades have passed away, but industries then comparatively unheard of are now flourishing, such as free-stone quarrying and the manufacture of various articles of wooden ware.

EDUCATIONAL.

The people of Grafton have always been characterized by zeal for public schools; their district schools have been good, and the academies at Townshend and Chester have ever received a liberal support from this town; a goodly number have been college graduates, one,

BENJ. W. DEAN, served as Secretary of State four years, also Register of Probate 11 years.

EBENEZER BURGESS,

another, is now a missionary to India.

CHARLES BARRETT,

a Grafton graduate, has served as State senator two terms, besides holding other offices of public trust.

DAVID PALMER

studied theology at Newton Seminary.

FRANK B. DANIELS

graduated at Harvard College.

Many terms of select schools have been taught in town, and in 1866 a graded school with a high school in connection, where one may fit for college or business, was established and has been well supported.

MINERALOGICAL.

Grafton is rich in mineralogical specimens. Much of the rock is Green Mountain gneiss, together with such other kinds as are found in the surrounding towns.

Serpentine exists in small quantities; cyanite or sappar is found about one mile southwest of the village. It is in compressed hexagonal prisms in mica slate and massive garnet; sulphuret of iron in small, brown cubes, and various kinds of quartz.

STEATITE,

or soapstone. Quite an extensive bed of it lies in the southern edge of this town and in the northern part of Athens. Work was commenced on the quarry in Grafton first. This has been worked longer, with more profit, and has produced more stone than any other quarry in Vermont.

It has been excavated about 15 rods in length, 5 or 6 in width and at a depth varying from 10 to 25 feet. The stone lies in stratified beds, as can easily be seen in the edges of the quarry. There are seams of rhomb spar and talc that extend along in line or are disseminated through in small imperfect crystals which upon long exposure become decomposed and wash out, tarnishing the surface of the rocks below.

Immediately upon the soapstone is found black mica and shady talc, and in the latter a dark colored actinolite, and above this is a bed of hard, compact hornblende of varying thickness which proves a protector against atmospheric agency. In some places upon these quarries a layer of hornblende is often found between two of steatite. (See Hitchcock's Geological Report of Vermont, Vol. II.)

The Lower Quarry is the one in Grafton. This and the one in Athens lie in the same vein of stone about 60 rods apart. That soapstone existed there has been known ever since the settlement of the town. The settlers were accustomed to go with their axes, cut out blocks and fashion them for their hearthstones, but quarrying was not commenced as a business until about 1825, and then first on a small scale, chiefly manufactured for pipes, for water-courses. Col. Miner owned the land, sold out lots for working, and a number of men quarried each for himself; but now the whole quarry is under the supervision of one firm.

Butterfield & Smith have owned and worked the quarry a number of years. They have two mills at Cambridgeport where they saw with a common mill-saw and prepare for market all the stone they quarry, which amounts to about 400 tons annually, worth in the block at an average of $28, but prepared for market makes a total of $15,000.

THE WOOLEN MANUFACTURE.

Woolen cloths have been the chief article of manufacture. A factory was first built by Dean & Alexander in 1831. Jan. 9, 1839, it was burned. Alexander sold out his interest after the fire, but it was rebuilt the same year by Peter W. Dean, in 1854 enlarged and new machinery added. In 1863 it was changed to a corporation and called the "Grafton Manufacturing Company," which, in 1867, was sold out to Messrs. Sabin & Fairbrother of Saxtons River. Fairbrother sold his interest to Sabin who has since conducted the business alone, manufacturing annually 75,000 yards,—cassimeres, doeskins, but chiefly kerseymeres.

A smaller manufacture of woolens was also carried on many years by Mr. Wooley, half a mile below the village. A few years since his mill was turned into a shop for the manufacture of wooden ware.

GRAFTON INDUSTRIAL ASSOCIATION.

In February, 1860, a Farmers' Club was organized, with S. D. Conant, president, and Charles Barrett, secretary. Grafton claims to have organized the first club of this character in Vermont.

THE GREAT FRESHET OF 1869

did much damage in this town. Roads were so washed away in many spots, they had to be made in new places, and nearly all the bridges in town were carried off. It cost the town about $12,000 to repair its highways.

HON. DAVID L. PUTNAM

was born in Grafton, 1811. His parents were not wealthy and he only had the advantages of a common school and a few terms at an academy, when he commenced the study of law in the office of Daniel Kellogg, Esq., at Saxtons River. After admission to the bar, he opened his office in Grafton, and rose rapidly in his profession. His ability as a legal adviser and advocate was marked for a man of his years.

In 1836 he was chosen judge of probate, and about this time he began to show evidences of insanity, which was hereditary, and for a long time was of a mild form; his mind appeared to be sound, he was keen in business and well-balanced in judgment; yet upon one subject he was most grievously at fault; he thought—he was a single man—that Queen Victoria was his wife. Impressed with this idea he fitted up a suit of rooms in almost regal style for her which he never suffered to be used, but kept in waiting with his table richly spread, a supply of dainty food fresh prepared each day. He was daily expecting her and went down to meet her when the stage came in; constantly disappointed he never abandoned the idea.

At first he was rather reticent except with a few particular friends. He watched and waited, and at last to ease his disappointments took to alcoholic drinks and squandered his property, finally became wholly insane, was taken to Brattleboro and died there.

WESTMINSTER.

BY REV. F. J. FAIRBANKS.

"The Revolutionary War—

Who, but the heroes of Vermont
Were first to strike the blow?
At Lexington and Bunker Hill,
Before a martyr bled,
The first blood of that glorious war
At Westminster was shed."

—Chas. G. Eastman.

WESTMINSTER.

In the south-eastern part of the Green Mountain State, four miles below Belows Falls, on the west bank of the Connecticut River, lies the quiet, rural town of Westminster; noted not less for its picturesque beauty, than for the stirring scenes in which it took an active part in the early history of the State.

This township, embracing an area of 6 miles square, has for its western boundary, Brookline and Athens, with Rockingham on the north, and Putney on the south. It is divided into two parishes by a natural barrier, consisting of a ridge of hills, running diagonally through the town and forming a junction with the Connecticut at Putney.

The geographical features of the town are peculiar. The principal village, which lies in the eastern part, is surrounded by semicircular ranges of hills of moderate elevation, which, with the more gradual slope on the New Hampshire side, forms a vast amphitheatre, enclosing within its area the fertile meadows that lie spread out beneath, and the river of Connecticut that rolls between. Nature in this region has been somewhat lavish of her gifts. Aside from the natural fertility of the soil, the beauty of the scenery upon either side of the valley is such as to attract the attention of the most casual observer, and to the lover of nature, has charms that delight, but never tire.

There are three ranges of hills running through the township, parallel to each other and rising in gradual succession, the western being the most elevated of the three, with considerable valleys between. The West Parish lies to the west of the first range, and mostly in the second valley, through which runs a small stream upon which is situated the village. The soil, though not as fertile as the alluvial plains along the Connecticut valley, is nevertheless valuable for purposes of grazing and agriculture, and yields to the husbandman a good return.

THE GEOLOGICAL FORMATION of the eastern part of the township is clay slate, and of the western part, calciferous mica schist, and in some localities gneiss occurs. The meadows along the river in the eastern part consist of a rich alluvial soil, resting upon a bed of clay. The second plain from the river bed consists of a light, sandy loam; underneath this is a stratum of gravel, extending from 20 to 40 feet in depth, lying upon a bed of blue clay from two to three feet thick, and this resting upon a bed of quicksand. This stratum of clay dips from the hills on the west to the river on the east, and determines the depth at which in different localities water can be obtained for the supply of springs and wells. In some parts of this mineral waters, strongly impregnated with iron, are found. Several clay beds of excellent quality are found, some of which is said to be nearly as good as that at Bennington. There are also two beds of marl; one in the west part, on the farm of Mr. Cowles, of some 15 acres, covered with a bed of muck from 15 to 20 feet thick and more. The other is in the east part, on the farm of Mr. O. F. Peck. Both of these are said to be and the latter has not yet been noted in the Geology of Vermont; nor are we aware that any shell marl has been described in Vermont, situated as far south.

CLAY BED

THE TERRACES

at Westminster which contribute so much to the natural beauty of the location, are worthy of special mention here. These are supposed to have formed the river bed of the Connecticut at different periods. At Westminster village they are four in number and correspond with those upon the opposite side of the valley. The first, or lowest, is that which extends along the river bank, and forms the broad alluvial plain which is crossed by the "Upper Street." The second extends about one mile each way, being somewhat narrowed at its lower end, is crossed by the "Lower Street," and contains the central part of the village. Continuations of this terrace may be seen extending north and south, but now separated from it. A portion of the third terrace forms the site of the new cemetery.

The same plain is extended both north and south. The fourth may be seen on land of N. G. Pierce, east of the house. The elevation of these terraces as ascertained by Prof. Hitchcock in the geological survey of the State, is as follows: The first is 24 feet above the present river bed and 255 feet above the sea; the second is 94 feet above the river; the third, 139, and the fourth, 171. We find another series of terraces, nine in number, near the mouth of Saxton's River, just below Bellows Falls. Their heights above the Connecticut are given as 26, 35, 34, 38, 83, 117, 138, 161 and 226 feet, the lowest being 261, and the highest, 461 feet above the sea. The second and third of these are what is called by geologists the glacial terrace and are said by Prof. Hitchcock to be the most perfect specimens found in Vermont. Their length is 14 and 16 rods, and their thickness 10 and 12 feet.

Through the principal village, which is situated upon the two lower terraces, extends a broad and beautiful avenue some two miles in length and six rods in width, running nearly parallel with the river. This avenue, laid out in the time of George II., was originally 10 rods wide, and was called

THE KING'S HIGHWAY.

Aside from its ordinary purposes it was set apart by the original proprietors as a training field, for which it afforded ample accommodations. On either side may be seen the neat and commodious dwellings of the inhabitants, and among them some of revolutionary fame; for instance, the old meeting house, erected one hundred years ago, and formerly stood in the middle of the King's highway. "Norton's tavern," with its gambrel-roof, upon the Upper Street, and "Goold's tavern," on the Lower Street, the former the rendezvous of the Tories, and the latter of the Whigs, in revolutionary times.

THE ORIGINAL GRANT

UNDER MASSACHUSETTS.

It appears from the original documents,* that the tract of land nearly answering to the present territory of Westminster, was granted to certain petitioners from Taunton by The Great and General Court of Massachusetts, 24 Nov., 1735, they having been admitted as grantees on the 19th of the same month.

In compliance with many petitions for grants of land on the Merrimack and Connecticut Rivers, it was ordered by the Great and General Court held at Boston, Jan. 15, 1735, that a careful survey be made of the lands between the Merrimack and Connecticut Rivers,

* The volume containing the original records of the proprietors of Township No. 1, was discovered in 1848, by Mr. Timothy H. Hall, sheriff of Windham county, while examining the Cheshire county records at Keene, N. H. On giving bonds for the safe keeping of this volume, he was permitted to take it home with him. The people of Westminster voted $20 to procure a fac-simile copy, to preserve these records from oblivion. The original volume was afterward presented to the town of Westminster by the judges of the Cheshire County Court. The hand writing is of rare beauty, the cover of parchment, and the whole in an excellent state of preservation. The volume also contains the records of the original grantees of Winchester, Westmoreland and Claremont.

from the northwest corner of Rumford on the Merrimack to the Great Falls on the Connecticut, of 12 miles at the least in breadth; this tract to be divided into as many townships of 6 miles square as the land in breadth would allow of. Also the land on the west side of the Connecticut, from said Falls to the "Equivalent Land," so called, to be divided into one or two townships of 6 miles square if the same would allow.

A committee of eleven were appointed for this purpose and empowered to employ surveyors and chainmen to assist them in surveying and laying out the townships, the province to bear the charge and be repaid by the grantees who should be admitted. This committee were also empowered to admit 60 settlers in each township, and require them to give bonds to the value of £40 each for the performance of the conditions of their grant.

CONDITIONS OF THE GRANT.

Persons who had not received grants of land within the space of 7 years last past could be admitted as grantees. In case a sufficient number of this class did not appear others could be admitted who had received grants elsewhere, provided they had fulfilled the conditions of their former grant.

Each grantee was to "Build a dwelling house of eighteen feet square, and seven feet stud, at the least, on their respective Home Lots, and fence in or break up for plowing, or clear and stock five acres with English grass within three years next after their admittance, and cause their respective Lots to be inhabited; and that the Grantees do within the space of three years from the time of their being admitted, build and finish a convenient Meeting House for the Publick Worship of GOD, and settle a learned Orthodox Minister."

The committee were also

"To take care that there be sixty-three House Lots laid out in as regular, compact, and defensible a manner as possible; one of which lots shall be for the First Settled Minister, one for the Second Settled Minister, and one for the School."

In accordance with the foregoing provisions 28 townships were laid out between the Merrimack and Connecticut Rivers, and on the west side of Connecticut River, Township No. 1, now Westminster, was granted to a number of persons from Taunton, Norton, and Easton, Mass., and from Ashford and Killingly, Ct.

GRANTEES.

The names of those who were admitted as grantees were: Joseph Tisdale, Samuel Sumner, Benjamin Rugles, James Williams, Thomas Clapp, Eliphalet Leonard, Seth Staples, Seth Sumner, James Leonard, Morgan Cobb 2d, Edmond Andrews, John Harvey, James Leonard 3d, Edward Blake, Joseph Willis, Eliakim Walker, Josiah Lincoln, Jonathan Paddleford, jun., Joseph Barney, John Smith 2d, Joseph Wilbore, Jonathan Barney, Ebenezer Dean, James Walker, Ebenezer Smith, Joseph Eddy, James Leonard 2d, Joseph Tisdale, jun., James Walker, jr., Ezra Dean, Ephraim Dean, William Ware, Ebenezer Cobb, Israel Tisdale.

A copy of the order of the General Court for the first meeting of the grantees of township No. 1:

"At a Great and General Court held in Boston, the Twenty-Fourth Day of November, One Thousand Seven Hundred and Thirty-Six,* the following vote passed the Two Houses, and was consented to by the Governour, viz.:

* There is a discrepancy in the records between this and subsequent dates. The first meeting of the grantees, which must have occurred after the grant was made, was in Jan., 1736, and there are records of two other meetings of the proprietors during this same year, from which we infer that the grant must have been made November, 1735.

Voted: That Mr. Joseph Tisdale of Taunton, be, and hereby is empowered to assemble the Grantees of the Township No. 1, on the west side of the Connecticut River, adjoining to the Equivalent Land, so called, giving timely notice to the said grantees admitted into the said township by the committee of their court, and to meet in Taunton where they live, in order to chuse a Moderator and Proprietor's Clerk, and Committee to allot and divide their Lands, and to dispose of the same, and to pass such votes and orders as by them may be thought conducive for the speedy fulfillment of the conditions of their Grants. And also to agree upon Methods for calling of Meetings for the future."

It thus appears that Westminster, then known as Township No. 1, or, as it was sometimes called, in honor of the residence of the greater number of the grantees, was the first township granted in the State of Vermont, although the charter of the present Westminster, received from the government of New Hampshire, bears the date 9 Nov., 1752, being the third town chartered in the State, Bennington and Halifax having received theirs a few years before.

NEW TAUNTON,

THE FIRST MEETING OF THE GRANTEES was held at the school house in Taunton, 14 Jan., 1736. A committee of six was appointed who should repair to Township No. 1, and lay out 63 house lots according to the direction of the General Court; each lot not to exceed 50 acres, nor less than 10, and to proportion the same according to quality, that each lot might be of equal value. They were also to select a suitable place for the meeting-house and lay out a convenient road or roads through the town, and also lay out a convenient training-field and burying-place, near the meeting-house plat, and also lay out a convenient place (if any there be) near to or within said house lots, for a saw-mill and a grist-mill.

The interval lands were also to be laid out into 63 lots, according to quality; each proprietor to pay for one whole right (i. e., one house lot and one interval lot) the sum of 30 shillings to defray the cost of the allotment of the lands. These lots, one of each kind, were, 26 Sept., 1737, assigned to the grantees, each person receiving as many rights as he had given bonds for and paid charges. Proposals were also received for building a saw-mill and a grist-mill. We have not been able to determine the location of this mill. There were two streams afterwards called "Mill brooks," one north of the street, now known as "Governor's Brook," and one south, known as the "Underwood Brook." It is not certain that the grist mill was built at that time. The oldest inhabitants say that their grandfathers used to go to Northfield to mill.

The grist mill was undertaken by several of the proprietors and, as appears from the records of a meeting held 8 July, 1740, had been completed at that time, and measures were taken to open a road to it, for which purpose £30 were appropriated. The committee to take the matter into consideration were of the opinion "That the ten rods highway be cleared and made passable from the four rods highway that is between the 47th and 48th lots southward to said saw mill; and so over as far as can be done with the thirty pounds."

The 48th house lot is the one which Joseph Tisdale sold to Richard Ellis, and which was drawn to the 45th original right.

On the 28 May, 1739, a sum to the amount of £240 was appropriated for the encouragement of the first settlers, one half to be paid to such of the proprietors as should actually repair to No. 1 during that year and build a dwelling house on his lot according to court act, and by June 15, 1740, fence in and break up for plowing, or clear and stock with English grass, 5 acres of land. The remaining half to be paid to such as should actually inhabit their houses, either by themselves or some other Christian subject to the King, for the space of three months from 15 June, 1740, each one to draw his proportion according to the number of houses he should have inhabited at the end of that time.

It appears from the records that one did repair to Township No. 1 in 1739, built a dwelling house, broke up 5 or 6 acres of land, and received for his services a gratuity of £45. Several others were, during this and the next year, engaged in laying out roads and building fences and received gratuities for their services. The proprietors had in project other improvements, such as the laying out of lands not already appropriated and the construction of a road to Fort Dummer, when on the 5th of March, 1740, the northern boundary line of Massachusetts was fixed, which excluded Township No. 1 from that province.

RICHARD ELLIS

LAST PROPRIETOR'S MEETING AT TAUNTON.

At a meeting of the proprietors held at the school house in Taunton, Apr. 5, 1742, Joseph Eddy was appointed agent to wait on the committee of the General Court to whom they gave bonds for the settlement of the township, to acquaint them with their difficulties and the labor and money they had expended in settling their grant, and to receive such directions as might be of service to them in securing their rights under the jurisdiction of New Hampshire. This appears to have been the last meeting of the proprietors under the jurisdiction of Massachusetts, and the settlement was probably abandoned on the breaking out of Cape Breton War.

In the opening of 1751,

with his wife and son, Asa, removed from Northfield, Mass., to No. 1, at which time there were but two houses in the place; one on the top and the other at the foot of Willard's or Clapp's hill, at the southern extremity of the 10 rods highway. The latter, which was unoccupied, was probably the one built by Mr. Ellis and his son in 1739. Mr. Averill moved into the one on the top of the hill, which had been occupied by four men, one woman and two children. The men were William Gould and his son, John, Amos Carpenter, and Atherton Chaffee. Two of these, Gould and Carpenter, removed their families from Northfield to No. 1 during the summer of the same year. The first child born in Westminster was Anna Averill, in the autumn of 1751.

WESTMINSTER UNDER NEW HAMPSHIRE CHARTER,

9 Nov., 1752.

PROPRIETORS: Josiah Willard for and in behalf of Samuel Greeley, Jas. Hills, John Hunt, Benjamin Farwell, Robert Usher, Samuel Cummings, Josiah Brown, Peter Powers, John Chamberlain, Jonathan Cumnings, John Usher, Robert Fletcher, Jonathan Cummings, jun., Jonathan Willard, Prentice Willard, Solomon Willard, Ebenezer Field, John Pierce, Nathaniel Mattoon, Wm. Wilson, John Taylor, Jonathan Hubbard, James Jewel, Jos. Ashley, Sam'l Ashley, Josiah Willard, jun., William Willard, Billy Willard, Ephraim Dean, Wilder Willard, Jethro Wheeler, John Averill, Michael Gilson.

On the 9th Nov., 1752, township No. 1 was re-chartered by Governor Benning Wentworth, of New Hampshire, and its name changed to Westminster.

Under this charter the township was entitled to the privilege of holding town fairs as soon as there should be 50 families resident and settled. It was also provided that a town market should be opened and kept one or more days each week, as might be most advantageous to the inhabitants.

The conditions of this grant were that every grantee should plant or cultivate 5 acres of land within 5 years for every 50 acres contained in his share, and continue to improve and settle the same by additional cultivation on penalty of the forfeiture of his grant.

A reservation was also made of all white and other pine trees fit for masting the royal navy.

A reservation was also made of a tract of land as near the center of the township as the land would admit, for town lots (this reservation to be made before any further division of land); one of these lots to be divided among the grantees, each receiving one acre and paying for it one ear of Indian corn on the first day of January each year for 10 years, if lawfully demanded, and after that a revenue of one shilling a year for every 100 acres he owned.

The first meeting of the grantees was held at Winchester, at the house of Josiah Willard, 22 Aug., 1753, and met by several adjournments at Fort Dummer, 29 Oct. of the same year.

It was decided at this latter meeting that those proprietors who had purchased rights according to the Massachusetts grant, and now held those rights, should have their house lots and first division meadow lots where they had them before, and have the liberty of taking them without a draft, and that the rest of the house lots and meadow lots be drawn for, and that there be six house lots and six meadow lots laid out, the house lots to contain 15 acres each and the meadow lots not above 4 acres each, after which there should be a second division of all the meadow land in the township, and also a division of upland, each to be divided equally into 69 lots, the upland not to contain less than 50 acres to each proprietor. It was also voted to lay out the Governor's two shares at the upper end of the township (now known as the "Church Meadow"), and to lay out the whole of the share belonging to the glebe or Church of England in some suitable place, and the share for the Incorporated Society where the committee should think best. The records contain no account of any further meeting of the proprietors for more than 7 years.

INDIAN ALARMS.

The year of 1753 had been one of comparative quiet. During the latter part of the summer of the following year the Indians began their incursions on several of the settlements of New Hampshire. Mr. Johnson and family were taken captive at Charlestown, "No. 4," and carried to Canada. This alarmed the inhabitants of Westminster, who were few in number and poorly protected, and they removed to Walpole where they remained until October, and then returned. In the spring Mr. Averill and family removed to Putney, and the settlement was for a time abandoned.

On the 11th June, 1760, Col. Josiah Willard, jun., obtained a renewal of the charter of Westminster and called a meeting of the proprietors, which was held Feb. 4, 1761, at the house of John Averill, in Westminster, of which Benjamin Bellows, of Walpole, was moderator. Measures were taken for an allotment of the lands, and preparations made for a permanent settlement.

GRANTEES OF THE RENEWED CHARTER.

The names of the proprietors at the time of the renewal of the charter, 11 June, 1760, were :

1. John Hulbert ; 2. Josiah Willard ;
3. William Willard ; 4. Valentine Butler ; 5. Joseph Alexander ; 6. Nathan Willard ; 7. Susannah Gilson ;
8. Oliver Willard ; 9. John Arms ;
10. Wilder Willard ; 11. John Moor ;
12. John Moor, jun. ; 13. Daniel Whitmore ; 14. William Willard, jun. ;
15. Prentice Willard ; 16. Ephraim Dean ; 17. Elijah Cady ; 18. Asa Douglass ; 19. Samuel Ashley ; 20. John Alexander ; 21. Samuel Greeley ;
22. Jethro Wheeler ; 23. Jonathan Thayer ; 24. Joshua Wells ; 25. Submit Foster ; 26. Nathan Willard, jun. ; Joseph Hubbard ; 28. Joseph Ashley ; 29. Nathaniel Mattoon ; 30. John Hunt ; 31. John Taylor ; 32. John Pierce ; 34. Andrew Gardner, jun. ; 35. Jas. Jewel ; 36. Manasseh Divol ; 37. Simon Hunt ; 38. Wm. Wilson ; 39. John Arms, jun. ; 40. Solomon Willard ; 41. Ebenezer Field ;
42. Samuel Allen ; 43. Billy Willard ;
44. Caleb How ; 45. Jonathan Hubbard ; 46. Jas. Hills ; 47. Josiah Willard, jun. ; 48. Benjamin Farwell ;
49. Samuel Cummings ; 50. Josiah Brown ; 51. Peter Powers ; 52. Robt. Fletcher, jun. ; 53. Timothy Leatherby ;

54. Minister; 55. Henry Sherborn; 56. Sam'l Smith; 57. John Downing; 58. Samson Sheaff; 59. Jonathan Willard.

In addition to these 59 shares there were 14 shares set off at the northern part of the township, two to His Excellency Benning Wentworth, and one each to John Wentworth, Robt. Usher, Jno. Chamberlain, Jonathan Cummings, John Usher, Jonathan Cummings, jun., David Stearns, Byfield Lloyd, Richard Wibird, and Theodore Atkinson. One share for a glebe for the Church of England, and another for the benefit of the Incorporated Society for the Propagation of the Gospel.

At a meeting held May 6, 1761, certain valuable lands—50 acres on the Mill Brook and some 60 acres at the lower end of the Governor's meadow—were voted to Col. Willard for encouragement to build a saw-mill and grist-mill. The conditions upon which he was to receive these lands is thus expressed in the original records under Massachusetts:

"Provided he shall Build a Good Saw Mill and Grist Mill in s^d Town and saw and grind at the usual Price of Sawing at the Neighboring Mill, and Grind Likewise at the same Toll Taken at the Neighbouring Mills. The Saw Mill to be built by the first Day of October next, and the Grist Mill in two years if the Town shall Desire the same, and keep the said Mills in Repair ten years or longer, or Deliver up s^d stream for the use of the s^d Proprietors after y^e ten years, if he Refuse to Continue to Keep s^d Mills in Repair. And it is to be understood that if the stream that is in s^d land be not sufficient for Constant Water for a Mill, then the said Town is to Provide a Stream for s^d Mill to be built upon, and Land for the conveniency of building s^d Grist Mill on, or the said Willard to be Exempted from building s^d Grist Mill."

Liberty was also given for a town way through each lot if needed, also for a proprietor's road through the Governor's Meadow, so called, and also through the Lower Meadow. A tax of 10s. was laid on each right to defray the expense of surveying and laying out the township, also one of 8d. on each right to pay Col. Josiah Willard for services in getting the charter renewed; also one of 20s. on each right to be worked out on the roads at 2s. 6d. per day until the first of September, and 2s. per day from that time till the last of December, "a Team of four Cattle to be equal to a man's Day's work."

William Willard, Michael Gilson, Bildad Andros, Atherton Chaffee, and John Pettey were chosen a committee to lay out roads and make the same.

The town records for the next 20 years, except certain records of deeds, have not been preserved.

It appears, however, from other sources, that Westminster enjoyed a good degree of prosperity, attracting settlers from the older provinces, and that before the close of 1766, there were upwards of 50 families in the place, and according to the census ordered by the Governor of New York in 1771, it was the most populous town in this part of the province, the whole number of residents being 478.

THE BOUNDARY CONTROVERSY.

In the year 1763, there arose a controversy between the Governors of New Hampshire and New York, each claiming the lands lying on the west side of the Connecticut River. Neither of the parties being disposed to yield, the subject was referred to the decision of the King, who, by an order dated 20 July, 1764, declared "the western banks of the river Connecticut, from where it enters the province of Massachusetts Bay, as far north as the 45th degree of northern latitude, to be the boundary line between the said two provinces of New Hampshire and New York."

In accordance with this decision Westminster came under the jurisdiction of New York. On the 26th Mar. 1772, a new charter was issued by the Governor of New York to certain grantees who conveyed to Col. Josiah Willard, then of Winchester, N. H., and he executed releases to such of the former proprietors, or their assigns, as chose to take titles under the new authority.

Under this charter the government reserved for its own use the two rights appropriated to the Governor of New Hampshire, together with all mines of gold, and all pine trees fit for masts, 20 inches in diameter at one foot from the earth. Also a revenue of 2s. 6d. for every 100 acres granted, to be paid on "Lady Day, or the Day of the Feast of the Annunciation of the Blessed Virgin Mary."

The grantees, or their assigns, were required to settle on the tract of land granted them within 3 years from the time of the grant to the number of one family for every thousand acres granted, and plant and cultivate within 3 years 3 acres for every 50 acres granted, if capable of cultivation.

We approach now that stormy period in the history of the American colonies which immediately preceded the Revolution. In the exciting scenes of that period the settlers of the New Hampshire grants have a conspicuous part.

In 1772 the courts of Cumberland county, in the province of New York (which county embraced nearly the same territory as the present counties of Windham and Windsor), were removed from Chester to Westminster. Here was soon to be witnessed the first grand uprising of the people of what is now known as the Green Mountain State, in resistance to the authority of the government of Great Britain; and here was to flow the first blood, at least in the State of Vermont, in the cause of American Independence.

THE REVOLUTIONARY PROCEEDINGS which we are about to relate were but the exponent of those feelings occasioned by the course of the mother country towards the colonies, whose rule had become too oppressive to be any longer endured.

In the early part of 1774, Isaac Low, chairman of a committee of correspondence in the city of New York, to ascertain the feelings of the people of the colony with regard to the usurpations of Great Britain, wrote to the supervisors of Cumberland county in May to ascertain what measures the people would be likely to adopt in the present crisis. At their meeting in June the supervisors took no action upon this letter, and for some reason the knowledge of it was kept from the people. The secret, however, became known to Dr. Reuben Jones, of Rockingham, and Capt. Azariah Wright, of Westminster, who communicated it to the inhabitants of their respective towns.

Meetings were then called in these towns and a committee chosen to wait upon the supervisors at their meeting in September, and ascertain if such a letter had been received by them, and why it had not been laid before the people of the county. "They made many excuses," says Dr. Jones. "Some plead ignorance, and some one thing and some another, but the most of them did seem to think that they could send a return to the committee at New York without ever laying them before their constituents, which principle at this day so much prevails, that it is the undoing of the people."

The committees, however, would not give their consent to have any return made until Mr. Louis' letter had been laid before every town in the county.

Accordingly a convention was called to meet at the "County Hall," at Westminster, on the 19th of Oct., which held a session of two days. Here it was resolved "That as true and loyal subjects of the King, they would spend their lives and fortunes in his service; and that they would defend the King while he reigned over them, as his subjects, so they would defend their just rights, as British subjects, against every foreign power that should attempt to deprive them of those rights, while breath was in their nostrils and blood in their veins."

On the 5th of Sept. a Continental Congress was convened at Philadelphia to adopt measures against the usurpation of royal authority in the colonies. This was followed by a second convention at Westminster, on the 30th of November, which adopted all the resolves of the Continental Congress and the delegates bound themselves, as representatives of their constituents, "religiously to adhere to the non-importation, non-consumption, and non-exportation association."

On the 7th of Feb., 1775, a third convention was held at Westminster, whose main object was to obtain, if possible, from the legislature of New York, the passage of such laws as would tend to improve the mode of administering justice in the county courts. Their special cause of grievance was the "great expense and heavy burdens" imposed upon them by reason of the additional courts that had been established, in consequence of which lawsuits had increased and charges had been multiplied and families nearly beggared.

The "acts and resolves" of the Continental Congress which had been adopted by the people of Cumberland county in open convention, had however been rejected by the General Assembly of New York. And while in the other colonies the meeting of the Continental Congress had been followed by an almost universal suspension of royal authority, the higher civil officers in the colony of New York remained loyal to the King, and the courts still continued to be held, but being administered in the interests of the crown they were so oppressive as to be almost insufferable on the part of those who had espoused the liberal cause. And those who expressed their dissatisfaction were denounced as "guilty of high treason," for withholding their allegiance from the King.

The people were no longer willing to trust themselves in the hands of those whom they regarded as enemies of American liberty. And "in duty to God, to themselves, and to their posterity, they thought themselves under the strongest obligations to resist and to oppose all authority that would not accede to the resolves of the Continental Congress."

Such was the state of feeling which led to that memorable event in the history of this town, known as

"THE WESTMINSTER MASSACRE," which occurred on the 13th of Mar. 1775. The scene of this event was the "Old Court House," which stood at the extreme north end of the Lower Street, on the east side of the road on the spot now known as "Court House

NEW TOWN HALL.

Hill," but a short distance from the meeting-house which then occupied the middle of the highway. This building was erected in 1772, at which time the courts of Cumberland county were removed from this place to Chester.

The following description we append from Hall's Eastern Vermont, where an engraving of the "Old Court House" can be seen:

"In shape it was almost square, the sides being about forty feet in length, and was built of hewn timber, clap-boarded. The roof was gambrel, surmounted by a cupola or tower, open at the four sides. An aisle, ten or twelve feet in width, ran east and west, through the middle of the lower story.

A double door was placed at each end of the aisle, or in other words, two doors opening either way from a center fastening. In accordance with a custom of the times, the building was intended to afford some of the conveniences of a tavern. In the southeast corner was a kitchen, or cook-room, occupied by the jailer, and in the southwest corner a bar-room, in which the jailer served in the capacity of bartender. The chimney rose between these rooms, and opened into each in shape of a large, old-fashioned fire place. Another door was cut in the south side of the building leading into an entry, on either side of which were doors to the kitchen and bar-room.

In the north part was a jail, which comprised within its limits two prison-rooms, divided, the one from the other by a narrow aisle running north and south. This aisle communicated with the broad aisle, by a door. Doors also opened from the prison rooms into the narrow aisle. A flight of stairs led from the last entrance to the court-room in the second story, which did not differ materially from the court-rooms of the present day in its arrangement."

The courts were held there until 1781, when Westminster and Marlborough became half shire towns, until 1787, when New Fane became the county town and a new court-house and jail were erected there. The old court-house in Westminster stood till about the year 1806.

The 14th of March, 1775, was the day on which the county court was to commence at Westminster. To avoid all rashness and unnecessary collision with the Court party, it was thought best to request the judges to remain at home. For this purpose "about forty good, true men," went from Rockingham to Chester to dissuade Col. Chandler, the chief judge, from attending court. He "thought it would be for the good of the country not to hold any court, as things were; but there was one case of murder that they must see to, and if it was not agreeable to the people they would not hear any other case." Some one said that "the sheriff would raise a number of men, and there would be blood shed." The judge assured them upon his word and honor that there would be no arms brought against them.

Noah Sabin, one of the associate judges, "was very earnest to have the law go on, as well as many petty officers. Col. Wells, the other associate judge, was absent, in attendance upon the General Assembly at New York.

There was much debate among the Whigs as to what means they would adopt to prevent the sitting of the Court. It was at length agreed to let the Court come together and then present their reasons for not wishing it to proceed. But upon learning that the Court was to take possession of the house on the 13th inst., and place a strong guard at the doors, they thought best to effect an entrance "before the armed guards were placed," that they might lay before the Court their grievances before it opened.

On Monday, March 13, a party of Whigs from Rockingham came down to Westminster and halted at the house of Capt. Azariah Wright, and repaired from thence to the school-house on the opposite side of the street, and held consultation as to the best manner to prevent the sitting of the Court.

Having armed themselves with sticks from Capt. Wright's wood-pile, they proceeded on their way, and were joined by others armed like themselves, and on arriving at the court-house, the whole party, to the number of about one hundred, entered about 4 o'clock in the afternoon.

Soon after this, the High Sheriff, Wm. Paterson, who had on the day previous gone to Brattleborough to obtain assistance in preserving the peace, came up with a large number of men, some of them "armed with guns, swords and pistols, and others with sticks or clubs."

Approaching within about 5 yards of the door, the Sheriff commanded the "rioters," as they were called, to disperse, but obtained no answer. He then ordered the "King's proclamation" to be read, and told them, with an oath, if they did not disperse within fifteen minutes, he would "blow a lane through them." The Whigs replied, they would not disperse, but the Sheriff and his company might come in if they would lay aside their arms, but not without.

One of the party within advanced to the door and asked the Tories if they had "come for war," saying "we are come for peace, and would be glad to hold a parley with you." Whereupon Samuel Gale, Clerk of the Court, drew a pistol, and replied with an oath, he would hold no parley with them but by this—referring to his pistol.

The Tories then withdrew a short distance after some pretty harsh language, and held a consultation, and the Whigs sent out three men to treat with them, but with no avail.

About 7 o'clock Col. Chandler came in and they laid the case before him, reminding him of his promise that no arms should be brought against them. He said the arms were brought without his consent, but he would go and take them away, and they should enjoy the house undisturbed until morning, and that the Court should then come in without arms, and would hear what they had to lay before them. Having given them this assurance, he departed. The Whigs then left the house and chose a committee to draw up a list of articles to present to the Court, which was unanimously adopted by the company. Some of them then went home, and some to the neighbors, having left a guard at the court-house to give the alarm in case of an attack during the night.

Meanwhile the sheriff had sent word to all the Tories in the neighborhood to come to his assistance. They met for consultation at Norton's tavern,* whence they proceeded in small parties to the court-house a little before midnight. Their approach was discovered by the sentry, who gave order to "man the doors."

The sheriff marched his company within about 10 rods of the court-house, and advancing towards the door, demanded entrance in His Majesty's name. Seeing his demand was not regarded he told them he should enter quietly if he could, or by force if he must. Being

* This tavern, which was at that time the Royal Inn of the village, is supposed to have been built as early as the year 1770; it is a large two-story house, with gambrel roof, stands on the west side of the street, about a mile north of Court-house hill, and is now occupied as a dwelling-house. John Norton, for many years its owner, was of Irish Scotch descent, a man of wealth and influence, and was generally regarded as a Tory. The family name in Ireland was McNaughton. When John removed to Westminster he omitted the prefix, and changed the spelling of the name to Norton.

Three shots were fired which passed over the heads of those within. The order was then repeated and several men were wounded; one, Wm. French, was shot with five bullets, one of which passed through his brain, of which wound he died the next day.

"Then," we quote the words of an eye-witness, "they rushed in with their guns, swords, and clubs, and did most cruelly maim several more, and took some that were not wounded, and those that were, and crowded them all into close prison together, and then told them they should be in hell before the next night, and that they did wish that there were forty more in the same case with that dying man. When they put him into prison, they took and dragged him as one would a dog, and would mock him as he lay gasping, and make sport for themselves at his dying motions."

In this bloody affray, two of the sheriff's party received slight flesh wounds, and of the Whig party some escaped, ten were wounded, two of them mortally, and seven were taken prisoners.

Tuesday morning, the 14th, all was confusion. At the appointed hour the court convened and prepared a statement of the facts, "exactly as they happened," in the "very melancholy and unhappy affair," that had occurred during the night. It was thought best not to proceed with business, and an adjournment was made to the second Tuesday in June. That session has never been held.

Meanwhile messengers had been dispatched in all directions and the tidings quickly spread. By noon of the next day more than 400 hundred persons had assembled at Westminster, about half of whom were from New Hampshire; Capt. Benjamin Bellows came with his company from Walpole, and Capt. Sargent with his from Rockingham, another with an organized band from Guilford, and the Westminster militia were in full force under Capt. Azariah Wright.

The prisoners who had been confined the night previous were soon set at liberty, and before night the judges with their assistants, the sheriff and such of his party as were engaged in the massacre as could be taken, were put under arrest.

It was with difficulty that the enraged populace were restrained from doing acts of violence. Some demanded that the judges should be brought forth and make satisfactory acknowledgments; and some threatened to burn the court-house and shoot every man engaged in the massacre of the previous night. Through the influence of Capt. Bellows they were dissuaded from carrying their threats into execution.

The morning of the 15th witnessed a renewal of the scenes of the preceding day. An inquest was held on the body of young French, and the sheriff and those of his party imprisoned with him were placed in close confinement.

During the day reinforcements came from the southern part of the county and from the Massachusetts province, and from the west side of the Green Mountains, so that upon the morning of the 16th it was computed that there were "five hundred good martial soldiers, well equipped for war," assembled in Westminster, besides others who had come as private citizens.

A public meeting was held, and a large committee chosen, to consist of persons out of the county as well as in, who, "after the most critical and impartial examination of evidence," decided that the leaders in the massacre should be "confined in Northampton jail till they could have a fair trial," and those who appeared less guilty should be "under bonds, holden to answer at the next court of Oyer and Terminer" to be held in the county.

Those of the court party who were imprisoned were: Thomas Chandler, the chief judge, Bildad Easton, a deputy sheriff, Capt. Benjamin Burt, Thomas Sergeant, Oliver Wells, Joseph Willard, and John Morse, who were released on the 17th on giving bonds with security to John Hazeltine. Thomas Ellis, against whom no charge was found, was released unconditionally. Noah Sabin, associate judge, Benj. Butterfield, an assistant justice, Wm. Willard, a justice of the peace, Wm. Paterson, the high sheriff, Samuel Gale, the clerk, Benj. Gorton, a deputy sheriff, Richard Hill, William Williams, and one Cunningham, were on the 19th sent down the river under a guard of fifty men and two officers, and confined in jail at Northampton. Here they remained some two weeks, until they were removed on a writ of habeas corpus to New York, for a regular trial in order to their enlargement. We do not learn as they ever had their trial. The Revolutionary War had now become a fact, and other interests were absorbed in that.

WILLIAM FRENCH,

one of the victims of this massacre, was a son of Nathaniel French, who lived in Brattleborough, near the southern line of Dummerston. He was a young man of patriotic spirit, and an ardent sympathiser with the liberty party. He was one of those stationed in the courthouse on that eventful night of the 13th of March, 1775, animated by that liberty loving spirit, whose smouldering fires were now ready to burst forth in a general uprising throughout the colonies. He fell pierced with five bullets in as many different places, one of which entered the brain just behind the ear, and caused his death.

Dr. Wm. Hill, of Westminster, was allowed to visit him between three and four the next morning, but his martyr spirit had fled.

The verdict of the coroner's jury to investigate the causes of his death is in the following words:

NEW YORK,
CUMBERLAND COUNTY. }

"An Inquisition Indented and Taken at Westminster the fifteenth Day of March One Thousand Seven Hundred and Seventy five before me Tim^o. Olcott Gent one of the Coroners of the County aforesaid upon the View of the Body of William French then and there Lying Dead upon the oaths of Tho^s. French came to his death Do Say upon their oaths that on the thirteenth day of March Instant William Paterson Esqr Mark Langdon Cristopher Orsgood Benjamin Gorton Samuel Night and others unknown to them assisting with force and arns made an assault on the Body of the said W^m French and Shot him Through the Head with a Bullet of which wound he Died and Not Otherways in witness where of the Coroner as well as the Juryors have to this Inquisition put their hands and seals att the place afore Said."

Mr. French was buried the same day with military honors in the old graveyard at Westminster, and a stone with the following quaint inscription, marks the spot where he was laid :

"IN Memory of WILLIAM FRENCH.
Son to Mr, Nathaniel French. Who Was Shot at Westminster March ye 13th, 1775, by the hands of Cruel Ministerial tools.
Of Georg ye 3d, in the Corthouse at a 11 a Clock
at Night in the 22d year of his Age.

HERE WILLIAM FRENCH his Body lies.
For Murder his Blood for Vengeance cries
King Georg the third his Tory crew tha with a Bawl his head Shot threw.
For Liberty and his Countrys Good.
he Lost his Life his Dearest blood."

Young French has been claimed by historians as the first martyr whose blood was shed in the cause of the American Revolution. This claim, however, has been disputed, but upon how good authority we are not able to say. An attempt was made in 1852, by some of the most distinguished and patriotic citizens of Vermont to obtain from the Legislature an appropriation for the purpose of erecting a monument to his memory. The bill was, however defeated by a small majority. When Vermont, in 1877, met at Westminster to celebrate the One Hundredth Anniversary of the declaration of her independence as a State, measures were taken for the erection of a monument in honor of her first blood shed in the cause of American liberty, upon that sacred spot where that first blood was shed and where her independence was declared.

DANIEL HOUGHTON, who was mortally wounded at the time French was killed, was a resident of Dummerston; he received a wound in his body and lived but 9 days. His name is not usually found in connection with that of French, probably for the reason that it was expected for some days that he would recover. In the records of Dummerston, however, their names are coupled together as martyrs in a common cause. Hall says that at a meeting held at that place on the 6th of April following, a committee was appointed to "go to Westminster there to meet other committees, to consult on the best methods for dealing with the inhuman and unprovoked murderers of William French and Daniel Houghton."

Houghton died at Westminster at the house then occupied by Eleazer Harlow, which stood northwest of the court-house, and but a short distance from it. He was buried in the old grave-yard not far from the resting-place of William French. A rough stone once marked the place where he lay, which has since disappeared, and no one can tell the precise locality of his grave.

Jonathan Knight, of Dummerston, received a buck-shot in his right shoulder, which he is said to have carried there for more than thirty years.

A man by the name of

WHITE, FROM ROCKINGHAM, was severely wounded in the knee, and after being cared for three months at the house of Azariah Wright, where most of the wounded were taken, he was conveyed on a litter down the river to some place where he could receive proper medical attention.

PHILIP SAFFORD,

of Rockingham, likewise received several cuts upon the head with a sabre in the hands of Sheriff Paterson, dealing in turn some pretty effective blows to the sheriff's posse, knocking down several of them with his club, by means of which he forced his way through and made his escape.

Of the sheriff's party, Justice Butterfield received a shot through his coat sleeve, slightly grazing the skin, and another received a slight wound from a pistol ball in the head. These were probably wounds received from their own party as the Whig party assert that there were no weapons carried by them but stones and clubs.

At a convention held here Jan. 15, 1777, Vermont was declared a free and independent State, and Westminster was for a time practically the capital of the State. The General Assembly held its session here in 1780. Here, too, was the first printing office established in Vermont, by the firm of Spooner & Green, in the year 1778. The press and types were removed to Woodstock in 1783.

The State Bank was established here in 1807, and removed to Woodstock in 1811.

And we should not omit to mention here a mode of punishment in vogue in those days, by means of and cat-o'-nine tails, applied by some person duly authorized. No farther back than the year 1800, there were two of these whipping-posts upon Westminster street; one at the soldier's barracks at the lower end of the street, and the other stood near by the church. The one was used for the punishment of deserted soldiers, and the other for the punishment of culprits.

The last person whipped, we are told by one who was an eye-witness, was a negro woman who had been stealing. This instrument of terror to evil doers remained standing until about the year 1804, when it was pulled down by the boys. This relic of a barbarous age has given place to better laws.

EARLY SETTLERS AND DESCENDANTS.

RICHARD ELLIS.

The first person who actually settled in Westminster appears to have been Richard Ellis, who, with his son Reuben, came from Easton, Mass., in 1739, fenced in and broke up several acres of land, and built a house at the foot of Willard's hill, at the south end of the Main street, where Harlan Farr now lives.

He bought in September of that year three original Rights, drawn to Eliphallet Leonard, for which he paid 60 pounds. He afterwards bought two Rights of Jonathan Paddelford, and two of Joseph Tisdale, for all of which he paid £48, "old tender."

Reuben, his son, bought in 1740, of Israel Tisdale, the 60th Right, being the 50th house lot, and 47th interval lot. Farther than this we have no knowledge of either of them. Their names do not again appear in the history of the town. Nor do we find any record of deeds to give any clue to whom they conveyed their lands.

JONATHAN THAYER, of Easton, came here in 1740, and made some preparations for settling, and it was recommended by a committee of the proprietors that he receive a gratuity for his services, which, however, was not granted. He bought in July of that year, of Joseph Tisdale, the 49th house lot and 39th interval lot. His house lot lay just north of one owned by Richard Ellis, which was the 48th, and the one on which Mr. Ellis built.

In a deed from widow Rush Tisdale in Sept., 1741, and in two others, from James Leonard 2d and Job Tisdale, in 1742, his name appears as a resident of "No. One."

We do not find his name among the proprietors under the N. H. charter, 9 Nov., 1752, but it appears in the list at the time of the renewal of the charter, 11th June, 1760.

AARON (?) ALEXANDER.

came from Northfield, Mass., to Westminster, at a very early period, and began to clear and make preparations to settle, but was driven off by the Indians, and was subsequently killed by them. He had a son Aaron, who settled in Putney, whose daughter Rhoda married Eleazer Harlow, who settled here in 1758.

JOHN AVERILL,

came up from Northfield with his family in canoes in the spring of 1751, and occupied the house at the lower end of the street afterwards known as the Averill place, where Mr. French now lives. He had at that time three sons, Asa, John and Oliver, and in the autumn of that same year was born to him a daughter, Anna, who was the first child born in Westminster. By whom this house was built we do not know. Hall says that this and the one built by Richard Ellis, then unoccupied, were the only ones in the place at that time; and the one into which Mr. Averill moved had been occupied by four men, one woman and two children, viz., William Gould and his son John, Amos Carpenter and Atherton Chaffee, and that Gould and Carpenter removed their families from Northfield here in the summer of 1751.

Mr. Averill was a proprietor of Westminster under N. H. in 1752, and on the French jury in 1755, and Captain of Militia in 1776.

In the spring of 1755, on account of the French and Indian war, he removed his family to the fort on the Great Meadows at Putney, and returned again after the war.

The Averill family have been prominent in the history of the town, and many of the descendants are still living here, but the name is gone.

The ancestors were a godly family, and such to a great extent have been their posterity.

Mrs. Ephraim Smith, a great-granddaughter of John Averill, now living here at the age of 77, well remembers going to see her great-grand-father and great-grand-mother when she was a little child.

ASA AVERILL

settled on the street, and always lived on what is now known as the Whittle place. He married Anna Chaffee (probably a daughter of Atherton Chaffee), by whom he had 6 children: Obed, Asa, David, Molly, Experience and Anna. He married (2) the widow of Major Peter Lovejoy, who had 6 children by her first husband, and two by Mr. Averill, viz., Mercy and Sally, and what was regarded as somewhat remarkable, they all lived together in the greatest peace and harmony.

ASA AVERILL, jr., was a young man of much promise, a good scholar, and good mechanic. He became somewhat noted in these parts as being the first man who framed a building by the use of the "square rule." The barn which formerly stood on his father's place is now owned by Mr. Hills.

OBED, the eldest son of Asa Averill, built and settled on the "Tower place," now owned by John Leach; and two of his children, Mrs. Ephraim Smith and Mrs. James Tower, are now living in the parish.

ASA and DAVID died young.

MOLLY married Jonathan Atwater Phippen, who settled here in 1781, and has grand-children and great-grand children now living here.

EXPERIENCE married Abraham Nutting, and has several descendants now living in the place.

There is a curious circumstance related of the marriage of Mr. Averill to his second wife. It was an opinion prevalent in those days that whoever married a widow who was administratrix upon the estate of her deceased husband, and who through her came into possession of anything purchased by the first husband, became liable for any demands against the first husband's estate. This difficulty was avoided in the following manner:

A blanket was stretched across a recess next the chimney, behind which went the bride with her attendants; who divested her of all her clothing, and threw her clothes into the room. She then reached her hand through a small opening in the blanket, which was clasped by Mr. Averill, and the marriage ceremony was performed. He then produced a complete assortment of wedding attire which was appropriated by Mrs. Averill, who soon appeared in full dress, to receive the congratulations of her friends.

John Averill, Jr., was a wheelwright and carpenter. He built the first framed house in Westminster, which stood on the east side of the street, opposite his father's. He took the home place and lived there till he died. He had five children: John, Daniel, Jotham, Hannah and Olive.

Jotham and Hannah were never married.

John "was an upright and honorable man." He married Anna Averill, daughter of Asa, and afterwards Rhoda Wales, and removed to Swanton, Franklin county, and became a quaker.

Daniel married for his second wife a daughter of Eleazer Harlow, one of the early settlers. He was a very good man, and considered as one of the "pillars of the church."

Olive married a Heald and removed to the northern part of the State.

3. Oliver Averill, third son of John, removed to Northfield, this State, where his descendants now live.

4. Anna Averill married Amos (?) Carpenter, and lived in Westminster for a time.

ATHERTON CHAFFEE.

The Chaffee family for many years had a residence in the parish, but are now gone. Atherton died here in 1776, aged 63. We find at a later date the names of Atherton, Clifford, Otis, and Constant, whom we suppose to be his sons.

ATHERTON CHAFFEE, JR.,

settled on the old road to the West Parish, to the north of Shubael Peck's. An old barn still marks the spot. He had a son, Atherton, who went to Canada and died, and who has a daughter now living in Walpole, N. H.

Clifford Chaffee married a daughter of Capt. Jesse Burke, one of the early settlers, and had a grandson Clifford, who received his early education in Westminster, became a physician, practised a time in the State of New York, afterwards removed to Springfield, Mass., and has since been a member of Congress.

AMOS CARPENTER

was here when John Averill came, had his residence here till 1776, when he sold to James Richardson and removed to Rockingham. His farm, according to the plan of the town, was Nos. 8 and 9, in the first range of 80 acre lots, and is now owned in part by Clark Whitney.

WILLIAM GOOLD

and his son John were also here in 1751. There were probably other sons. We find Seth, John and Nathaniel, proprietors here in 1772, at the time of the grant from New York. And at the time of the formation of a Baptist society in the west part of the town in 1784, there were three Goolds, William, Seth and Nathaniel, members of that society.

We have no further information of any of these except John, who has numerous descendants in Westminster, Windham, Chester, Coventry and other towns of this State, as well as in New Hampshire and Ohio.

He was a large land owner in the town; we find deeds conveying to him 5 house-lots and 4 meadow-lots, and No. 1, in the first range of 100-acre lots.

Most of his house-lots were situated near where the meeting-house and parsonage now stands. In revolutionary times he kept the Whig tavern, in the house where Mr. Whitman now lives, which then stood upon the opposite side of the street. He was a soldier in the Revolution, and very proud of telling stories.

There is a story of an incident that is said to have happened in those days which, perhaps, is worth telling here. A traveller who had stopped at his tavern over night, found in the morning as he was about to start, that he had been relieved of a part of his load. In the absence of any detective police it was agreed to adopt the following shrewd plan: A rooster was placed under a large brass kettle, and each one present was to pass round and touch his nose to the kettle, and when the guilty one touched the kettle the rooster would crow. When they had all passed around and an examination was made of the noses, it was found that all but one had a black nose, and he was adjudged guilty of the theft.

JOHN GOOLD

had 4 sons and 2 daughters who also had families.

John Gould, Jr., the eldest, was a printer, in the employ of Spooner & Green, and afterwards carried on the business here himself. His office was the old building, a part of which now adorns the new part of the present parsonage. He afterwards removed to Windham, and thence to Chester, where he died. He was the father of 9 children.

Aaron, the next son, settled in the West Parish, and had 6 children, two of whom, Reuben C. and Mrs. Zenas Lord, now reside in the East Parish.

Jonathan, another son, kept the Goold tavern for a while, and then went to Ohio.

Luther also went to Ohio. Of the daughters, Abigail married Dea. Nathaniel Kittredge, of the East Parish, and Sarah married a Chandler, who lived here for a time and then went to Townshend.

ELEAZER HARLOW

came from Taunton, Mass., at the age of 20, in the year 1758, and settled where Charles Willard now lives. He built, at first, a plank house, in 1782, the one now standing. He married Rhoda Alexander, of Northfield, Mass., by whom he had 3 sons and 6 daughters.

LEVI, the eldest son, married Elizabeth Ranney, a daughter of Deacon Ephraim, and went west as far as the top of the hill, between the two parishes.

His son, Eleazer, lived there, and a great grandson of the first Eleazer now owns the place.

JOSIAH, the second son, died in the army, and his children went to Ohio.

ELEAZER, the other son, died unmarried.

Of the daughters, Rhoda married Ephraim Ranney, son of Deac. Ephraim, and settled in the West Parish.

Abigail married Waitstill Ranney, a son of Deac. Ephraim, and went to Chester.

Hannah married Alfred Spooner, who lived here awhile, then removed to Woodstock, and from there he went to New Orleans and died.

Lavina married Calvin Britton, both of whom died here.

Anna, the youngest, married Giles Marvin, by whom she had three children, and (2) Zacheus Cole, with whom she now lives in the happy enjoyment of a serene old age. She is now 85 years old, and vigorous in body and mind. She has had 6 children by her second marriage, all of whom are married and living at the present time. Her residence, with the exception of 16 months, has always been her native place.

CAPT. MICHAEL GILSON.

He was born in Old Hatfield, Mass., in 1731, he came to Putney during the French and Indian war, and enlisted in the fort on the Great Meadows. His mother and two sisters were with him there in 1755. He was exposed to all the dangers of savage warfare, and came near losing his life. After peace was declared, he came to Westminster and began a settlement by putting up a log-house on the meadow at the south part of the town, about 100 rods east of where he afterwards built.

His earliest deed bears date of March, 1759.

He married a sister of Dea. Sessions, took his bride to the log-house, where they ate their bridal dinner of stewed beans, served upon chips for plates, with wooden spoons whittled out for the occasion.

After a few years he left the log-house and built upon the old stage road, where he kept a tavern for 20 years.

He was commissioned 1st Lieut. of the Westminster Militia in 1788, and Captain of the same Co. the following year. He was Justice of the Court of Oyer and Terminer in 1782.

He was shrewd at business, had no education, except what he acquired by attending school one week, but could read and write enough to do common business. He died at the age of 92.

Capt. Gibson had no children.

MAJ. JOEL PAGE

was his adopted child, and the second owner of the farm from the settlement of the town, until he died 15 July, 1870, at the age of 79.

LIEUT. ZACHARIAH GILSON,

a brother of Capt. Michael, settled a few years later, a little farther to the south, on the farm owned by the late Richard Ward. He was once taken captive by the Indians and carried to Canada, but returned here and died. He had several sons, Zachariah, Michael and Benjamin, but has no descendants now living in town. Zachariah, jr., had a son, Freedom, who now resides in Rockingham.

WILLIAM WILLARD, ESQ.

He lived at the foot of the Willard hill, where Richard Ellis settled in 1739. Precisely when Mr. Willard came to Westminster is not known. He was a proprietor in 1752, and a soldier at Fort Dummer as late as 1756, and probably came here soon after and lived here till he died.

He was the fifth generation from Major Simon Willard, who came to this country in 1634, and is supposed to be the ancestor of all the Willards in this country.

Rev. Joseph Willard, father of William, was slain by the Indians at Rutland, Mass., 1723, on the day he was to have been installed as pastor of the church. Joseph, a posthumous son, was born about three months after the father's death. This Joseph, we suppose to be the one whose family were taken by the Indians at Charleston, No. 4, in 1760, and carried to Canada. The widow of Rev. Joseph Willard married Rev. Andrew Gardner, who was settled in Lunenburg, Mass., and afterwards at Winchester, N. H.

COL. JOSIAH WILLARD, of Winchester, whose name is familiar in the early history of Winchester, was a son of Henry, who was the fourth son of Major Simon. His sons, Col. Josiah, jr., Nathan, Oliver and Wilder, were proprietors of Westminster under N. H., but not resident here.

Prudence, a daughter of Col. Josiah, married William, son of Rev. Joseph, who was slain at Rutland.

William and Prudence, his wife, are both buried in the old grave-yard at Westminster. William died in 1804, at the age of 83, and Prudence died in 1794, at the age of 67.

William Willard appears to have been a prominent man in his day; he was justice of the peace in 1766, 7 and 8, and again in 1772. Assistant justice of the Court of Common Pleas, 1768 and 1772.

William had, by his wife Prudence, three sons, Joseph, Billy and Lyndes. Billy settled on the home place and Joseph where Henry Wells now lives, and Lyndes a short distance to the south. Billy was prominent among those engaged in the massacre when French was killed, and boasted of having knocked him down. Joseph was imprisoned with the Tory party, but released on bail. Joseph and Lyndes have descendants now living in Westminster. Joseph had a son Joseph, whose sons went from here to Washington and became the proprietors of "Willard's Hotel."

JOHN NORTON

came from Farmington, Ct., about the year 1760, and kept the "Norton Tavern." He married Anna Holton, sister of Joel Holton, by whom he had ten children, one of whom is still living in the parish. Another daughter, who married a grandson of William Willard, Esq., died during the present year but a short distance from the spot where she was born, at the age of 88.

Another married a Campbell, who settled in the West Parish.

Another became the wife of Nathaniel Fullerton, Esq., of Chester, President of Bellows Falls Bank.

Mr. Norton was a prominent man in the town, held various positions in the town offices, and in 1776 was delegate with Dr. Elkanah Day to the Council of Safety for Cumberland Co. He was also a member of the Legislature in 1782.

SAMUEL CONE

came from Haddam, Ct., about this period, and settled where George Wetherell, who married a grand-daughter of Mr. Cone's, now lives. He built a log-house in 1770, the one now standing. He had 11 children, 9 of whom lived to be married.

Joshua settled in the northern part of the town, lived there for a time and afterwards sold to Jonathan Lane.

Samuel was a merchant and had his store on the upper street.

John married a sister of Rev. Sylvester Sage and removed to the State of New York.

Ezra T., lived on the home place.

came here in 1761, at the same time with his brother Azariah and Joel Holton, who were all from Northfield.* Aaron Pettey came at the same time and camped with them, and so did Judge Burt, on the spot where Medad built. Whether the two last mentioned were from the same place we do not know. John Norton, we are told, camped with them. His daughter thinks he came here at the age of 21, which would make him here in 1760. Mr. Wright became acquainted with the locality in carrying supplies up the river during the French and Indian war. He and his brother, Mr. Holton and Mr. Norton all located near each other upon the Upper street. Mr. Holton's house-lot was No. 10, Azariah Wright's No. 11, Medad's No. 12, and John Norton's No. 13. Aaron Pettey's was No. 17 and Eleazer Harlow's No. 18.

Medad Wright was constable of Westminster in 1766. His sympathies appear to have been with the New York party. He was one of the 30 who were arrested by the authority of the State of Vermont, in 1779, and lodged in jail at Westminster for non-compliance with the conditions of the new Militia law. Among those from Westminster who were also imprisoned were: Dr. Elkanah Day, Michael Gilson, Benjamin Whitney, John Norton, Dea. John Sessions, Billy Willard and his brother Joseph, and Bildad Easton. They were each tried and fined from £10 to £40 each, according to the magnitude of the offence.

Medad Wright had 9 sons, seven of whom lived to be married. He married for his first wife, Irene, a sister of Joel Holton, and for his second, widow Mary Willard.

Asaph, the oldest of the 9 sons of Medad Wright, was a physician and lived in the West Parish.

Rufus lived at the lower end of the Upper street, on land now owned by Harlan Farr, and died there of cancer.

Elihu lived where Joseph Wright now does, and one of the daughters married Joseph Wright, a grand-son of Capt. Azariah. Another daughter of Elihu married another grandson of Capt. Azariah, and settled in the West Parish. A third married Addison Dunham, and lives in the East Parish.

Obed, son of Medad, lived some time on the road towards Ephraim Smith's, and then went West.

Hollis settled on the home place, where his son, Daniel C., now lives. The old house, erected as early as 1770, was standing on the spot where it was built, until last year, when it was removed to the other side of the street to give place to a new one. This is the only instance in the parish in which the home place has descended from father to son, from the early history of the town until the present time. Another remarkable circumstance, of the three generations of children born in the old house, only one has been a daughter, and that the last child born.

* The deed from Josiah Willard to Azariah Wright, of House-lot No. 11, bears date of April, 1761. In that deed he is represented as a resident of Westminster.

CAPT. AZARIAH WRIGHT

settled close by Medad, where Mr. De Wolf now lives. He married a Safford, and had 6 children, all of whom settled in town.

1. Azariah, Jr., the eldest, lived in the next house west of Roe Morse. He had 9 children, most of whom went to Illinois.

2. Solomon lived in the house just west of his brother Azariah. He lived to be over 90 years of age, and voted 71 years. He was fond of history, was a great reader, and had a good memory. He died with his son, Capt. Azariah, at Coventry. He also had 9 children.

3. Caleb settled in the West Parish. He had 7 children. His son Caleb, who died at Newton last year (1869), was a man of considerable note as a writer and lecturer.

4. Joseph settled beyond where his son Joseph now lives, and had a son and three daughters.

Capt. Azariah Wright was a man of great energy and perseverance, and bold even to recklessness. Previous to his coming to Vermont he served as a soldier in the French and Indian war. He was captain of the Westminster Militia company as early as 1770, and a leading spirit in those times. He has been called an Ethan Allen on a smaller scale. The members of his company, as given by Hall, are as follows: Lieut. Jabez Perry, 1st Sergeant, Simeon Burk, 2d Sergeant, Jesse Burk. Privates—Jacob Albee, John Albee, Samuel Ames, Asa Averill, John Averill, Thomas Averill, Jabez Bates, Silas Burk, Atherton Chaffee, Andrew Crook, Robert Crook, William Crook, David Daley, Jonathan Fuller, Seth Goold, William Goold, Francis Holden, John Holt, Ichabod Ide, Israel Ide, Jos.

Ide, Robt. Miller, John Pettey, Atwater Phippen, Joseph Phippen, Robert Rand, James Richardson, Nathaniel Robinson, Reuben Robinson, Edmund Shipman, Jehiel Webb, and John Wells.

Capt. Wright led his company at the time of the Westminster massacre, and had them under strict discipline. He went with 12 men on an expedition to Quebec during the winter of 1776, no further record of which has been preserved.

An incident in connection with a case of church discipline serves to show the character of the man. Uncle 'Riah, as they used to call him, had occasion to shoot a bear which he found trespassing in his corn-field on the Sabbath, for which deed he was to be excommunicated from the church. At the close of the service, Mr. Bullen, the pastor, was about to read the letter of excommunication, when Uncle 'Riah presented his gun. Mr. Bullen then passed the letter to Dea. Sessions, who began to read, when Uncle 'Riah levelled his piece upon the deacon. The deacon then returned the letter to the parson with the remark that "all things were lawful but not expedient." After some consultation, the letter was laid aside, and the benediction pronounced, and the congregation left the house, followed by Uncle 'Riah, who locked the door and gave a lad a ninepence to take the key to the sexton. Capt. Wright died here in 1811, at the age of 74.

JOEL HOLTON

came at the same time with the Wrights and settled close by them. He married Bethia Farwell, by whom he had 12 children.

His son, Joel, lived in Westminster, where Allen Wells now lives, and had several children, among whom were David Parsons Holton, M. D., New York City, and Miriam, who married Henry S. Brown, M. D.

Zoeth, another son, lived on the home place, and Bethia, who married John White, father of Rev. Pliny H. White, late of Coventry, is still living in Westminster, at the age of 87.

AARON PETTEY

built just back of Eleazer Harlow, the house-lot which he owned being too low for a building spot on the street. He died in Rockingham in 1788, at the age of 45, and was buried here. One of his daughters, Asenath, married John Lovejoy, who settled upon the place afterwards owned by Jonathan Lane. Margaret, another daughter, married a Burton, of Walpole, and Aaron, jr., died in early life, while engaged in the study of medicine.

BENJAMIN BURT

was also here at this time, and lived in the north part of Westminster, just beyond Saxton's River bridge, where Charles Chase now lives. Some of the older inhabitants say they used to go there to grist-mill when they were young.

Judge Burt appears to have been quite a prominent man in his time. He was sought by his fellow citizens to fill many positions of trust in his town and State. He was elected member of the Council of his State in 1779, and was a member of the Assembly in 1781, '86, '96, '97 and '98. From 1786 to 1802 he held the position of assistant justice, and from 1781 to 1785, was assistant judge of the Windham County Court.

THE DICKINSON FAMILY

have been associated with the history of the town for more than a hundred years. Theirs, it is said, was the third permanent settlement in the town. Dan and Azariah were two of the nine that constituted the church at the time it was organized in 1767. They came from Haddam, Ct., and their father's name was Azariah. They settled in the south part of the town; Dan where Dea. Abiel Goodell afterwards lived, on the hill road to Putney, and Azariah on the middle road, on what is now a part of the Ward farm, nearly opposite of where Zachariah Gilson settled.

They both have descendants now living in town. Azariah had two sons, Cyrus and Job. Cyrus had two sons, Harvey and Alvin. Job had two sons, Job and Ephraim, and five daughters, one of whom married Heman Goodridge, and another became the wife of Jazaniah Hunt, and settled in Westminster.

JOHN MORSE

came from Sutton, Mass., about the year 1768, and settled where the present meeting-house now stands. He was a carpenter and farmer, and also a great trapper and hunter. He afterwards removed to the place where his grand-son, John Dorr Morse, lived, and has numerous descendants in the place. He was the fourth generation from Anthony Morse, who came to this country in 1637. He was a connection of Prof. Morse, inventor of the telegraph, who was also the fourth generation from Anthony.

DEA. EPHRAIM RANNEY

came from Middletown, Ct., about the time of the French and Indian war, and settled on the Upper street, several lots north of Joel Holton. His deed of house-lot No. 7, where he lived, which he bought of Jonathan Thayer, bears date of March, 1761. We are told he kept tavern there. He married Silence Wilcox, by whom he had 11 children, and he lived to see them all married.

He was a man of sterling Christian character, and leaves behind a godly posterity. He is the ancestor of as many as five ministers of the gospel and numerous deacons. Eight of his children settled in their native town; two sons and a daughter in the West Parish who, with their descendants, have been among the substantial citizens of the place. Of those who became preachers of the gospel, are two grand-children, Seth Shaler Arnold, now living, nearly 80 years of age, and Joel Ranney Arnold, his brother; three great-grandsons, Josiah Goodhue, Joseph Ranney, Timothy E. Ranney, and a great-great-grandson, Henry A. Goodhue.

Ephraim Ranney was one of the two first deacons of the church in the East Parish, and his son, Elijah, was one of the first deacons of the church in the West Parish, and he was succeeded by his son, Elijah, jr.. Ephraim, jr., Dea. Ephraim's oldest son, had a daughter who married a deacon, and one of their sons fills the office at the present time.

Three sons of Dea. Ephraim settled near their father: Joel, where Ambrose Arnold's house now stands; Benjamin, where John Leach now lives; and Janna on the home place. Esther, a daughter, married Seth Arnold, who lived on the place near by, now owned by Mr. Foster.

DEA. JOHN SESSIONS

was here at the time the church was organized, 11 June, 1767, and was one of its first deacons. He settled near Michael Gilson, where Mr. Floyd now lives, on No. 5 and 6, in the first range of 50 acre lots.

The deacon was sharp and shrewd; quick at a retort, and generally had the "best end" of a joke. On one occasion, in company with several others, when the toddy was being passed around (it was the custom in those days for ministers and deacons to drink), some one espied a fly in the toddy, and playfully passed it to the deacon to see what he would do. He very gravely took out the fly, and held it while he took his drink, then put back the fly and passed it to the next.

His daughter Anna married David Foster, of Putney, who was elected deacon of the church in Westminster in the spring, and died the following July.

One of his sons died a dissipated man, and one of his grandsons became a minister, and a grand-daughter became the wife of the late Rev. Dr. Thurston, of Fall River.

Aside from the office of deacon, Mr. Sessions held the office of chief judge of Windham County court, from 1781 to 1784, and for many years was one of the prominent and influential men of the town.

He represented the town in the General Assembly in 1787. He was also commissioned a deputy in the New York Provincial Congress, and Convention of the State of New York, in 1776; also a Commissioner to administer oaths of office, in 1777 and 1778, and judge of the Inferior Court of Common Pleas in Aug., 1778.

NEHEMIAH MCNIEL

was probably here as early as 1767. We find record of a deed of this date, conveying to him lot No. 7 in the second range of 50 acre lots, where T. W. Wiley now lives. He was born in Scotland and died here in 1770. He had a son, Nehemiah, who lived on the home place, and a son John. Nehemiah was constable here in 1800.

John was brought up by Dea. Sessions, with whom he went to live at 8 years of age. He settled in Andover in this State, and had 7 children, one of whom settled in Westminster, on his grandfather's place, and is one of the present deacons of the church.

JAMES RICHARDSON

came from Connecticut as early as 1769 and settled on Rocky hill, where Clark Whitney now lives. He had 7 or 8 children. John, the oldest, married Betsey Goodridge, and lived where Samuel Spaulding now does, and has descendants now living in the place.

Another son, Derastus, married a daughter of Jonathan Lane, and has descendants in Westminster.

THE BURKS.

Jonathan, and his three sons, Jesse, Simeon and Silas, came from Brimfield as early as 1771. A deed from "Jonathan Burk, of Westminster," conveying to his "beloved son Jesse," house-lot No. 22 and meadow-lot No. 39, bears the above date. Charles Rice, who died Mar. 1, 1830, aged 72, was a son of the widow Rice, who married Capt. Jesse Burk. A grandson of Mr. Rice says his grandfather came to Westminster with Capt. Burk when but 3 years of age, which would give an earlier date by 10 years. Jonathan lived here for a time and then went to Windsor, where he died.

Capt. Jesse lived where Ira Smith now does. He married a widow Rice, by whom he had 5 sons and one daughter. He was sheriff of the county in 1775. His son, Elijah, lived on the home place, and one of his sons became an editor in Newport, N. H., and has since been a member of Congress from New Hampshire.

Simeon married Patty Strong, and had 3 sons and 4 daughters. He lived on the Albee place, where Mr. Wilcox now does.

Maj. Silas Burk settled where Joseph Clark now lives. He was one of the jury of inquest when French was killed. He married Mary Eastman by whom he had 9 children, one of whom is now living at the old homestead at the age of 90 and says she is "just in her prime." (See appendix.)

was born in Dublin, Ireland, about the year 1725, and educated to the profession of the law. He came to this country about 1762, and for some time held the office of Secretary of the Province of New York. He removed from New York City to Westminster in the latter part of the year 1771, and lived in a house that stood a little to the north of the meeting-house, which was the only one in town that faced the four cardinal points of compass. It was originally built for Rev. Mr. Goodell, the first minister. Mr. Brush was ambitious of power and fond of display, and was received with great courtesy by the people of Westminster until his true character came to be known. "But as vulgarity of mind became apparent and novelty of appearance ceased to attract attention, Mr. Brush found, in spite of his boasted attainments as a man of large information, and his pretensions to gentility, that his only friends were a few high-toned and arrogant loyalists."

He held various offices under the government of New York. In Feb., 1772, he was appointed by Governor Tyron as clerk of Cumberland County, and was made surrogate of the county in April of the same year, and was also appointed commissioner to administer oaths of civil office. He was a representative to the General Assembly of

* For an extended sketch of Crean Brush, see Hall's Eastern Vermont, 603-633.

New York in 1773-4-5. He had large influence in the house, and spared no pains to turn it to his own advantage. Mr. Brush owned large tracts of land in Westminster and other portions of the New Hampshire grants, which after the uprising in the colonies in 1775, were confiscated to the State of Vermont and sold, and the proceeds went into the public treasury.

During the summer of this year he was probably in New York, and in the fall went to Boston, then occupied by the British, and offered his services to Gen. Gage.

The General, having determined to winter his army in Boston, found it necessary to vacate some of the residences of the inhabitants, and this business was entrusted to Crean Brush, who was commissioned to receive and protect such property as should be entrusted to his care. Having seized many goods that were not contraband, which were stowed away in vessels in the harbor, he endeavored to set sail to Halifax, but was taken when a few days out, by Commodore Manly, and Brush and others were made prisoners. He was examined and committed to the jail in Boston, on charge of having plundered the city, and carried away under protection of the British fleet, large quantities of goods, wares and merchandise, the rightful property of the citizens of Boston. He was handcuffed, and denied the use of pen, ink, paper and candles, and forbidden to converse with any person unless in the presence of the jailer.

During his imprisonment Mrs. Brush was allowed to visit him, and on Wednesday, the 5th of November, 1778, he made his escape in her clothes; and not until the next morning was it discovered that the noted prisoner was gone, and his wife occupied his place in the cell. Mrs. Brush had left a horse tied at a certain spot, and furnished her husband with the means of escape.

He immediately set out for New York, which place he reached on the 16th of the same month, after an imprisonment of more than nineteen months.

He then directed his efforts for the recovery of his property, and to obtain redress for the injuries he had received, and compensation for the losses he had sustained on behalf of the King. Not being successful in this, and stung with a feeling of remorse, on a cold morning in the following spring, he determined to put an end to a miserable life, and with a pistol in his hand, he blew out his brains.

Mr. Brush owned, as it is supposed, about 25,000 acres of land in the State of New York, and nearly the same amount on the New Hampshire grants, only a small part of which ever came into the hands of his heirs.

Mr. Brush's widow afterwards became the wife of Patrick Wall, who was an Irishman by birth, and at the time of the revolution, was a tailor in Boston. After a residence of some time in the city of New York they removed to Westminster, to the house formerly occupied by Crean Brush. After her death Mr. Wall married Elizabeth Erwin, of Westminster, on the 7th of Jan., 1812.

Mrs. Wall, previous to her marriage with Mr. Brush, had by a former husband a daughter Frances, who married a Capt. Buchanan, and was a widow at the time she came with her mother to Westminster, with Mr. Wall. Mrs. Buchanan is spoken of as a "dashing woman," with an "imperious bearing," which attracted the attention of the quiet people of Westminster. She is said to have been a "fascinating woman, endowed with an ease of manner which she had acquired from intercourse with polite society, and possessed of a refined taste and many accomplishments."

During one of his frequent visits to Westminster, Gen. Ethan Allen, who was at that time a widower, formed an acquaintance with Mrs. Buchanan, which afterwards "ripened into a warm, but singularly intermittent friendship."

John Norton, keeper of the tavern, playfully remarked to her one day, with reference to the prospective alliance, "Fanny, if you marry General Allen, you will be the queen of the new State." "Yes," she replied, "if I should marry the devil, I should be the queen of hell."

The aversion, however, with which she at times held the character of the man "whom all feared and few loved," appears to have given place to the admiration of his nobler traits, and she consented to become his wife. The novel wedding, which is admirably described by Mr. Hall, took place at the residence of Gen. Stephen R. Bradley, of Westminster.

"Thus did the step-daughter of Crean Brush become the wife of the man for whose apprehension Governor Tyron, at the instigation of Brush, had on the 9th of March, 1774, offered a reward of £100."

After the death of General Allen, in 1789, his widow married Dr. Jabez Penniman, of Burlington.

Crean Brush had by his first wife, who died before he came to this country, a daughter, Elizabeth Martha, whom he left in the care of his relatives in Ireland. She married Thomas Norman, of Ireland, by whom she had 4 children. By the will of her father she became heir to a third part of his estate, and having purchased of the other heirs their thirds, she became heir to the whole property. She, with her husband, came to America about the year 1795, to recover the property to which she had become entitled, and had their residence in Westminster until 1814, when they removed to Caldwell, at the south end of Lake George.

Mrs. Norman is said to have been a "lady of fine manners, dignified deportment, and was, in every respect, an ornament to her sex."

WILLIAM PATERSON

is said to have been of Irish-Scotch descent, and supposed to have been born in Ireland. He came to Westminster soon after his friend Crean Brush in 1772 or 1773, and received the appointment of the shrievalty of Cumberland county. He was active as high sheriff in the Westminster massacre, and was one of those imprisoned in the court-house at this place, and was afterwards removed with others to Northampton jail, where he remained until the 22d of November following. Farther than this we have no knowledge of his life; his history is shrouded in obscurity.

THE PHIPPENS.

Jonathan Atwater, Samuel and Joseph, were here about this time, and were all members of the militia company, under Capt. Azariah Wright, in 1775.

Samuel was here in 1772, as appears from a deed from him to Ephraim Ranney of two lots in the first division of meadow.

Samuel, jun., had house-lot No. 29, in 1772, and was a qualified voter in 1781.

Samuel and Joseph were members of the Baptist society at the time of its organization in 1784.

Jonathan Atwater appears to have been the only one who made a permanent settlement here, or at least who has left descendants here. He married Mary Averill, daughter of Asa, by whom he had 7 children. He settled upon "Phippen Hill," not far from James Richardson.

His son, David, took the home place. He married Hannah Sargent, whose mother was a Washburn, and whose connections of that name have been distinguished in Massachusetts and Vermont.

JOSHUA STODDARD

was here in 1772, and lived where Porter Rice now does. He married Sarah Humphrey, by whom he had 10 children, most of whom settled elsewhere.

Daniel, son of Joshua Stoddard, went to Sutton, Vt., and then to Ohio. He had 20 children all living at one time.

John settled here. He lived and died where Mr. Farwell now lives.

Amasa lived awhile on the home place.

Ezra married a daughter of Dea. Abiel Goodell, and went to Billymead, now Sutton. He was killed by the falling of a tree, and his son Ezra was killed in the same manner, 10 years after, on the same month, and about the same time of the month. Ezra had 7 children, one of whom is judge of probate, and another is deacon of the church in Westminster.

BILDAD EASTON,

noted for his Tory proclivities and the active part he took at the time of the Revolutionary proceedings in Westminster, came here about this period.

His first child was born in Alstead, N. H., in 1772, and the next in Westminster, in 1774, at which place 5 were born to him afterwards.

THE ROBINSONS

were also here at this period, and were prominent and influential citizens at that time. They came from Attleboro, Mass.

Nathaniel was a deacon of the Baptist church, and the meetings were sometimes held at his house. He held various offices in the town, as justice of the peace, selectman, and town clerk, and at one time received a vote of thanks from the town for his valuable services. He was a member of the State Legislature from 1778 to 1780. He settled on the "Eaton place," midway between the two parishes, and was buried in an old graveyard near his house. He died in 1815, in his 92d year.

His sons were Reuben, Nathan, Ezekiel, Noah and Titus. He also had several daughters.

Reuben was a soldier in the Revolution. He married Abigail Burk, in 1779, and settled in the West Parish, where Reuben Miller now lives.

Nathan settled on the Tully Clark place, and afterwards removed to Stowe, Vt.

Ezekiel also went to Stowe, and he and Nathan were members of the Legislature.

Noah* also went to Stowe, and one of his sons was a physician.

Titus, a carpenter by trade, went to New Orleans and died there.

* Noah Robinson was born in Westminster, March, 1802; in early life settled in Stowe with two or more brothers. About the same time others of the Robinson family moved to Northfield. They were among the most substantial citizens. At Stowe, Noah farmed and held almost every town office. About 1864, he removed to Waterbury Centre. Here also he held many were also here at this time.

Benjamin died in 1776, aged 58, and is buried here. Also Abijah, who died the same year, aged 36. The following lines we take from his gravestone:

"Life is uncertain, death is suer; sin the wound, and Christ the cuer,"

He was a delegate from Westminster to the convention held here 7th Feb., 1775.

PETER LOVEJOY

died here 1793, at the age of 38, and may have been a son of Benjamin or Abijah. We suppose him to have been the Major Peter Lovejoy, whose widow married Asa Averill.

He had three sons: John, Samuel and Joseph, and some daughters.

John was the first who settled in the Lane district, which was then a wilderness. He was a cooper and farmer. He married Asenath, a daughter of Aaron Petty. This district, which in 1800 was thickly settled and contained many of the more prominent families in town, and had some 70 to 80 scholars to send to school, now has but one land owner within its limits, not a child for the district school, and probably never will have again.

Samuel, a carpenter and joiner by trade, built on the street and lived where D. A. Hills now does. He was postmaster for some time and superintendent of the Sunday-school.

Joseph died while young.

Hannah married a Hunt, of Putney, and Betsey married a Wyman, of the West Parish.

town offices; was a successful town agent for years. He married, first, Calista Russell, and second, a sister of Col. Fred E. Smith, of Montpelier. He left two sons and a daughter. The painful circumstances of his death, the newspapers of the time chronicled. He died in 1883; was buried in Stowe.—"Argus and Patriot."

NATHAN FISK, ESQ.,

was a prominent man in the place; he appears to have been here in 1777, from the death of three children buried here during that year. He was jail-keeper in 1779, at the time Judge Chandler was buried. He was justice of the peace for several years, and died in 1788, aged 65.

DR. ELKANAH DAY.

Dr. Day was a resident of Westminster in 1775, and was a prominent and influential man. His residence was the place formerly occupied by Crean Brush. Not only in town but throughout the country he was known and respected as a physician. He was a member of a committee of the County Congress which convened at Westminster previous to the session of 6 June, 1775, and was a delegate from Westminster to the committee of safety held at the same place in June, 1776, and was chosen clerk. In 1780, we find "Maj. Elkanah Day," one of a committee to take into consideration the feasibility of a new government formed by a union of the eastern portion of Vermont and the western portion of New Hampshire.

He was one of the "Yorkers," arrested for non-compliance with the terms of the new militia law in 1779, and was fined £40. He subsequently appears, however, as an earnest supporter of the new government. He was chosen with John Sessions to represent the town in the New York Assembly, in 1779, and was senator in 1781.

He received the appointment of Major of the southern regiment of the State 1778, and in 1782 was adjutant under Gen. Ethan Allen, in maintaining the civil authority of the State. He was high sheriff of Windham county from 1782 to 1787.

STEPHEN ROW BRADLEY

was a descendant of William Bradley,* who came to this country with several brothers in 1637, and a son of Moses and Mary Row Bradley, of Cheshire (then Wallingford), Ct. He was born 20 Feb., 1754. He graduated at Yale with the degree of A. B., in 1775, and received from his alma mater the degree of A. M., 1778.

While in college he prepared an almanac for 1775, of which an edition of 2000 copies were published Nov., 1774. In January after his graduation he entered the army as captain of the Cheshire Volunteers. In December of the same year, with the rank of adjutant, he received the appointment of vendue master and quarter-master.

He afterwards received the appointment of aide-de-camp to Gen. David Wooster. In 1778, he was employed as commissary, and during the summer of 1779 served as major, at New Haven. He studied law with Tapping Reeve, the founder of the Litchfield law school.

His first appearance in the State of Vermont is at the adjourned session of the Superior Court at Westminster, 26 May, 1779, and in 1780, he represents the town of Westminster in the General Assembly.

At the session of the court above named, he was commissioned attorney at law, and received license to plead at the bar within the State. He soon took a high position, and his learning and talents were the admiration of all. He at once became prominent as a political leader, and had a large influence in laying the foundations of the new State. He was appointed to present to Congress, at its session in Feb., 1780, the views and feelings of Vermont with reference to the claims of Massachusetts Bay, New Hampshire and New York.

The result of his efforts is contained in a pamphlet, entitled, "Vermont's Appeal to the candid and impartial world, containing a fair stating of the claims of Massachusetts Bay, New Hampshire and New York."

This was read before the Council of Vermont, at Arlington, 10 Dec., 1779, and approved and ordered to be published. It is a masterly presentation of the claims of Vermont to independence, and among the various pamphlets written at this period upon this controversy with New York, "Vermont's Appeal" stands pre-eminent.*

In Aug., 1781, Mr. Bradley was commissioned lieutenant of the 1st Regiment of Vermont militia, and in October following was promoted to the office of colonel. This office he resigned in March, 1787, and in Jan., 1791, he received the appointment of brigadier-general of the eighth brigade of the Vermont militia.

The following are among the various offices which he held: He was State's attorney for Cumberland county from 1781-1785; select man in Westminster in 1782; held the office of town clerk from 1787-1788; from Dec., 1781 to March, 1791, register of probate for Windham county. On the 21 Feb., 1783, he was appointed a judge of the court of the county, and from Oct., 1788, to Oct., 1789, side-judge of the Supreme court of Vermont. He represented Westminster in the General Assembly of the State, in 1780, 1781,

* He was unable, however, to obtain a personal hearing for Vermont, in Congress, at that time, and presenting a remonstrance, returned to Vermont.—Hall's "Eastern Vermont."

1784, 1785, 1788, 1790 and 1800, and in 1785 was elected speaker of the house. He was a member of the State Constitutional convention in 1791, and elected to the Council in 1798, and in 1789, he was appointed Commissioner to establish the boundary line between New York and Vermont.

On the 12 May, 1793, he was admitted to practice in the Circuit court of the United States. He received the honorary titles of M. A. and LL. D. from Dartmouth and Middlebury colleges, and was appointed a fellow of the latter in 1800, which position he held till the time of his death. On the 17 Oct., 1791, Mr. Bradley, with Moses Robinson, were elected as the first senators from Vermont to the Congress of the United States; Mr. Bradley for the term of four years and Mr. Robinson for six.*

He was again elected for a term of 6 years from 4 Mar., 1801, and during the greater part of the next two years he was president, pro tempore, of the Senate.† At the expiration of this term, he again entered upon another term of 6 years from Mar. 4, 1807, and in 1808 was again president, pro tempore of the Senate.‡ On retiring from public life Mr. Bradley resumed his residence at Westminster, where he remained until the year 1818, when he removed to Walpole, N. H., where he died 9 Dec., 1830.

* Mr. Robinson took his seat in the United States Senate, Oct. 31, and Mr. Bradley, Nov. 7, 1791. On drawing lots to determine to which of the classes, for 2 years, for 4 years, or 6 years, the two new senators from Vermont should belong, Bradley drew a term for 4 years and Robinson for six.—C. K. WILLIAMS.

† In the absence of Aaron Burr, vice-president.

‡ In the place of George Clinton, vice-president, an old adversary in the New York controversy, who had been wont to denounce him as a Rioter.

In politics Mr. Bradley was a Republican of the school of Jefferson. He is spoken of by Mr. Graham, in his "Descriptive Sketch" of Vermont, as "a lawyer of distinguished abilities and a good orator." "Few men," he says, "have more companionable talents, a greater share of social cheerfulness, a more inexhaustible flow of wit, or a larger flow of unaffected urbanity." The Hon. S. G. Goodrich, known to all as "Peter Parley," who married a daughter of Mr. Bradley, says of him, "He was distinguished for political sagacity, a ready wit, boundless stores of anecdote, a large acquaintance with mankind, and an extensive range of historical knowledge."

We cannot better conclude this sketch than by giving an extract from his distinguished pamphlet, entitled "Vermont's Appeal:"

"The State of Vermont, we have now clearly shown, has a natural right to independence; honor, justice and humanity forbid us tamely to surrender that freedom which our innocent posterity have a right to demand and receive from their ancestors. Full well may they hereafter rise up in judgment against us, if, like profane Esau, we mortgage away their birth-rights, and leave them at the expence of their lives to obtain freedom."

Appealing to the inhabitants of the United States of America, he says:

"We have now existed as a free and independent State almost four years; have fought Britains, Canadians, Hessians, Waldeckers, Dutchmen, Indians, Tories, and all, and have waded in blood to maintain and support our independence. We beg leave to appeal to your own memories, with what resolution we have fought by your sides, and what wounds we have received fighting in the grand American cause; and let your own recollection tell what Vermont has done and suffered in the cause of civil liberty and the rights of mankind, and must we now tamely give up all worth fighting for? No, sirs; while we wear the names of Americans we never will surrender those glorious privileges for which so many have fought, bled and died; we appeal to your own feelings, as men of like sufferings, whether you would submit your freedom and independence to the arbitrament of any court or referees under heaven? If you would, after wasting so much blood and treasure, you are unworthy the name of Americans; if you would not, condemn not others in what you allow yourselves."*

WILLIAM C. BRADLEY, son of Stephen Row and Merab Atwater Bradley, was born at Westminster, 23 Mar., 1782.

He was a precocious child; he began to write poetry at six years of age; published his first prose work at twelve; the title page runs thus:

"THE RIGHTS OF YOUTH,

Composed, revised, and submitted to The candid Reader;

BY

WILLIAM C. BRADLEY, ESQ.,

Author of the Poem on Allen's and Tiehnot's Duel.

Westminster:

Printed by John Gould, jun.
M.DCC.XCIV."

At nine he had read the Bible through seven times; was fitted for college at eleven, and entered Yale at thirteen. He was expelled from college during the early part of his course, on account of some mischief which he always said he never perpetrated, although he frankly confessed he "had done undetected mischief enough to deserve censure."

* [Since the above was in print, we have received from Mr. Fairbanks the additional items for the Stephen R. Bradley biography: "He was in Bennington early in 1788; his rank of Adjutant, Vendue-Master and Quarter-Master was conferred 17 December, 1776. He was States Attorney for Cumberland County, from 16 June, 1780-1785."]

Nothing daunted at the disappointment he had met, and the cold treatment which he received at his father's hand, he resolved to become the learned man which the college had refused to make him. He entered upon the study of law at Amherst, Mass., with Judge Simeon Strong; and after the appointment of Mr. Strong to the office of Judge of the Supreme court, he returned to his father's office, where, by his distinguished talent and zealous application, he acquired a large renown. At the age of 17, he was appointed to deliver a Fourth of July oration at Westminster, which was followed by an ode which he had composed. The success of this effort contained some premonition of the future greatness of the man.

He was admitted to the bar at the age of 20, and having been refused permission to practice in the Supreme court on account of his youth, so great was the respect he had won for his talents, that he was appointed by the Legislature attorney for Windham county, which secured him access to the Supreme court. This office he held for 7 years.

At 24, he represented his native town in the State Legislature (1806 and 1807); at 30, was a member of the Council, and at 32 was a representative to Congress.

After the expiration of the term for which he was elected, at the close of the war of 1812, he was appointed agent of the United States, under the treaty of Ghent, for fixing the North-eastern Boundary. This work lasted 5 years, and was regarded by him as the great service of his life. He was afterwards elected to Congress for two terms (1823-27), which services substantially closed his public career. He was, however, a member of the State legislature in 1850, and presidential elector in 1856, casting the vote of his State for John C. Fremont, and was a member of the State Constitutional Convention the following year.

Mr. Bradley, during most of his career, was a Democrat in politics. He entered upon his political career during that brilliant era of Webster, Clay and Calhoun, the like of which we have not seen since, and probably never shall again. In the bright constellation of that political firmament, he shone a conspicuous star. He was a man of large talent and great learning. He possessed a wonderful memory, accompanied with rare conversational powers. His capacious mind seemed an inexhaustible reservoir of learning, wit and wisdom, which poured forth in a full torrent from his powerful, yet melodious voice, that would hold the delighted hearers entranced for hours.

The Rev. Pliny H. White says of him: "It is not too much to say, all things considered, that he was the greatest man Vermont has yet produced. Williams may have equalled him as a lawyer, Collamer as a reasoner, Phelps as an orator, and Marsh may be his peer in multifarious learning, but neither of them, nor any other Vermonter, living or dead, who has come to my knowledge, has been at once lawyer, logician, orator and scholar to so eminent a degree. He inherited all his father's strength of mind, and added to it the most liberal culture which books and the best society could offer."

Speaking of the Bradley family, Mr. White says: "Talent and scholarship have descended in a remarkable manner from generation to generation; and not only this, but have continually approached nearer and nearer to positive genius.

William C. had extraordinary talents; but his son, Jonathau Bradley, had more than talent,—even that indispensable something termed genius."*

Mr. Bradley was as much at home in theology as in law,—in fact, theological literature was his favorite study.

He was versed in Hopkins and Edwards, as well as familiar with the German writers of the liberal school. "Theology," he said, "is the noblest profession, law is second to it." He had an extensive acquaintance with the Sacred Scriptures, which he was in the habit of studying in the original languages. He often wrote out exegeses of difficult passages, giving his own views as to their interpretation. He also wrote out his religious views, which are preserved among his manuscripts, in a neat and legible hand.

Few men are as happy in their domestic life as was Mr. Bradley. His grand-daughter, in speaking of this phase of his life, says:

"When a mere school boy he plighted his troth for the first and last time; and that love grew with his growth, and strength, till at eighty-four years of age, the tenderness and devotion of this happy couple was like the blossom of the olive, rare and beautiful. The object of this life-long love, was Sarah Richards, daughter of Hon. Mark Richards, of Westminster, and she was wholly worthy of his love, in person and in character. She was petite and graceful, with a beautiful blue eye, dark hair, a gentle voice and a quick, light step. She was one of the old school of gentlewomen; had met Washington in her father's house at Boston, and mingled with the refined and courteous of that age. Her love and admiration for her husband was deep and sincere, and she was unconscious of the great influence which she exerted over him. He never failed to consult her on all important changes, and always paid great deference to her opinions."

Mr. Webster said of him, that he had one of the greatest minds in the country.

As a specimen of Mr. Bradley's oratorical composition, we give the closing passage of his eulogy upon Mr. Webster :

"There may be those, who, looking to former opposition, may think that, notwithstanding our friendly relations in private, I have already said too much. To such I answer, that, old as I am, when my heart becomes too contracted to swell at the manifestations of talent, worth and greatness, may it cease to beat! Were I, being in a state of safety, to look upon the lion roaming in his native haunts, and to behold his firm and regal tread, the majesty of his countenance, his large, calm eye filled with the expression of conscious power, how could I withhold my admiration? If he was afterwards seen by me breaking out of bounds, and scattering desolation and misery abroad, should I be inconsistent in declaring my abhorrence? But when the shaft of the Mighty Hunter had laid him low, dead, prostrate before me, and I looked upon his great and noble proportions, and the symmetry of his make, I must feel that he was indeed created monarch of the forest. So has it never been permitted me to cease admiring and bearing witness to the great things of Daniel Webster, and if it can soothe his mighty spirit to have a political adversary twine the cypress round his tomb, I freely offer myself to bear his memory a tribute which I trust will be also in unison with the feelings of the whole House."

A BALLAD OF JUDGMENT AND MERCY.

(WRITTEN BY MR. BRADLEY IN ADVANCED LIFE.)

"As at midnight I was reading by my lamp's fitful gleam,

I fell into a slumber, and behold I dreamed a dream;

This outer world had undergone a great and sudden change,
And everything around me seemed wondrous new and strange.

No sunlight, no moonlight, no starlight glittered there:

A mild and steady twilight seemed to permeate the air;

And there sat the blessed Jesus. No golden throne had he,

But was clad in simple majesty, as erst in Galilee.

Behind him Justice, Mercy, Truth, safe guides in earthly things;

Their functions now absorbed in him, all stood with folded wings;

And the recording angel, with deeply sorrowing look,

Took in his hands and opened the all-containing Book.

There came a distant murmur, as of waves upon the shore,

While throngs on throngs unnumbered into the Presence pour;

By their instincts segregated here, nigh the close of Time,

Rush the bad of every nation, of every age and clime.

They stop astonished, all abashed; and with attentive ear,

Though the angel's lips were moving, no accents could I hear;

Yet of that startled multitude, to each like lightning came,

His life's continued story, its mingled guilt and shame.

From all the records there disclosed, oh! who could lift the veil;

Or of the varied shades of wrong unfold the dreadful tale

Of kingly pride, plebeian spite, of violated trust,

Of mastering force, of hidden sin, hate, cruelty and lust!

Each has due allotment, and with agony of heart,

The vast assemblage vanished at the thrilling word, "Depart!"

There was no driving angel, and no extraneous force;

For conscience was accuser, and the punisher remorse.

When this I saw transacted, upon my face I fell!

The anguish of that moment, no human tongue can tell.

With throat convulsed, and choking, I gasped, and strove to cry,

"Have mercy, Lord! Oh, mercy have! a sinner lost am I."

To look upon that face again, how was it I should dare?

And yet I wildly ventured, with the courage of despair;

When that pitying eye fell on me, beaming mercy from above,

And I saw that smile ineffable of never-dying love.

By so sudden a transition, all stupefied I gazed,

When in my members trembling, rose bewildered and amazed;

But kindest words of comfort the blessed Master spoke,

Which wrapped my soul in ecstasy; and sobbing I awoke."

Mr. Bradley has written much poetry that has never been published. His office is the repository of a large collection of manuscripts and documents, left not only by himself, but by his father, General Bradley, and by his father-in-law, the Hon. Mark Richards.

From these abundant materials an extensive biography of the Bradleys is in contemplation, and will constitute a valuable contribution to the history of Vermont, as well as to American literature.

MARK RICHARDS

was a resident of Westminster for nearly 50 years, and occupied a prominent and influential position in the town and in the State. He was born in Waterbury, Conn., 15 July, 1760. His mother was sister to the Rev. Dr. Hopkins, the distinguished theologian and divine. He enlisted in the Continental army at the age of 16, and was among those whose courage and sufferings in the northern campaigns have given enduring fame to Stony Point, Monmouth, Red Bank and Valley Forge. At the close of the war, he settled in Boston, and engaged in mechanical and mercantile pursuits. Having accumulated a moderate property, he removed to Westminster, in 1796, and engaged in the mercantile business with Eleazer May.

So correct was his manner of doing business, and so popular was he with his fellow-citizens, that he was soon sought by them to fill offices of trust and confidence. In 1801, he was elected by a large majority to represent them in the Legislature, which secured for him ever after a position of influence in the State. He was re-elected to this office in the years 1802, '04, '05.

In 1806, he was a member of the Council of Censors, and was appointed sheriff of Windham county the same year, which office he held until 1810. He was a member of the State Council in 1813 and 1815; was once presidential elector, and in 1817 he became a member of Congress, which position he held until 1820. He again represented his town in the Legislature in 1824, '26, and '28, and in 1829 and 30, he was associated with his old friend and colleague in Congress, Gov. Crafts, as lieutenant-governor of Vermont. He was in the Legislature again in 1832 and '34.

In person and character, he is thus described by his son-in-law, Hon. Wm. C. Bradley :

"Mr. Richards was lean and tall in his figure, of pleasant, but somewhat formal manners, and in spite of a lameness with which he had been afflicted for the last thirty years of his life, was a remarkably active man.

"The traits of his character were distinctly marked. His liberality, though great for his means, was discriminating and well timed; his industry and perseverance whenever the occasion seemed to demand it, were untiring; his love of order was so precise, and descended to such minuteness of detail, that it appeared almost incompatible with much expansion of thought, or ready dispatch of affairs, and yet few men can be named who united more knowledge of human nature, more sagacity and promptness in business, than he uniformly displayed."

He married the widow Dorr; their daughter Sarah was the wife of Hon. Wm. C. Bradley. Mr. Richards died in Westminster 10 Aug., 1844, aged 84.

SETH ARNOLD

came to Westminster about the year 1782. He was a son of Seth and Abigail (Shaler) Arnold, and born in Haddam, Ct., 3 Sept., 1747. His parents both died when he was about three months old, leaving him and an older brother, Ambrose, as the only offspring.

Seth was 3 years in the Revolutionary war; was engaged in the battle of White Plains, N. Y.; was twice taken prisoner; was 9 months in a crowded prison ship in New York harbor, and when it was burned came near losing his life.

He had accumulated a thousand dollars before the war, which he lost owing to the depreciation of currency, having only enough left to carry him through a period of sickness. In this condition, he came to Westminster, with only an old pistareen in his pocket, worth about a shilling at that time. He worked for John Norton six months during that summer, at five dollars a month.

In the course of a year or two, he entered upon the business for which he was prepared, as shoe-maker, tanner and farmer. On the 8 Oct., 1786, he was married to Esther Ranney, daughter of Dea. Ephraim Ranney. As the fruits of this union, they had children :

Seth Shaler, Ambrose Tyler, Esther, Joel, Ranney, Phebe, Olivia, and Abigail.

Mr. Arnold was an industrious man and prospered in his business, and acquired a handsome property. He made a public profession of religion at the age of 89, and lived to the age of 101 years, 10 months and 3 days; and was able to dress himself the day he died.

His second son died when a young man.

Seth Shaler, his eldest son, is now living at the age of 82, an honored and useful minister of the gospel.

Esther, the oldest daughter, twice married, but now a widow, is still living in her native town at the age of 78. A prominent characteristic of the Arnold family has been that of sterling religious character.

Of others who settled in the East Parish of Westminster about this period, whose date of settlement is obtained mostly from the record of deeds, are in 1779, JABEZ PAINE, at the south part of the town, elected deacon of the church in 1812. No descendants in town.

JOHN LANE, from South Hadley, a teacher before he came to Westminster, settled on Wellington hill. His son Jonathan married Anna, daughter of Capt. Azariah Wright, and has numerous descendants now living in the place.

BENJAMIN WHITNEY, whose lot lay just north of James Richardson's, being No. 11 in the first range of 80 acres.

ELIAKIM SPOONER

appears to have been a prominent man in the town; he was member of the Assembly in 1793, '94, and '95, and a member of the Council from 1802-1807.

He was a resident of Hardwick, Mass., in 1779. We find a deed of this date conveying to him several lots of confiscated land in the Government meadow.

EDWARD GARY,

Thomas Dunham, Stanton Richardson, were here in 1780; Abel Carpenter, David Daley, in 1781; Richard Dorand, Abraham Shipman, in 1782-'83, none of whom, that we are aware, have descendants in the place now.

DEA. ABIEL GOODELL

was here in 1780; he came from Pomfret, Ct., and settled at the south part of the town on the Putney line. He married the widow of Dan Dickinson, one of the first members of the church, in 1767.

He had 8 children, among whom was his son, Dea. Abiel, who lived here for a time, and then went to Lyndon, Vt. He had also a son William, who was a minister of the gospel, and a son Simon, who was a physician in Melville, N. H., who also had a son Simon, who graduated at Brown University, and became a Baptist minister.

DEA. NATHANIEL KITTREDGE was in Westminster as early as 1783, and elected to the office of deacon, in 1820. He lived on what is called the "Underwood place," on Mill Brook.

BENJAMIN GOODRIDGE

came from Keene, N. H., in 1782, and settled on the hill where Roswell Whitney now lives. His father, Benjamin, came from Middletown, Mass., soon after, and lived with him. The father and three sons were in the battle of Bunker Hill. After the father came to Westminster, his son Benjamin removed to the north of Joseph Wright's, and there lived the remainder of his life. He had three sons and three daughters.

Heman, one of the sons, settled in Westminster, and left descendants.

Polly, one of the daughters, married Dea. Abiel Goodell, jr., one of whose daughters became the wife of Rev. Mr. Graves, of Iowa City.

CRAIGE & POMEROY

were merchants here in 1784, on the spot where Mr. Hills now lives.

THOMAS FULLER

was here in 1785, and settled upon Wellington hill. His son, Judge Austin Fuller, of Saratoga, was the first baptised child of the East Parish church.

LOT HALL

was a resident of Westminster in 1783; he had previously been engaged in a naval expedition for the defence of the harbor and navigation of South Carolina, and was twice taken prisoner, and once taken to Glasgow, Scotland.

He possessed a good education, and had devoted himself to the profession of the law. He was chosen to represent the town in the General Assembly in 1789, '91, '92, and 1808. As Presidential Elector in 1792, he cast the vote of the State for George Washington and John Adams. In 1799, he was a member of the Council of Censors, and for 7 years, from 1794 to 1801, was a judge of the Supreme Court of the State.

His services in the latter position displayed much ability, and gained for him much credit. In 1800, he was constituted a fellow of Middlebury college, which position he held until his death. His character and merits are thus summed up by Mr. B. H. Hall:

“As a friend, he was constant, confiding, and generous. As a citizen, patriotic, public spirited, and liberal. As a husband, obliging, affectionate, and gentle. He was ever ready to assist the poor in their misery, and the afflicted in their suffering.

His legal abilities were of an high order, and were well suited to the times in which, and the people among whom he lived.

While on the bench, his opinions were prepared with deliberation, and his decisions were ever based in justice and right.

His fund of anecdote was great, and a memory of surpassingly retentive powers enabled him to call up, on any occasion, incidents illustrative of whatever topic might be under consideration. This remarkable faculty, combined with an extensive experience of men and things, and an affable disposition, rendered his conversation not only agreeable but instructive. Though dying in the fifty-third year of his age, his life was an active one, and his personal and political influence was felt and acknowledged in the community where he resided.”

The following is a passage from Judge Hall's address upon the character of Washington:

“Heaven seems to have sent him upon the earth, to serve at once as an example of that perfection of which human nature is capable, and of that happiness it may enjoy in private life—and at the same time to have literally endowed him with those public virtues, which sometimes raise human nature above itself. In short, nothing seems wanting to grace the perfection of his character. He sustained adversity with firmness, and prosperity with moderation. The power and sublimity of his genius transcend the fame of Cæsar, and his consummate wisdom and prudence, that of Augustus. His superiority in peace, as well as in war, has been acknowledged by all, and even his enemies have confessed, with a sigh, his great and shining accomplishments, and that he loved his country; and deserved the empire of the world.

Though we cannot expect to reach the transcendent height of his public honors and military glory, with respect to the exercise of his private and domestic virtues, we may, in some measure, be imitators of him. Let us then copy his bright example. Let us live and act as he advises, and in this way shall we more convincingly evidence our regard for his memory than we should were we daily to repair to his sepulchre and bedew with tears of sincere regret that stupendous monument of our country's salvation."

ANOTHER EMIGRATION.

About the year 1785 or '86 there was an emigration from Worcester Co., Mass., some of whom settled in the south part of Westminster and others in Putney. Among these were Dea. Jabez Paine (lived where Mr. Clay now does); Hezekiah Saunders (lived where James Towers now does) and Major Upham, who settled a little to the east of Dea. Paine. Washburn, Palmer and Brooks settled in the edge of Putney.

JOHN GROUT

is worthy of mention as being the grandfather of six ministers and missionaries and missionaries' wives, besides one who died during his seminary course. One of these went as missionary to Southern Africa, three to Turkey, and one to the West.

John Grout was the fifth generation from Capt. John Grout, who came to this country as early as 1640. Mr. Grout was the father of 13 children, and one of the sons is now living in Westminster.

LEVI PECK

came to this place about the year 1788, and settled where his son Shubael now lives. He married a daughter of Joshua Stoddard and was a prominent man and much respected.

REUBEN PIERCE

was here early in the history of the town, he lived to the age of 94. His father was killed by the Tories at Bennington.

ELEAZER MAY,

son of Rev. Eleazer May, of Haddam, Ct., came to this place in 1789, and lived with Mr. Cone, and kept a store a few years upon the upper street; he afterwards built the brick store and entered into partnership with Hon. Mark Richards.

ELLERY ALBEE

was a man of considerable influence in town. He was a man of few words, but prompt and efficient in business. He held the office of Justice of the Peace, represented the town in the Legislature in 1821, '22, '30, '46 and '48.

He was a member of the Constitutional Convention in 1828, and Judge of Probate from 1838 to '46.

POPULATION.

Westminster had formerly many more inhabitants than at the present time; it will never be again what it has been in the past.

The population reached its highest limit in 1820, since which time it has been gradually diminishing, as will be seen from the census at different times. In the year 1771 the population was 478; in 1791, 1601; in 1800, 1942; in 1810, 1925; in 1820, 1974; in 1830, 1737; in 1840, 1556; in 1850, 1722; in 1860 it was 1301; in 1870 it was 1240, East Parish, 818; West Parish, 422, 1880.—SEE APPENDIX.

(The increase of some 200 from 1840 to 1850 is occasioned by the temporary residence of workmen in building the railroad.)

has received a good degree of attention. The first school in town is said to have been taught by John Webb, who was an early resident of the place, and afterwards removed to Rockingham.

THE OLD ACADEMY.

Several years since there was a flourishing academy in the town.

John Goldsbury taught the school in 1849, and in 1850 to '51 it was under the care of Prof. L. F. Ward, and for two or three years after it passed through the hands of Mr. W. H. Coburn, Mr. Clark, Mr. John Stratton and Mr. Maynard.

In 1854, Prof. Ward again took charge of the school, under whose efficient management it gained great popularity, attracting scholars from various parts of New England. The number of pupils was a hundred and upwards, and sometimes it reached nearly 200 students.

Five catalogues were issued under Prof. Ward, and one State Institute catalogue. Mr. A. B. Dascomb took the school in 1858, and did good service for some 3 years, since which time there have been only occasional terms.

THE FIRST PRINTING IN THE STATE was done here in the summer of 1788, by Judah P. Spooner and Timothy Green. In Feb., 1781, the paper called the "Vermont Gazette or Green Mountain Post Boy" was commenced by the first printers in Vermont. Its motto was :

"Pliant as reeds where streams of freedom glide, Firm as the hills to stem oppression's tide."

It was issued weekly, and continued to 1784, when the press was removed to Windsor, where it now remains in the possession of Preston Merrifield, Esq.

The Vermont Editors and Publishers' Association, at their late meeting, appointed a committee to procure this press for deposit in the archives of the Historical Society, at Montpelier.

After the removal of Spooner & Green from Westminster, the printing business was carried on in the same place by John Goold.

THE LIBRARIES OF WESTMINSTER.

There was formerly a valuable circulating library in the East Parish; a few years since the books were divided among the shareholders.

THE FARMERS' CLUB

have had, for several years past, an excellent library, but this during the past year was sold at auction.

There is, at the present time, a magazine club supported by the ladies of the parish.

There are taken from the post office, in the East Parish, at the present time, 6 dailies, 287 weeklies, 73 monthlies, and several quarterlies.

WESTMINSTER IN THE WARS.

Several of the early settlers were enlisted in the French and Indian war, and several were in the war of the Revolution, to whom reference has already been made.

Those who were in the army in the late war of the Union for the suppression of the Southern rebellion, from the East Parish, were :

Albert W. Metcalf, wounded in hand; Benjamin Cook, died in service; James H. Ellis, Peter Good, Victor Good, Wm. H. Chapin; Milton Pierce, died in service; Ambrose Fairbrother, died in service; Artemas Ellis, died in service; Henry O. Parker, Alvin J. Parker, Charles C. Chapin, Tyler H. Joy, Sylvanus Spooner, died in service; Eli Metcalf, A. S. Spencer, M. H. Cook, Cornelius Harty, John A. Grout, Edward H. Weymouth; Hollis Wyman, lost an arm; Stephen Wyman, Willard Moulthrop, William Wood, Hiram Metcalf, Thomas Ashwell, Winslow Church ; Henry M. Corlew, lost a foot.

NINE MONTHS' MEN.

HOTELS.

John Norton kept tavern on the upper street, and John Goold on the lower in 1775, the latter of which buildings is now standing. Ephraim Ranney also kept tavern above John Norton's at a later date.

Michael Gilson, at the south part, kept public house for 20 years after he built his house, from about 1765 to '85.

Asher Southard had a hotel for several years (about the year 1800) in the building now occupied by the store of R. S. Safford & Co. He was succeeded by Aaron Wales for some 10 years, and he by Joseph Willard, and then came John Foster, in the same place, 2 or 3 years, and then Joel Aldrich some 6 or 8 years, and Joseph Erwin on the Hunt place, at the south part, about the same time.

Eliakim Spooner about the same time kept a public house where Mr. Lord now lives, about two miles below Belows Falls.

Samuel Cone had a public house opposite the brick store ; afterwards a Mr. Brown carried on the business at the same place, about 1810 ; and still later, in 1868, Mr. Danforth, now at Marlboro, N. H.

Since the railroad was built there has been less occasion for public houses, and there is now but one in the place, and that is kept by Allen Wells.

STORES.

Eleazer May opened a store on the upper street, near Mr. Cone's, both of whom came from Haddam, Ct. Sam'l Cone, jr. was clerk with May, and kept store after Mr. May removed.

There was, afterwards, the firm of Pratt & May, and when Mark Richards came to town he bought out Mr. Pratt and with Mr. May did a large business, and, as appears from the old account books, rum and toddy constituted no inconsiderable part of the traffic. They had rum in those days that was thought fit for ministers to drink, as appears from the fact that the parson was a frequent purchaser.

Richards & May were succeeded by Isaac Grout, who carried on the business for two or three years, and he was followed by Mr. Nutting, and he by Mr. Chase, who has been succeeded by the present occupant.

Craige & Pomeroy had a store for many years, from 1784 to 1800, where Mr. Hills now lives, and a Mr. Washburn had a store since 1800 on the site of the present parsonage.

MANUFACTURES.

The hatting business was formerly carried on in the place by Josiah Davis. There was, some years ago, a woolen mill on the small stream near Harlan Farr's.

The principal manufacture at the present time is that of baskets. There are three saw-mills and the same number of grist-mills in the parish at the present time. There was once a saw-mill on the Underwood Brook, or as it was formerly called, Mill Brook, probably the first one in town.

There was, some 60 or 70 years ago, an old saw-mill on the Governor's brook, near where Luke Rice lives. Benjamin Goodridge built a saw-mill some 90 years ago on or near the spot where Mr. Goold has one at the present time.

THE PHYSICIANS

who have practised in the East Parish, so far as can be ascertained, are as follows :

William Hill, who was here in 1769 and attended upon French when he was killed in 1775.

Elkanah Day, who was also here in 1775.

Dr. Robinson, who was here in 1785.

Dr. Hilerman was here about this time, and a noted physician.

Edward Campbell practiced here some 10 years, and then removed to the West Parish in 1804.

Wm. Town probably succeeded him, and died here in 1805.

Dr. Goddard was here about this time.

John Marsh was here in 1808, and Dr. Hilerman in 1813, who was a German and a physician of much note.

Jonathan Badger is spoken of as a noted physician about this time ; precisely when he was here is not ascertained.

Dr. Jeremiah Foster was buried here in 1827.

Dr. Barrett was here previous to 1820 and was succeeded by Pliny Safford about this time.

was the physician of the place for nearly fifty years, and died in 1867, an honored and useful man. He was succeeded by Joseph Chandler in 1866, and he by Dr. Stone the following year. Dr. Stone remained in the place but a few months, it being too healthy for a physician to live, and since that time there has been no resident physician in the parish, nor in the town.

THE CHURCH AND MINISTRY.

As soon as there was a prospect of a permanent settlement in Westminister, measures were taken to organize a church, and in the terms of the original grant, to "settle a learned and orthodox minister," from which time to the present, Orthodox Congregationalism has held the rule throughout the town. The only exception being the formation of a Baptist Society in 1782, whose membership was mostly from the West Parish ; and a movement to provide for "liberal preaching" one-fourth part of the time during the ministry of Rev. Mr. Sage, which resulted in the erection of a new house of worship in the East Parish.

Both of these movements appear to have been short lived.

The church in the East Parish began its existence with nine members, one of whom was the pastor-elect, on the 11th of June, 1767. The names of those who composed the church at that time were : REV. JESSE GOODELL. William Willard, Ephraim Ranney, Bildad Andros, John Sessions, Dan Dickinson, Zachariah Gilson, John French, and Azariah Dickinson. On the same day was ordained pastor of the church, which relation he sustained about one year. During his ministry the church increased to 40 members, about one-half by letter, and one-half of the whole number being males.

Mr. Goodell was a graduate of Yale College, in the class of 1761, and licensed by the Hartford North Association in Oct., 1763. He entered the Revolutionary Army after leaving Westminster, and died in 1779.

On the 4 May, 1769, Ephraim Ranney and John Sessions were elected deacons. During the same year a large and commodious house of worship was erected, which remains in a good state of preservation at the present day. It was many years, however, before the house assumed a finished state, probably not far from 1800. It is now used as a town hall, but is still held in great veneration by the older inhabitants as the sacred place whither the tribes went up to worship God. The old pulpit, "high up the wall, access to it by a flight of several stairs," with the grave deacon's seats in front, still remains, but the ancient sounding-board, threatening, as the young people thought, the minister's head, and the large, square pews, with their clattering seats, whose music once furnished entertainment for the little ones, are gone. These relics of the former days, as well as most of those associated with them, whose lives have passed into history, are among the things of the past.

Between the first and second pastorates there was an interval of some 6 years. During this interval the pulpit was supplied, at least a portion of the time, by the of Granby, and five were added to the church.

A receipt from Mr. Backus to Col. Stephen Row Bradley, for money received for preaching, bears date, 5 Sept., 1768.

On the 6 July, 1774,

was ordained pastor, and continued in that relation for about 11 years.

Mr. Bullen was a native of Sutton, Mass., and married a sister of John Morse, one of the early settlers of Westminster, and a kinswoman of Prof. Morse, the inventor of the telegraph. "He was a man of learning, talent, and piety, a fine writer, and a clear, sensible, and instructive, though not an eloquent preacher."

During his pastorate 46 were added to the church, the larger part of them by profession. In addition to the duties of the ministry, he did a large speculation in land, carried on the mercantile business, and the manufacture of potash.

In 1785, the relation between him and the church was informally dissolved, and he removed to Athens, where he owned large tracts of land, and organized there a Congregational church. He preached mostly there, as Paul sometimes did, at his own charges, and twice represented the town in the State Legislature.

He afterwards labored as a missionary among the Chickasaw Indians in Mississippi. He organized the first Protestant church in that State; he labored in that vicinity for some 20 years, preaching the gospel and establishing churches, and after a ministry of more than 50 years, died at an advanced age in 1825.

After Mr. Bullen left Westminster, the pulpit was supplied for a time by the Rev. Simon Backus, and others whose names have not been preserved.

On the 24 June, 1790,

was called to the pastorate, and ordained on the 18 Oct. following. With the exception of about 2 years, his whole ministry was given to this church. His first pastorate of 17 years resulted in the addition of 95 to the church, 56 of them by profession.

In 1805, on account of the diminished resources of the society, from the removal of some 30 or more from the East Parish church to constitute the church in the West Parish, Mr. Sage was led to ask a dismissal, which was not granted.

In 1807, he renewed the request, which was granted. In November of that year, he was installed colleague with Rev. Mr. Weld, of Braintree, Mass., and continued there a year and 6 months, to a day; after which he returned to the church at Westminster, with which he remained for 29 years.

During Mr. Sage's second pastorate, special seasons of religious interest were enjoyed, in 1810, '16, '25, and '31.

This last revival, aside from the addition of 25 members to the church, gave rise to the organization of a temperance society in the winter of 1832-33, and it soon became the practice of the church not to receive those who indulged in the use of intoxicating liquors.

Mr. Sage was a man handsome in personal appearance, of fine social qualities, clear in intellect, and evangelical in doctrine. His reputation as a preacher was such that he was invited to preach the election-sermon before the State Legislature in 1803, and at several installations, and three of his sermons have been given to the press.*

In May, 1838, the

* He was born in Berlin, Ct.; son of Dea. Jedediah and Sarah (Murry) Sage; graduated at Yale, 1787; studied with Rev. Cyprian Strong, D.D.; licensed by Hartford South Association, 1787; preached as candidate in Shelburne, Mass., 1790, the church voting on the call 22 for, 22 against; came directly to Westminster; married, Jan. 20, 1791, Orpah Robinson, of Granville, Mass., who died Feb. 18, 1792; married 2d, Clarissa, daughter of Rev. Eleazer May, of Haddam, Ct., who died Dec. 16, 1836. He preached his farewell sermon at Westminster the last of April, 1838, and died here Jan. 21, 1841.

REV. SETH S. ARNOLD

became acting pastor, and continued in that relation for about 2 years, with the understanding that he would give way to an acceptable candidate for settlement when such should be found. Under his labors the church enjoyed a season of great prosperity which resulted in the hopeful conversion of between 60 and 70 persons, and the addition of 41 members to the church.

On the 22 Apr., 1840,

was ordained to the pastorate with a salary of $450. His connection with the church continued 5 years. During the first 3 years a low state of religion prevailed, when in Feb., 1843, an interesting work of grace commenced and continued for several weeks, which resulted in the addition of 17 persons, most of them converts in this revival, to the membership of the church.

Mr. Batchelder was a native of Wendell (now Sunapee), N. H., and a graduate of Bangor Theological Seminary, in 1838. He was a "sound scholar, a faithful pastor, a good sermonizer." After he left Westminster, he entered the ministry of the Episcopal church, and has been rector of the church in Highgate, Manchester, Belkows Falls, and Bethel.

On the 21 Oct., 1846,

REV. WILLIAM H. GILBERT

was ordained to the pastorate, and continued in that relation until 5 Mar., 1851. He was a native of Weston (now Easton), Ct.; was graduated at Yale College in 1841, and studied theology at Andover and New Haven. Since leaving Westminster he has been pastor of the church in Ashfield, Mass., and in Granby, Ct., and since in the employ of the Connecticut Bible Society.

After Mr. Gilbert's dismissal the became acting pastor for 2 years, and was succeeded by the REV. ISAAC ESTEY for about the same period of time.

REV. J. W. PIERCE

In May, 1855, the

REV. EDWIN SEABURY

became the acting pastor until April, 1858, in November of which year, the Rev. Harrison G. Park was installed, and dismissed in Mar., 1860.

These frequent changes in the pastorate had resulted unfavorably for the prosperity of the church.

For 15 years the membership had steadily declined, the loss had been twice the gain, and at the existing rate of decrease, the prospect was fair for a speedy extinction of the church.

The Lord, however, did not forsake his people. He did not break the bruised reed, nor quench the smoking flax. The ministry of the which commenced in July, 1860, was most happy in its results. It was the means of reversing this downward current, and of uniting and strengthening the spiritual forces of the church. During the summer of 1861, a special season of religious interest was enjoyed without any extra effort to produce it,—it was remarkably quiet in its operations, and confined mostly to the young. As the results of this work, 24 new members were added to the church. On account of protracted sickness in his family, Mr. Foster, at the deep regret of his people, was compelled to leave 26 April, 1863, after a ministry of little less than 3 years. He was immediately succeeded by then a student in the Seminary, who supplied the pulpit till the first of September, and was invited to the pastorate after he should have completed another year's study at the Theological Seminary. The pulpit meanwhile was supplied by the Rev. Selah R. Arms. Mr. Fairbanks commenced his permanent ministry with the church on the last Sabbath in June, 1864, and was ordained on the 31st of August following, and still remains the pastor (1870).

MR. F. J. FAIRBANKS,

DEACONS.

NATIVE MINISTERS.

REV. JOEL RANNEY ARNOLD,

son of Seth and Esther (Ranney) Arnold, born 25 Apr., 1794; studied medicine, and practised it about a year; then studied theology with his brother, the Rev. S. S. Arnold, at Alstead, N. H. He was ordained at Chester, N. H., 8 Mar., 1820, and had a successful ministry there of 10 years, which resulted in the addition of 110 persons to the church. He was installed at Waterbury, Ct., in 1831, and at Colchester, Vt., in 1836, at which latter place he remained 13 years, and had a successful ministry.

He then spent a year or two in his native place, during which time he was instrumental in the organization of a church at Bellows Falls. He afterwards preached at Middlebury, Ct., between 2 and 3 years, and in Dec., 1854, was installed over the South Church at Coventry, where he remained till April, 1860, after which he preached a year in Maine, and then removed to Chester, N. H., where he died in 1865.*

REV. SETH SHALER ARNOLD, son of Seth and Esther Arnold, born 22 Feb., 1778, was graduated at Middlebury, 1812. He taught school a year at Bladensburg, Md., and at the same time studied theology with the Rev. J. Breckenridge, Washington, D. C., and on his return to Westminster, in 1814, continued his studies with Rev. Sylvester Sage.

In May, 1815, he commenced preaching in Alstead, N. H., and was ordained pastor of the Congregational church there in Jan., 1816, and was dismissed in April, 1834. Three revivals occurred in connection with his ministry at this place.

Previous to his dismissal, he preached 2 years in Gilsum, N. H., and subsequently at Walpole, nearly 2 years, and then at Westminster about the same length of time.

He was acting pastor at different times at Newfane, Wardsboro, Saxton's River, Westminster West, Springfield, and Cavendish (in Vermont), and Troy, Westmoreland, Langdon, Charles-town, Unity, Lempster and Alstead (in N. H.). He also preached 2 years in Roxbury, N. H., between 3 and 4 years in West Halifax, Vt., and 6 years in West Townshend, Vt. In 1864 he retired from the ministry to Weathersfield, where he now resides.†

* His publications are: "Address at the Opening of a Cemetery in Colchester;" "Strictures on a Sermon, Preached in Chester, on 'Revivals of Religion in Jerusalem;'" a Sermon on "Chance and its Design," preached at the burial of three persons who perished in the burning of a dwelling-house; and two articles in the "New Englander."—P. H. W.]

† He has published one sermon, "The Intellectual Housekeeper." Boston: 1835. 12mo., pp. 47; and "The Family Choir," hymns set to music.

THE REV. WILLIAM GOODELL

son of Abiel and Margaret (Brown) Goodell, born 18 June, 1783, graduated at Middlebury, 1810, and was principal of Pawlet Academy one year, and tutor in Middlebury College 2 years. Studied theology with Rev. Mr. Packard, and licensed by the Franklin (Mass.) Association in 1813. He was ordained pastor of the Congregational church in Grafton, Vt., in Sept., 1815, and dismissed in September, 1820. In February, 1822, he began to preach in Holland Patent, N. Y., and was there installed March, 1823. He was dismissed in March, 1829. He afterwards preached as stated supply in Russia, Deerfield, Lenox, Howard and Napoli, after which he was engaged as colporteur of the American Tract Society for 3 years, and was also employed for some time as an agent of the Presbyterian Board of Publication. He died at Throopsville, N. Y., 26 Oct., 1865.

THE REV. ISAAC FARWELL HOLTON, son of William and Olive (Rockwood) Holton, born 30 Aug., 1812, graduated at Amherst College, 1836. He was, for a time, one of the Board of Instruction in Middlebury College, and has been prominently engaged as a writer and lecturer.

THE SABBATH SCHOOL.

BY R. S. SAFFORD, SECRETARY.

We have made some effort during the past year to learn of the state and circumstances of the introduction of this institution into this place; and although positive knowledge has not been gained upon all points, we think it reasonably certain that its advent was as follows:

About the year 1813 or '14, Mrs. Lusk, afterwards Mrs. Field, gathered some children and taught them on the Sabbath, in the old General Bradley house, that stood where Mr. J. C. Richardson's house now stands, and she seems to have been succeeded by the widow Bela Clapp, assisted by Miss Davis, afterwards Mrs. Dea. McNeil, in the same house.

In the year 1817, probably in the month of May or June, the Rev. Mr. Sage having been solicited to lend his influence in introducing the new institution, he appointed a meeting of those in favor of the Sabbath School at the old school-house, on the spot where Dea. McNeil now lives; it was then and there determined to organize a school, and the next Sabbath, Mr. Sage, in the old meeting-house, announced the teachers and their classes. What the officers were under this organization is uncertain; probably they had no secretary, for there are no records in the secretary's hands farther back than the organization in 1838, and we cannot learn that any were regularly kept.

Dr. Thayer was active in starting the school, and was its first superintendent, if they had an office of that kind; he was not a doctor of medicine, but received his title from having practiced the art of the apothecary; and while he lived in this town was an operative in Clapp's woolen mill.

It took 36 years from the time that Richard Raikes started the first Sunday School in London, in 1781, for the new institution to travel from the place of its birth, and become firmly seated in Westminster, and remembering that those were years of slow-sailing vessels and slow stage coaches, and few newspapers, it was as soon as could be reasonably expected. And it will be observed that just half a century after the church was organized here, her co-worker, the Sabbath School, joined hands with her.

In the early days of the school, the scholars were all young, none older than 14 years; they learned the catechism and verses from the Scriptures, and hymns, and the school was discontinued during the winter, as there was no fire in the meeting-house.

The earlier superintendents were Dr. Thayer, Hon. Ellery Albee and Samuel Lovejoy.

The Hon. Mark Richards was a great patron of the school, one year furnishing the girls with white dresses and blue sashes, in which they attended a celebration; another year offering three prizes to those that committed to memory the most Scripture. These prizes were a handsomely bound Bible, a Testament, and a hymn book, and were taken by Hannah Davis (now Mrs. Newell of Fall River, Mass.), Harriet Holton (now Mrs. Noyes, of Wallingford, Conn.), and Nancy May (now Mrs. Butterfield, of Palmyra, N. Y.).

In the year 1824, Mr. Richards gave the school $40, $16 to be divided to the four that committed to memory the most Scripture and hymns; $16 to be divided to the next eight, and the balance to be equally divided among the rest of the scholars. Judge Albee was superintendent that year and also a teacher ; he kept a record which gives the classes, with the ages of the pupils, the number of Sabbaths each attended, the number of verses of Scripture recited by each, the number of answers in the Catechism, and the number of verses in hymns recited. The school that year was held 26 Sabbaths, probably commencing with May and ending with October. It was divided into 28 classes, 12 of boys and 16 of girls, and there were 115 scholars.

The teachers were: Ellery Albee, Joel Page, Harry Bellows, now Chief Justice of New Hampshire, Daniel Averill, Oscar Davis, Wm. Goodell, Edmund Burke, since prominent in political life, Wm. Holton, Jr., Rodney Burton, Mercy Averill, afterwards Mrs. Swinton, Sally Baldwin, sister of Mr. Richards, Mary Lord, Jemima Holton, Sophronia Cone, afterwards Mrs. Thresher, and Salome Cone, now Mrs. Wetherell, Esther Hills, now Mrs. Smith, Phebe Arnold, now Mrs. Isaac Holton, Mary Hunt, now Mrs. Fessenden Clark, Mary Ann May, now Mrs. Gov. Fletcher, Mehitable Davis, now Mrs. Mc Niel, Anna Chipman and Louisa Chipman, afterwards Mrs. Hodgkins and Mrs. Jones, Merab Bradley, afterwards Mrs. Judge Kellogg, Julia May, now Mrs. Dr. Hoyt, Harriet Ann Holton, now Mrs. John Noyes, Frances Clapp, Susan Willard, Narcissa Buxton, now Mrs. Wm. Goodell, Salina Stoddard, afterwards Mrs. Buxton, Hannah May, afterwards Mrs. E. A. Holton, and now Mrs. Phelps, and Minerva Holton, now Mrs. Gilchrist.

Selections from the Poems of Hon. Wm. C. Bradley :

ORDINATION HYMN.

(Written by Mr. Bradley, at the request of a grandson, to be used at the Ordination of a fellow-student in theology.)

PART I.

When erst in Eden's leafy shade,
Man newly felt his Maker's breath,
Ere fair temptation's charms had made
This world a scene of sin and death—
No second tongue was needed then
To tell the Almighty's high behests;
The still, small voice could come to men,
And find an answer in their breasts.

But when debased, the torpid soul
God by his messengers awoke,
Amid the thunder's solemn roll,
The tempest's blast, the lightning's stroke,
Then rose the altars to his name,
And crowds the ritual splendor saw,
Heard prophets sing, and priests proclaim
The awful terrors of the law.

At length the Fullness from above
To earth the high commission bore,
And spoke to men of peace and love
As never mortal spoke before;
And conquering Death, the risen Lord
Gave forth his great and last command,
And bid his brethren spread the word
To every soul in every land.

PART II.

O thou most High! all good and just,
Look down from heaven, thy dwelling-place;
Behold thy servant take his trust,
And aid him with thy helping hand
To do thy work, to do thy will,
To speak thy praise, to preach thy word,
Promote all good, repress all ill,—
A faithful steward of the Lord.

Found him on thine Eternal Rock;
Make him a shepherd of thy care,
Heavenward to gently lead his flock,
And in his arms thy lambs to bear;
To walk upright in wisdom's ways,
In which the blessed Jesus trod,
Until the "Well done!" comes with praise,
Fresh from his Father and his God.

(Written upon the fly-leaf of a Bible presented to his daughter, Merab A. Bradley) :

These well-bound leaves an earthly father gave,
Proof of his care, his love, his hope to save;
But, oh! the precious word inscribed within,
The powerful antidote to poisonous sin;

Which guides the wanderer, dries the mourner's eye;

Which teaches how to live and how to die;

Which breaks the bondage of the frozen tomb,

And makes the joyful soul in life to come;

Life, too, eternal; this to me was given

By Thee, my Father, God, which art in heaven.

(Found in a watch which he wore for many years, written in a beautiful and clear hand, but exceedingly minute):

"Little monitor! by thee,

Let me learn what I should be,

Learn the round of life to fill,

Useful and progressive still.

Thou canst gentle hints impart,

How to regulate the heart.

When I wind thee up at night,

Mark each fault, and set thee right,

Let me search my bosom too,

And my daily thoughts review;

Nor be easy when I find

Latent errors rise to view,

Till all be regular and true."

(A news-clip from a letter of Mrs. Mary S. P. Cutts, daughter of Consul Jarvis, who contributed, before her late lamented death, the History of Weathersfield Bow, and its Early Settlers, to this work):

OF HON. WM. C. BRADLEY, S. G. Goodrich, his brother-in-law, says: "'Few passions, except piety and avarice, survive three-score.' Then Mr. Bradley was a rare exception. The passion for books, the love of the beautiful, remained to the last. A courtier might envy the ease and elegance with which, when past seventy, he would enter a brilliantly lighted drawing-room and charm the hearts of all the ladies, at least, by his sallies of wit, and the grace of his compliments.

"When visiting Washington, a few years since, an accomplished and fashionable young widow, now the wife of Commodore Dahlgren, said to me, 'I have lately formed a delightful friendship with an old gentleman of seventy, from your State.' She could hardly believe it possible that a man over seventy years of age, from Vermont, could surpass the foreign ministers, many of whom visited her, in elegance of manner, and real bonhomie."

DEATH OF MR. BRADLEY.

The journals of the State all poured their tributes over his bier. Says "The Rutland Herald":

"We regret to announce the death of the venerable Wm. C. Bradley."

The death of Mr. Bradley dissolves the last link which connects the former generation of the distinguished men of Vermont with the present, and the names Richard Skinner, Daniel Chipman, Chauncey Langdon, Charles Marsh, Rollin C. Mallory, John Mattocks, and a host of others of the noble men of Vermont who have been his associates in public and private life are brought before us, all of whom have long since preceded him to the grave.

His father was among the most prominent of the early men of Vermont, the son, inheriting the strong native powers, genial characteristics and ready wit of his father, and educated amid the influences of that early history of our commonwealth, was imbued with the spirit and inspiration of the principles and habits of the men who laid the foundations of our State.

* * * * *

He was the colleague of Webster, Calhoun, Clay, Mallory and others in the palmiest day of the brightest intellects that ever graced our National Congress. In 1856, he was made the bearer of the vote of Vermont to Washington, 43 years after his first entrance into Congress, and his retentive memory enabled him to give many reminiscences of the early days, and his great fund of anecdote and wit attracted particular attention and drew around him a large circle of admirers during his stay at the Capital.

Thus has passed away from earth one of the most gifted, genial and distinguished men of our good old commonwealth, and his memory will long be cherished in the hearts of those who have been privileged to enjoy his friendship and society. A gentleman of the old school, he enlivened many a social circle with story, anecdote and wit. In his latter life, as in earlier days, he enjoyed and honored the companionship of the most celebrated and honored men of our country.

He has outlived all of his own immediate family, having, within a few years, buried his much beloved and honored son, the late Dorr Bradley, and his wife, within a year. Some years since he removed to Brattleboro to live with his kindred, and on the occasion of the burial of his wife, he returned to Westminster with her remains, and on no consideration could he be induced to return to Brattleboro, preferring to remain and die amid the hallowed scenes and sacred associations that clustered around his early and active life, and be buried with those he loved and amid the people who had so long and often honored him and unto whom he had been a faithful servant and a useful fellow-citizen. A few weeks before his death he remarked that he should die between the 20th of February and the 23d of March, his eighty-fifth birthday, and the prediction has been fulfilled.

The grave of William C. Bradley, of Westminster and Brattleboro, is covered with laurel, and yet the Editor of this work would lay one more sprig thereon; so the charming countenance and figure of this grand old man, tall, large, rather—nobly developed, crowned with the hoary head, rises up stereoscoped on the glass of the past and stands on the tablet of memory, one of our earliest and noblest friends in this enterprise, as we saw him twenty-five years since.

I think we saw him first in Westminster—twice, later, we visited him at Brattleboro. For years his honored name stood on our published table of writers for Windham county, as the historian for Westminster. He had the papers and the information for it. At the last visit—"I'm getting too old to write much," he said, "I did intend to have written it out myself. But you shall have it. Dorr, my son, must help now; together we can give it, and you shall have it."

"I can appreciate the work," he said, at our first visit; "but you do not ask enough for it—all the cost of time and labor it is for you, besides the publication expenses, you should not sell a single number short of a dollar; and don't you give any man a single number of it. No matter what he may do for it; he will not do as much for the work as you are doing for his town, county and State."

When we sent the work, as issued, he always sent the pay for it, saying "the men that furnish your papers must be the sons of the town and State, not hired writers, but local and patriotic historians."

He always wrote to us on the reception of a new number, and these letters are treasures among those of the past correspondents of the work, many of whom now are in their graves.

His chirography was unique, and several of his letters have poetical specimens of his off-hand writing in verse. He was a man weighted with grave thoughts, with a rich vein of humor. The following was dashed off with happy readiness by him in his 85th year,—the winter of 1861,—which he spent at Washington, after hearing Major Anderson had evacuated Fort Moultrie for Fort Sumpter.

ROB ANDERSON, MY JO.

Rob Anderson, my jo, Rob,

I wonder what you mean,

To drink so many juleps

In praise of Halloween.

You need all your wits, Rob,

To keep the forts, you know;

But they'll slip through your fingers,

Rob Anderson, my jo.

Rob Anderson, my jo, Rob,

When first we were acquaint,

You were a sweet cadet, Rob,

And always did your stint;

But now your shanks are shaky, Rob,
 You stagger as you go—
 Your tongue is thick, your eye is glazed,
 Rob Anderson, my jo.

Once in the brush with Black Hawk
 You fairly did your share;
 And so with Osceola, Rob,
 Whose bones you have in care.
 You got fame among the greasers, Rob,
 Though with a wound or so;
 But now we'll wound your honor,
 Rob Anderson, my jo.

Fort Moultrie is a jewel, Rob,
 Fort Sumpter is a gem;
 But with rafts well made of cotton bags,
 We'll surely conquer them.
 They now are in your keeping, Rob,
 But soon as cocks do crow
 We'll ease you of the burden,
 Rob Anderson, my jo.

We've watched you in the Nina, Rob,
 That away you might not steal,
 For we know when you're yourself, Rob,
 You are a cunning chiel.
 But this night you are harmless, Rob,
 Sleep off your drunk, you fool,
 While we steam away to Charleston,
 And keep our bonny Yule.

Thus sung the boasting heroes,
 Of the palmetto and snake,
 And never dreamed that Robin
 Was such a "Wide Awake."
 They gone, he roused his mettle,
 And while they took their swipes,
 He stole a march upon them,
 And saved the stars and stripes.

WM. C. BRADLEY.

(The following anecdotes are also current of Mr. Bradley:)

At one time he was engaged in the trial of a cause growing out of an alleged fraud in the exchange of horses, in which the damage claimed was very small, but in the result of which there was too much personal feeling. His argument before the jury was a masterpiece of forensic eloquence, in which tremendous earnestness was the prominent feature. Passing from the Court House after he had finished, his pastor, who had been present during the trial, took his arm, and, as they walked down the street, said: "Mr. Bradley, I wish you would tell me how it is that you lawyers become so much interested in the trial of petty issues, and so overpoweringly in earnest in the argument of them, while our ministers, who stand between God and a fellow world, and whose work it is to arouse men to a sense of their eternal destinies, fall so far below them in the earnestness of their discourses."

"That is easily explained," said Mr. Bradley. "you do not realize that you are as near the judgment as we do."

One of Senator Bradley's sons purchased a tract of land north of the Asylum grounds, in Brattleboro, bordering on the Connecticut river. The scenery on every side was grand, but the plat itself was nothing but sand—and that so dry and clean that with every wind it drifted, like snow. His purpose was to erect a residence and convert the grounds into a park.

Having completed the purchase, he invited his father to go with him and inspect his property. Arriving there, his eye took in the beautiful view, the bold, wooded bluffs on the eastern bank and the green background to the valley on the west. Meantime, his father's eye was filled figuratively and literally with the sand over which they were driving. The horses sank to their fetlocks, the wheels dragged heavily through it; the breeze was forming it into little windrows. The son broke the silence with the inquiry, "Well, father, what do you think of my purchase?"

Slowly and sadly came the reply, "Well, my son, I think had I been purchasing real estate, I should have selected that which the Almighty seemed sometime to have had some interest in."

APPENDIX.

BIOGRAPHICAL AND GENEALOGICAL.

BY REV. F. J. FAIRBANKS.

[Mr. Fairbanks' history of Westminster was written in 1870. The Appendix brings the record down to September, 1885.—ED.]

had 6 children: John, married Asenath Petty, sister to Aaron Petty. No children. A good scholar and influential man. Lived on Rocky Hill. He died in 1817, aged 54.

Samuel married Lucy Edwards. Children: John, George, and Belinda. (p. 590).

AMOS CARPENTER.

9. Anna, married (1) Giles Marvin,
(2) Zaccheus Cole (p. 579).

MICHAEL GILSON,

Here with his mother and two sisters in 1755; was born in Hatfield, Mass., 1731. He came to Putney during the French and Indian war, and enlisted in the Fort on Great Meadows. He bought the farm where Maj. Joel Page afterwards lived, his deed bearing date 6 Mar., 1759. He married a sister of Dea. Sessions. They came to their log-house, and ate their first dinner of stewed beans, with chips for plates, and spoons whittled out for the occasion. No children. A few years after he built a house near by, and kept tavern for 20 years. He was commissioned 1st Lieutenant of Westminster Militia, 18 Aug., 1778, and Captain of the same in 1779. He was shrewd at business; never went to school but one week; could read and write enough to do common business. He died 15 Apr., 1823, aged 92. His wife, Sally, died 4 July, 1757, aged 88.

MAJ. JOEL PAGE,

An adopted child of Capt. Gilson, was born 28 July, 1791, in the house where he always lived, and died July 15, 1870. A member of the General Assembly in 1842. Children: Henry and Bradford (p. 580).

LIEUT. ZACHARIAH GILSON

came here soon after his brother Michael, and settled a little to the south of his brother, on what is known as the Richard Ward place. He was one of the original members of the church here in 1767. He was once carried captive by the Indians to Canada, but afterwards returned, and died here 15 Nov., 1804, aged 67. Anna, his wife, died 8 Nov., 1826, aged 83. Children: Zachariah, Michael, and Benjamin (p. 580).

MEDAD WRIGHT,

born 27 Dec., 1734, died 3 Dec., 1817, aged 82, came from Northfield, Mass., with his brother Azariah, and Joel Holton, and John Norton, soon after the French and Indian war, probably in 1760-'61, and camped on the spot where his grandson, Daniel C. Wright, now lives. Judge Burt camped with them. Aaron Petty came at the same time. The old gambrel-roof house, now removed, was built before the Norton tavern.

Medad was constable of Westminster in 1776. He married (1) Irene, sister of Joel Holton, by whom he had 8 sons. He married (2) widow Mary Willard, of Winchester, N. H., by whom he had one son. Children:

1. Asaph, born 26 Jan., 1763, died 20 July, 1836. A physician in the West Parish. He married Lydia Campbell.

SAGE ELECTION SERMON.

I have found a remnant of one of the sermons of Rev. Mr. Sage. There are 24 pages left, and the title page is as follows:

delivered before his Excellency the Governor,

The Honorable

Council

and

House of Representatives of the

State of Vermont,

at Westminster

on the day of the Anniversary Election

October 13, 1803,

BY SYLVESTER SAGE, A. M.

Pastor of the First Church in Westminster.

Windsor:

Printed by Alden Spooner.

In General Assembly, Oct. 14th, 1803:

Resolved, That a committee of three be appointed to wait on the Rev. Mr. Sage, and respectfully present him with the thanks of the General Assembly for his election sermon delivered yesterday, and request a copy thereof for the press.

Members chosen, Leland, Butler and Olds.

Extract from Journal.

Attest: ANTHONY HASWELL, Clerk."

The three sermons of Mr. Sage which were given to the press were his Farewell Sermon at Braintree, his Election Sermon and his Sermon at the Installation of Rev. Jesse Townshend, and I do not know if any are in existence, except this remnant I have found.

TOWN CLERKS.

Elkanah Day, 1785; John Tuthill, 1786; Stephen R. Bradley, 1787, '88, '89; John Sessions, 1790, '91, '92; Reuben Atwater, 1793 to '98; Gideon Warner, 1799 to 1803, '05, '07 to '09; William C. Bradley, 1804, '06; Sylvester Sage, 1810, '12, '14, '16, '18, '20, '22, '24, '26, '28, '30, '34, '36, '40; Timothy Field, 1811, '13, '15, '17, '19, '21, '23, '25, '27, '29, '31, '33, '35, '37, '39, '41, '43; Pliny Safford, 1842, '44, '46, '48, '52, '54, '56, '58, '60, '62; Daniel Campbell, 1845, '47, '49, '51; N. T. Sheafe, 1850; Peyton Ranney, 1853, '55; Homer Goodhue, 1857, '59, '61, '63, '65, '67, '69; S. S. Stoddard, 1864, '70 to '81; Henry C. Lane, 1882 to 1885, present incumbent.

[It will be seen in the above list that Sylvester Sage and Timothy Field were alternately every other year town clerk for 30 successive years; Sage in all the years an even number; Field in all the years an odd number, and one year after Sage had surrendered the field, and that one year over the number of Sage, not the successive year, but in the next year of an odd number; Field receiving the honor of holding the pen of the town one year the longest. Pliny Safford steps in when Sage drops out and holds the ground every other year for 22 years, save one, when a Sheafe drops in his field one year—plucked out the next. In 1870, the idea of permanency of the candidate in office first prevailed. S. S. Stoddard is retained, the first man for two successive years in the office, for 11 years. The present town clerk is serving his fourth successive year.—ED.]

POSTMASTERS.

In early days, Hon. J. D. Bradley was postmaster, but at what date is not known. Dr. Pliny Safford was postmaster from about 1830 to 1856; Belinda Lovejoy was his predecessor, but for how many years is not known. After Pliny Safford, Henry C. Lane served to 1860; then Clark Chase until 1870; then Austin Goodridge until 1885, and now B. F. Sleeper is postmaster.

The present population is 1377; present grand list, $8548.44.

SCHOOL SUPERINTENDENTS.

Past Superintendents: Rev. Alfred Stevens, Henry Morse, John B. Morse, Rev. P. T. Barnard; Present: Dr. W. L. Hoisington.

THE ARMY BOYS BURIED IN THE EAST PARISH AND IN THE NEW CEMETERY.

Artemas Ellis, Ambrose Fairbrother, Oscar Parker, Milton Pierce, Roswell Whitney, Ithamar Richardson, Peter Good, John Keach.

The bounties and expenses of the war of the rebellion amounted to about $27,000.

HON. EDMUND BURKE.

BY M. E. GODDARD, OF NORWICH.

Edmund Burke was born at Westminster, Jan. 23, 1809, and died at Newport, N. H., Jan. 25, 1882. He was the son of Elijah Burke, and the sixth of a family of 9 children.

He pursued classical studies under Chief Justice Bellows, of Walpole, N. H., and studied law with Hon. Wm. C. Bradley, of Westminster.

Immediately after his admission to the bar he removed to N. H., where he practiced his profession and edited a newspaper, settling at Newport, the county seat of Sullivan county. He was elected to Congress at the March election, 1839, and served as a representative, 1840-'46. For a time he edited a Democratic newspaper at Nashville, Tenn. He was Commissioner of Patents under Gen. Polk's administration.

During the remainder of his life he resided at Newport and his counsel and services were in great request as a patent lawyer. He was esteemed one of the first authorities in the country in all that relates to the subject of patents.

The facts stated, I have taken from a biographical sketch of Hon. Edmund Burke, in a pamphlet lately printed at Concord, N. H., by the Republican Press Association of N. H., and containing the proceedings of that Association at their 14th and 15th annual meetings. Reference may be had to said pamphlet for fuller details concerning Mr. Burke.

DR. WILLIAM MAY

died at his residence in Palmyra, N.Y., Sept. 10, 1865, aged 57. He was a son of the late Eleazer May, of Westminster, at which place he was born in 1808. He entered Yale College at fourteen, passing an examination that exhibited a rare preparation and intellectual development. He graduated with the honors of that institution. He commenced the study of medicine with Dr. Alpheus Fletcher, of Cavendish, completing his studies in the Berkshire Medical College, at Pittsfield, Mass. He practiced a number of years with Dr. Fletcher. In 1831, he came, says the Palmyra Courier, to Palmyra, and was many years a partner with the late Dr. D. D. Hoyt in a successful practice. Since the death of the latter he continued his services here, and outside of his profession was esteemed as a gentleman of intelligence and brilliancy among the educated of his class. He left a wife and three children.

Before his removal to Palmyra, he practiced several years after first receiving his diploma at Berkshire, with Dr. Fletcher, his first instructor in his profession.

JAMES MAY,

a prominent citizen of Westminster, died April, 1877, aged 79. He was a brother-in-law of ex-Governor Ryland Fletcher.

REV. ISAIAH SHIPMAN, born in town, Oct. 15, 1810, was Advent pastor at Sugar Hill, N. H., in 1845; called to Worcester, Mass., 1850; health failing, returned to Sugar Hill in 1851; remained there till 1867, and and then took charge at Waterbury, Vt. till 1869, when he gave up his charge and went South a year. In 1870, he settled in Lisbon, N. H., where he died of consumption, April 25, 1882. He left a widow, two sons and four daughters. One daughter married Hon. Wm. P. Dillingham, of Waterbury; one son, C. H. Shipman, is a shoe-dealer at Montpelier. Rev. Mr. Shipman was highly esteemed in his denomination as a preacher. [From obituary.]

BARNEY GRANTEES.

Joseph and Jonathan Barney (page 564). We have the following from Mayor Barney, of Stowe, Vt.:

The way the Barneys came into Vermont strange enough is by Joseph Barney, of Taunton, or Rehoboth, buying, with others, the town of Westminster of the Governor of Massachusetts. No Barney, however, ever lived in Westminster, but almost in every other town. The first settlement I know of in the State was made by a Barney, on an island near Brattleboro, 1741 (or 9). He left and I have not been able to trace him.

I have the names of their wives and children, marriages, births and deaths, from the town clerk of Rehoboth. Hon. W. W. Barney, lately member of the Legislature from Guilford, has every record down to this day of Capt. John Barney's family. I have also much about the Grow family; they came from Pomfret, Ct.

Gov. Chittenden's daughter, that married Thos. Barney, came to Arlington married, so I suppose they must have been married in Salisbury, Ct. (Litchfield County). We do not yet know the name of this Thomas' father but presume it was Joseph Barne (the old way of spelling our name) of Ashford, near Pomfret, Ct. (Windham County). If not, it was a descendant of Mary Danforth Barney, of Taunton, named after her brother Thomas, of Norwich, Ct., grand-niece of Nicholas Constantine was descended from Elizabeth ——— of Swansea, or West Haven, Wales, a great friend of Roger Williams (Felt's Hist. of Salem, 263). The peculiarities of Uranius' father, as mentioned in your history, came in with the marriage of Joseph Barney to Constance Sandries (or Sanders as the name is written also) grand-parents of Constantine, whose mother was Elsie Wheaton, of the celebrated family of that name.

—ED.

Page 39: The day was one of the loveliest in June, a day of joyful re-union. Former pastors, absent members of the church, former residents of the place; a goodly representation from the West Parish church; former pastors: Rev. S. S. Arnold, of Ascutneyville, whose venerable form spoke the near approach of fourscore years; Rev. W. H. Gilbert, Norwalk, Ct., pastor of the church 20 years ago; Rev. A. B. Foster, from Orange, Mass. Clergymen and friends from abroad beside the orator of the day, Rev. P. H. White, with Historical Sermon, and the venerable historian of the West Parish; the venerable Rev. Amos Foster, from neighboring Putney; Revs. G. H. DeBevoise, Walpole, N. H.; Levi Loring, Saxton's River; J. C. Chandler, Lewis Grout, West Brattleboro; C. L. Piper, West Townshend; Mr. Moore, Dummerston; Nelson Bishop, Windsor; Rev. L. C. Dickenson, M. E. Presiding Elder, and Rev. W. H. Wright, of Bellows Falls. There were also present Judge Fuller, of Saratoga, N. Y., and his brother from Hardwick, Vt., the oldest baptized children of the church, known to be living; one aged 75, one 73 years, after an absence of 70 years, returned to visit the spot that gave them birth, and join in celebrating the festal day.

A veil of sadness was thrown over the occasion in the lamented death of Dr. Safford, whose remains were followed to their resting place upon the afternoon of the preceding day. He had almost reached the age of 80 years; had been 35 years an honored member of the church; 31 years had held the office of Deacon, and had looked forward to the occasion, which would have been a season of much enjoyment to him, had he been spared to see it.

At the appointed hour, at church, all available space was filled, and many unable to gain admission within, occupied carriages at the windows outside.

SERVICES.—Voluntary, "The Lord is in His Holy Temple;" reading of the Scriptures, by past Pastor Foster; Invocation, by present Pastor Fairbanks; Anthem, "How Lovely is Zion." Rev. P. H. White, former resident of Westminster, preached the sermon—one hour long—"But call to remembrance the former days." Heb. x., 32.

BRIEF EXTRACTS FROM THE SERMON.

The hundred years during which this church has had existence, have constituted the most memorable century in the history of the world; with the sole exception of that in which Christ came from heaven to earth to make atonement for the sins of men. Events of unparalleled magnitude have succeeded each other with unprecedented rapidity, "as if," to use the language of an eminent Scotch writer, "they had come under the influence of that law of gravitation, by which falling bodies increase in speed as they descend, according to the squares of the distances." Within that period, our own country has emerged from the condition of a weak and dependent colony, has passed through one long and bloody war to achieve a national existence, and a tenfold bloodier one to preserve that existence and make it worth preserving; and, having extended its territory from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and increased its population from less than three millions to more than thirty-three, it stands to-day equal to any of the empires of the other continent, if not superior to the greatest of them in all that constitutes true greatness.

What cause for gratitude to God has this Church, not merely that it has had existence for a century, but that it has existed in such a century, and has been identified to some extent with the great movements of "such a time as this."

Not to dwell longer upon the general subject, though the theme is a fascinating one,—we come to that which is the specific duty, and enjoyment too, of this hour; to "call to remembrance the former days," in which the fathers of this Church laid the foundations of many generations, and to put on record the facts of its history as fully and accurately as the materials at our disposal will enable us to do. It is to be regretted that the records for nearly the whole first quarter of the century long since disappeared, and that the lack of them can be but partially supplied by less authoritative documents and by tradition.

As long ago as 1736, the first steps were taken for the establishment of the institutions of the Gospel in this place. In that year, the legislature of Massachusetts, supposing that its jurisdiction extended as far north as this, and much farther, granted "township Number One," as it was then called, to a number of persons resident in various towns in Massachusetts and Connecticut. By the terms of the charter, the grantees were required to build and furnish, within three years, "a convenient meeting-house for the public worship of God, and settle a learned orthodox minister." In June, 1737, a highway, ten rods wide, was surveyed and located on a line coincident with that of the main street in this village, and extending northwardly till it struck the river, a burying-ground was established on the land now occupied for that purpose, "and the meeting-house plat is fixed in the middle of the aforesaid ten rods highway right against the twenty-fourth lot," where in fact a house was afterwards built. A few persons moved into the wilderness and began a settlement, but the establishment of the Northern boundary of Massachusetts so far South as to leave Number One out of that State discouraged the settlers, and the breaking out of the Cape Breton war led them entirely to abandon the enterprise. In 1751, the settlement of the town was again attempted, and in 1754 or '5 it was again abandoned, for fear of the Indians who had recently made an attack on Charlestown, N. H., and carried several of the inhabitants into captivity. It was not till 1761 that such measures were taken as secured a permanent settlement. From that time the population rapidly increased, and at the expiration of ten years Westminster was the most populous town in Eastern Vermont.

This Church was organized by a council consisting of representatives of the churches in Charlestown, Keene, Walpole, Westmoreland, and Winchester, New Hampshire; Northfield, and Warwick, Mass.; and Abington, Connecticut. Of the 300 persons, or more, who then constituted the population of the town, only nine were found ready to be constituted a church.

At this first ordination, Rev. Micah Lawrence, of Winchester, N. H., made the opening prayer; Rev. Mr. Hedge, the ordaining prayer; Rev. Bulkley Olcott, of Charlestown, N. H., gave the charge; Rev. Clement Sumner, of Keene, made the prayer after the charge; and Rev. Thomas Fessenden, of Walpole, N. H., gave the right hand of fellowship. It does not appear that any sermon was preached. . . . If there was it was probably preached by the candidate himself, as was the custom a century ago. . . .

By an act of the Legislature in 1787, towns were authorized to levy taxes upon the land for the purpose of building houses of worship . . . they designed mainly to promote the more rapid settlement and increase the value of the lands . . . this design was recognized in the preamble of the statute. In 1783, at a session held in Westminster, the Legislature authorizes the towns or parishes not only to build meeting-houses, but also to support the preaching of the Gospel by taxes assessed, as well upon the polls and other ratable estate of the inhabitants, as upon the lands . . . the parish and the town were identical, and all the property was liable to contribute for religious purposes according to the vote of the majority.

Speaking of the old meeting-house, "The pews nearest the pulpit were the first built and were occupied by those whose social rank was the highest. Gen. Stephen R. Bradley occupied the wall-pew next the pulpit, on the right hand of the minister, and John Norton, with his numerous daughters, had the corresponding pew on the left. The front pew on the right of the central aisle, was the minister's pew, and directly opposite, was the pew of the Hon. Mark Richards."

Among the converts of the revival of 1838, was Erastus S. Holton, who afterwards employed in the service of God a large measure of the remarkable energy and business ability with which he had before served the world, and whose abundant labors in the cause of temperance and Sabbath Schools entitle him to be held in long and grateful remembrance. Since 1809, the whole period in which the church has been without a stated minister, does not amount to a year and a half; 382 have united by profession, 168 by letter—550 in all; from which deduction must be made for persons who have united more than once. Of all these, less than one-fifth still remain resident members of the church. . . . The fathers and mothers have rested from their labors. They who toiled side by side in the Christian work, and stood shoulder to shoulder in the Christian warfare, have received a gracious release from labor and conflict. Only here and there one, who in strength of manhood or the zeal of womanhood, have stemmed the current of life, or bore the burden and heat of the day, during the first half century of the church's existence, remains to tell us of the former days. We rejoice to see here to-day a venerable father in the ministry, who as long ago as 1810 gave himself in the prime of life to God and this church, and who, for nearly 60 years, has watched over it and prayed for it, and, more than once or twice, has been the instrument in God's hands of its deliverance from declension and impending death; and a mother in Israel, who became a member in 1811, and who, as she looks backward two generations to her grandfather, Ephraim Ranney, and forward two generations, to her grandchildren, children of this church, can testify in the fullness of her soul, that God is a God that keepeth covenant with His people and with their children and their children's children unto the third and fourth, and even to the fifth generation . . .

Upon some of us the lengthened shadows of life's evening hours are already falling, and the day will soon be gone. To some the sun seems to ride high in mid-heaven. The dewy freshness and fragrance of the morning rests upon the pathway of others. But not one of us shall take part in the anniversary which this church will celebrate a hundred years hence. What changes will then have taken place. We send forth our greetings to those who will then celebrate the two hundredth anniversary of the Church and may God grant that we shall look down upon that scene from the upper glory."

Psalm.

Rev. Dr. Stevens introduced.

[We shall give but brief extracts of the address of Rev. Dr. Stevens of the West Parish—the substance of his discourse being embraced in his particular history that follows, of the West Parish.]

MR. STEVENS.

"We are admonished our words should be those of a daughter to her mother in good old age, glad to hear of the prosperity of her child. You will allow us to pass by all her faults. . . . We have not in them departed from the Articles of Faith and Covenant you gave us, when, in 1779, you formally divided your original parish, giving to us what lies west of the mountain that divided the town. I say west of the mountain, which means more than the narrow strip of Westminster west of that ridge. This place was the center of worship, as well as of commerce previous to the Revolution. The congregation worshipping on this plain was then gathered from as far west as Brookline and Athens. The late Theophilus Crawford of Putney, who spent his childhood and youth on the farm some half a mile west of the one now occupied by Deacon Asahel Goodell, on the old road leading from this place to Newfane, said there were families residing in Brookline, who were regular attendants on Sabbath worship in this place, in the early history of the town. They passed his father's house on Sabbath morning, the mother and the little ones on horseback, often three on a horse, the father and larger boys and girls on foot, sometimes with bare feet; making a journey out and back not far from 20 miles, to attend worship. The brave old man asked, as he made the statement, 'What would the boys now think of that?'

About 1795, there was a Congregational church formed in Brookline, which must have been under the watch and care of the Westminster church for years. Her name first appears among the churches, Oct. 30, 1797, by a delegate in the Consociation by the name of Ebenezer Wellman. From this time she disappears from notice until 1819, after which she is quite regularly reported until 1829. In 1821, she asked the Consociation if it was proper for them to employ Elder Wellman to preach to them and break bread, he having changed his sentiments from the peculiarities of the Baptist, and was ready to fellowship our churches. 'Answered in the affirmative.'

In 1797, there was a Congregational Church in Athens. She reports in the Consociation only once,—September 25th, 1798, by the name of Rev. Joseph Bullen, a former minister of this church, who, after leaving this church, served in Athens for a few years in the treble office of minister, farmer and miller. This church never reports herself after 1799. Probably what few members there were became connected with the church in the West Parish in Westminster, which was formed in that year.

The families from which this church was formed, were, first, the children of the early families of this part of the town, who seem to have had the "Western fever," enough to carry them as far as the West Parish. Among these were the two sons of your first deacon, Ephraim Ranney; Elijah and Ephraim, and a William Ranney of another family, Aaron Gould and his brother, Abiel Carpenter, and Levi Harlow. Secondly, the Goodells:—Asahel and Edward, and a relative of the same name, from Ashfield, Conn., then Mendon. Ephrain Wilcox from the same State. Thirdly, the Hitchcocks, Heli, Eldad, Elisha and Zadoek, from Brimfield, Mass. Fourthly, Ebenezer Goodhue, son of the first minister of Putney. Fifthly, Capt. Robert Miller and the Tuthills from Long Island. Sixthly, about the year 1795, the emigration from Cape Cod to the parish that began, led by Atherton Hall, Esq., with his two sons, Atherton and Peter, then married men; followed soon by Matthias Gorham, with his five sons,—Isaac, Matthias 2d, David, William and James. Levi Crowell, Elisha Barry, Joseph Hamblin, the Hallets, Howes and Gideons. These families, with their sons which I have mentioned, had daughters to match. They soon paired off, and by a law of progress sacredly regarded in those days, multiplied on a fearful ratio. Every nook and corner of the parish was soon full. There was a house in almost every place where the soil was deep enough for a cellar, as may be seen by passing over the sheep pastures now on the ridge that divides Westminster from Brookline and Athens. The church was full every Sabbath. The school houses in the parish were crowded. It is said three families sent thirty scholars one day and had a large reserve force at home."

For the remainder of this happy church history, see history of the West Parish.

After the address from the West Parish, prayer, singing, benediction, procession, dinner, toasts.

SENTIMENTS AND SPEECHES.

1. THE ORATOR OF THE DAY—Though not Westminster born, yet we claim him as an honored son. May his history be as illustrious as that of Pliny of old, to whom the generations to come may delight to refer for the facts of the past.

Rev. P. H. White responded.

2. Reminiscences of the early families of Westminster.

"Father Stevens" responded.

3. We are favored with the presence of one who has been prominently identified with the history of this Church, and for whose prayers and self-denying efforts in her behalf, she would express her deep debt of gratitude today.

Father Arnold responded with feeling. He was a native of the town of almost fourscore years; he would not be here long and did not desire to; but could still remember things which occurred when he was but three years old. He spoke of families formerly there, but now all gone. He was educated at Middlebury, where he made choice of his profession for life to work for God and religion, and had never regretted that choice, only that he might have been more faithful. He spoke with tenderness of the memory of the Rev. Sylvester Sage, and of those who were ambassadors of Christ.

The remarks of the venerable man were received with the most profound respect and attention.

4. WESTMINSTER—Honored as one of the first settlements of the Green Mountain State. May she have in history an unblemished page. May her sons and her daughters prove worthy of their illustrious sires, first in the cause of truth, foremost in every good word and work.

Rev. A. B. Foster endorsed this sentiment. He spoke of the beautiful scenery with which that place was blessed in such rich profusion; how he first came to Westminster, was traveling with his wife in Windham county, one dark night; had sought in vain for a place of refuge for the night, for there were no taverns there; inquired for a minister's house,—they were generally a hospitable class, and kept very good taverns, as it was not customary for ministers to use tobacco or strong drink [laughter], finally brought up at the house of their venerable friend, Father Arnold, which resulted in his coming to that place as their former pastor.

5. THE MINISTERS AND MISSIONARIES—who have either directly or indirectly descended from families connected with this Church. One of their representatives we are happy to meet here to-day.

Responded to by Rev. Mr. Grout.

The following by Rev. A. Stevens:

6. THE PASTOR OF THIS CHURCH—Favored in the beautiful location of the place, and the united sympathies of the people of his charge. May he be abundantly prospered in his work.

Responded to by the President of the day.

7. THE CHURCH IN WEST WESTMINSTER—Honored in the munificent gift of more than her present membership to churches in other States. Having sent out a goodly number of influential men she has kept a good reserve at home.

Hon. Homer Goodhue, of Westminster West, responded pleasantly; subject, matrimonial alliances between the two parishes.—[Cheers.]

8. THE HOLY BIBLE—A treasure which each may call his own, yet 'tis the heritage of the race. Wherever it goes it scatters Heavenly blessings in its path.

Rev. Mr. Gilbert spoke of the Bible agency with which he was connected; of the time when he was pastor of this church; of one who united with the church at the age of 90 years.

9. Favored is that Church which can combine her talent with her piety in serving the Lord.

Judge Ira Goodhue was called out. He referred to the first settlers, their great physical strength, instanced one woman who could take up a barrel of cider by the chimes and drink at the bung. [Laughter.] He did not claim that this had much to do with religion, but it was the kind of people that made good Christians and citizens, and he hoped some of this vigor and vitality would be handed down to posterity.

10. ALL HONOR TO THE HOARY HEAD—The connecting link between the present and the past. What changes have taken place during the last hundred years! What improvements shall we make for a hundred years to come?

Capt. James Titcomb responded for the old people, and said that the story of his life was nearly told, as had been freshly illustrated yesterday, to which event he alluded with much feeling.*

*The funeral of Dea. Pliny Safford, the first name on the Committee of Arrangements for this Centennial anniversary, whose death had occurred June 8, 1867, but three days before.

11. THE PRESS—The faithful chronicler of current events and the invaluable depository of materials for future history.

Geo. F. Houghton, Esq., of St. Albans, a native of Guilford, this county, responded: "When I see near me veteran editors, who are, at this moment, chronicling the events of this Centennial Jubilee (Rev. Mr. Bishop, A. N. Swain, of the Bellows Falls Times) I am surprised I should be called upon to respond to this sentiment. . . These Centennial celebrations are of general interest as well as of local importance. One jubilee paves the way for another, and it is a matter of no trifling moment that those celebrations, holden heretofore at Weston, Weathersfield, Bennington, Poultney, Middlebury and Vergennes, have stimulated town and State pride, and awakened an interest in local history, which cannot be abated.

If it be proper for me to express my hope or tender any advice, I would say that by printing the proceedings of this Centennial Celebration, you can best, in the language of Mr. White's text to-day, 'call to remembrance the former days.' Those who have been present will thank you. Posterity, which delights in details, will also thank you. The expense of such a publication will be small in comparison with the advantages to be derived. Such a publication will show your practical belief in the sentiment just read that 'the press is the faithful chronicler of current events and the invaluable repository of materials for future history.' "

12. THE ANCIENT HOUSE OF GOD—It has braved the storms of an hundred years. May it withstand the blasts of many an hundred years to come.

Prof. L. F. Ward said,—alluding to the building in which they were assembled:

"It has been preserved for an hundred years, and shows for itself whether it would last another hundred." It is sacred through its age and will be more so in time to come. Here, too, many worthies of Vermont have assembled as legislators. It was here Ethan Allen had been, and here (pointing to the old pulpit) is the old desk from which came the old-fashioned preaching which made the wicked quake. [Applause.] He saw no reason why the building could not be preserved for centuries to come, and hoped the people of Westminster would preserve it with all its chiseling and architecture."

There were others, clergymen, etc., friends from abroad, it would have been gratifying to have heard from, but for want of time the services were concluded at the hall by singing Old Hundred, in which the audience joined, and the procession then formed, re-proceeded to the church, where, with befitting ceremonies, they united in celebrating the Lord's Supper. Thus closed the ceremonies from 10 A. M. to nearly 5 P. M., a day to be remembered in the history of the Church and treasured up in the chambers of the hearts of many.

CENTENNIAL ANNIVERSARY

OF VERMONT INDEPENDENCE,

AT WESTMINSTER,

was celebrated 17 Jan., 1877, in the church near the site of the old Westminster Court House; the people in the East Parish and from the West Parish filling the large church to overflowing, and the sacred house, beautiful for the occasion with flowers, evergreens and mottoes.

P. F. Barnard presided over the meeting; Rev. Dr. Stevens, of the West Parish, opening the ceremonies by prayer; a record of the Proceedings of the Westminster Convention and declaration were read by John B. Morse, a lineal descendant of one of the delegates who framed it.

Henry Clark, of Rutland, orator of the evening, spoke happily for an hour. Letters were read from Gov. Fairbanks, and Hon. E. P. Walton, President of the State Historical Society, of congratulation, and regretting not being able to attend.

Rev. Dr. Stevens brought forward the fact that the whole territory of Vermont was added to New York in 1769 for the consideration of the annual payment of one raccoon skin.

Ralph S. Safford gave the location and occupants of all the houses in Westminster 100 years ago.

Other speakers made short and pleasant speeches. All passed off successfully.

WESTMINSTER MONUMENT

TO FRENCH AND HOUGHTON.

1775—1872—1873.

1775: To the memory of William French and Daniel Houghton, shot in the Westminster Court House, March ye 13th, 1775.

1872: To the honor of the Legislature of Vermont, of this session, who voted an appropriation of money to be expended in erecting a monument at Westminster in commemoration of these said patriotic young men, the first martyrs of Vermont Independence.

1873: Nov. 6, was inaugurated the monument at Westminster—a day of honor on the tablet of her history.

Under the base was placed a record, signed by H. C. Lane, one of the selectmen of the town, stating that the appropriation for the monument, as then erected, was made by the Legislature of 1872, including also the date of erection. This fine monument is of Rye-gate Blue Mountain granite.

WESTMINSTER MONEY.

LETTER OF REV. MR. STEVENS.

. . . . I cannot tell you much about the paper money of colonial times. I had a few bills, but put them into the museum at Dartmouth College. I think they were struck off in Spooner's office. (This is hearsay.) There was an old Mr. John Gould living in Windham when I came here. He was a printer in the office. He had a quantity of the type with which the paper was printed. He gave a few to me. I have made inquiry for the plate from which the money was struck, but in vain.

As to the money, I was told by the late Henry Stevens that every bill of the Westminster money was redeemed in full, which every other State failed to do. He would be good authority for the truth of the fact.

This Mr. John Gould, to whom I have referred, has grand-children living in the county, of whom I have inquired, who understand that their grandfather was printer in the office of Spooner at the date of the money. This is tradition.

[Our "Bank of Continental Money" was presented by Henry Stevens, the Vermont antiquary, whom we have also heard affirm what Rev. Mr. Stevens has quoted, that Vermont redeemed every dollar of her Continental money, and was the only State in the Union that did it.

We have two fresh bills of the old Westminster money for seventy-five cents. They are half the size of an ordinary dollar bill of the present day. " $\frac{3}{4}$ " stands in a slightly oblique circle in each corner, within which, round the sides, runs a chain border, within each alternate link a cluster of roses, and within each other alternate link

"LXXV." Each border has six links. The printed inscription :

to pay _____ or bearer
SEVENTY-FIVE CENTS, at their OFFICE OF DISCOUNT & DEPOSITE at WESTMINSTER, on demand

PATENT.

We have, also, a Westminster money half dollar bill, of the same size as the "LXXV," in whose chain border of links alternates with the link of roses the "HALF D" link; and "FIFTY C." stands in the lower right hand corner.

And we have one whole, grand, Continental Westminster-Money sheet, uncut, as it came from the Spooner press. The width of the sheet is that of the length of an ordinary \$10 bill of to-day, the depth of the sheet that of four bills with free margin. At the top of the sheet is a "1.75" bill; next below, a "1.50" bill; third, a "1.25," and at the foot of the two bills " $\frac{1}{2}$ "—"HALF D." and " $\frac{3}{4}$ "—"LXXV." The bills have both marks.—ED.]

CORRIGENDA.—The statement on page 595 that the Westminster Monument was raised by means devised at the Vermont anniversary at Westminster in 1877, is a mistake. It was talked of at Westminster in 1870, it could be so done. Mr. Fairbanks left the State in 1871—and correcting his proof in Connecticut, 15 years after, came to the line, "When Vermont shall meet at Westminster in 1877." It did not read well fifteen years after. He changed it to, "when Vermont in 1877 met at Westminster," supposing it had been done as talked of when he left Westminster,—and it passed the press before observed. So difficult is a perfect accuracy on local matters, who would run a historical publication without a "Corrigenda?"

Also, page 596, line 23, it should read Mary Crosman, and line 25, Richards for Richard.

WESTMINSTER WEST.

BY REV. A. STEVENS.

The West Parish of Westminster is that part of Westminster lying west of the mountain that divides the town. It was set off, as a parish, by vote of the town, in 1785. The division was made legal by the action of the Legislature of the State, in 1797. An additional act of the Legislature, in 1800, appoints that the town and freeman's meetings of the town, shall be held alternately, from year to year, in each of the parishes.

The parish line of the town, commencing on the northern boundary of Putney, at the southwest corner of the farm commonly called the Grout place, runs northerly to the northeast corner of the farm formerly owned by Perez Clark, then westerly to the southwest corner of the farm now owned by Addison Dunham, then northerly to Rockingham.

Before the definite action of the town, making the division, it was regarded a distinct parish. In 1784, the town appointed a committee of three from each parish, as a committee to build a meeting-house in the West Parish. The committee from the West Parish were: Lieut. Wm. Crook, Wm. Goodell, and Lieut. David Heaton. There is also a vote appropriating money for the support of preaching in the parish.

The question of a distinct town organization for the parish was early raised. In 1803, the town voted to that effect, and appointed a committee to lay the subject before the Legislature, and secure an organization that should make the West Parish a town, called Westbury.

Who was the first settler in the parish is not certainly known.

JABEZ PERRY,

from Rehoboth, Mass. (now Seekonk), had built a log-house on the land now owned by Geo. A. Goodell, and moved into it, as early as 1762. His eldest child, was born this year. So far as is known she was the first child born in the parish. About the same time, settled on the farm now owned by D. C. Gorham. His oldest child, Diadame, supposed to have been born in town, was born in 1763. There are no dates by which the settlement of families can be traced to an earlier period.

POLLY PERRY*

EPHRAIM WILCOX

FRANCIS HOLDEN,

from Shirley, Mass., came into the parish in 1755 or '56, and built a log-butt on the farm now owned by Jerome Holden, where he lived, mostly alone, for some 15 or 20 years. His grist-mill was a hollow log and a large block of wood hung on a spring-pole, to pound the corn-meal. In this way he made his meal until a grist-mill was built at Chesterfield, N. H., some 12 miles distant from his home. This distance he carried his grain on his back, and returned with his meal. The only road was marked trees. The grindstone, of lime-stone, made by himself, is still kept on the farm. By using sand for grit, it did good service in sharpening the axes that felled the primitive forests in the neighborhood. After living in this primitive way (1801), for 20 years, and having reached the age of forty, he married Miss Abigail Clawson, of Shirley, Mass., by whom he had 13 children.

*Since the above was written, I learn that Polly Perry was born the year before Jabez Perry, her father, came to town.—A. S.

The earliest record of a death in the parish, is in 1774—Ephraim Wilcox, jr., aged 2 years, and Jemima Wilcox, aged 7 years. Their graves are found a few rods to the east of the school-house, in District No. 1. Large forest trees have grown over their graves.

After the close of the French and Indian wars, in 1760, the fears of Indian depredations ceased, in a measure, and settlements were, more readily, made back from the forts on the river. Before 1770, there were evidently quite a number of families in the parish. The names and history of many of them are lost.

RANNEY, HEATON, AND HOLT.

Ephraim Ranney, jr., David Heaton and Jotham Holt, about the year 1768, made an opening in the forests on the farms near the present site of the church. They were young men, and for some time messed together in a log-house built by Ranney, a few feet south of the house now occupied by William B. Cutting. They made their own porridge and ate out of a common dish.

Mr. Heaton was a passionate man, and when insulted would leave the house. When the porridge was a little short of their wants, Ranney and Holt had only to insult their mess-mate, and they had the dish to themselves. This state of things did not long continue. Mr. Ranney brought to the log-house, in 1771, a wife, and never had any wish, afterwards, to be left alone at the table.

Mr. Heaton built for himself on the farm now owned by Eldad H. Harlow, where he lived and died.

Mr. Holt built a house, near the brook, to the east of the church. A rude stone in the forest, near the school house in District No. 1, informs us that he died in 1775. The farms now owned by Ebenezer Hall, Horace Goodhue and Mr. Driscoll were settled before 1770, but who began the settlement cannot now be determined.

ICHOBOD IDE,

from Rehobath, Mass. (now Seekonk), was the proprietor of the lots now owned by David Gorham and Geo. A. Goodell, in 1770. His name appears as one of the first settlers in Chester, in 1764. The year he came to the town is not known, probably about 1770. Jabez Perry, his son-in-law, had settled on the farm north of his as early as 1762. He had sons, Ichobod, jr., Joseph, Jesse, Israel and John, most of whom settled on farms near him. The name was familiar in the early history, but has disappeared entirely in later years. Only a few families in the parish have any traces of the Ide blood.

RANNEY—CRAWFORD.

Elijah Ranney and James Crawford made settlements in the south part of the parish as early as 1771 or '72. The former on the farm now owned by Henry P. Ranney, his grandson. The latter on land now owned by William Brailey, lying on the old road leading from Elijah Goodell's to George A. Goodell's. He was a soldier in the Revolution, evidently a resolute, determined man, and true patriot. The news of the battle of Lexington reached him at sundown. He started the next morning before sunrise to join the army, leaving his son, Theophilus, but 9 years of age, with his mother, to clear the burnt field and get in the grain. He obtained a furlough of a few weeks in autumn to gather the harvest. This done, he left again for the army, leaving the mother and son alone for the winter of 1776.

That son, when nearly 90 years of age, said, "I chopped the wood and drove the steers. Mother helped load, and we kept warm." Noble mother and boy. Their names shall never die, nor their deeds be untold.

NATHANIEL DOUBLEDAY

settled in the parish before 1770, the year is not known, but it is probable that he was one of the first settlers in this part of the town. He was one of the jury of inquest on the body of Wm. French, who was killed by the British troops, at Westminster, Mar. 13, 1775. The jury roll says he resided on lot No. 6, fifth range of 80-acre lots. An old cellar discloses the spot where his house stood, now far away from any house or road.

The farm now owned by Reuben Miller, was first improved by his maternal grandfather.

REUBEN ROBERTSON,

came from Attleboro, Mass. The year is not known. It appears that a family of that name came to town quite early, at least some years before the Revolution.

Nathaniel Robinson commenced on the farm now known as the Eaton place. Noah, another brother, on the farm now owned by Mr. Church. Noah and Reuben are known to have been soldiers in the Revolution.

The farms now owned by Harlan Densmore and E. R. Goodell, were settled before 1775. The former by Wm. Crook, the latter by a Mr. Fuller, both of whom, with a son of Mr. Fuller, were soldiers in the Revolution. The son was killed at the battle of Bennington.

It is probable that other farms in the south and central part of the parish were settled before the Revolution, but the names of leaders in the settlement cannot now be determined.

RAPID INCREASE OF THE PARISH.

From 1775 to 1780, the population of the parish increased rapidly. Elisha Hitchcock, Heli Hitchcock, Eldad Hitchcock and Aaron Hitchcock, from Brimfield, Mass., Edward Goodell, from Monson, Mass., Jabez Goodell, from Mansfield, Ct., and Moses Goodell, from Canterbury, Ct., had settled in the parish before 1780. Each of these persons, it is believed, made the first openings on the farms where they located. They all brought up large families, and lived and died on the farms, where they put their log-houses when they came to town.

BENJAMIN SMITH,

from Taunton, Mass., who settled on the farm now owned by E. B. Hall, and from Attleboro, Mass., who settled on the farm now owned by Mr. Church, were in the parish previous to 1775, and both were soldiers in the Revolution.

NATHANIEL ROBINSON,

JOHN TUTHILL,

a native of Southhold, Long Island, about the year 1786, settled on the farm now owned by Daniel Goddard. The year these persons came to town, or whether they first broke the forests on their farms, cannot now be determined.

The farms owned by Horace Goodhue and Ebenezer Hall, are known to have been early settled, but by whom it is not known. The log-houses of the first settlers had disappeared and framed houses, of some years standing, had taken their place on them before 1795.

There was a large emigration from Cape Cod to the parish, led by

ATHERTON HALL,

in 1795, with his sons, Atherton and Peter, with their families, followed the next year by

BARNABAS AND SCOTTO CLARK

and their families. They made their journey in 14 days, with an ox-team.

The Clarks brought their gold to pay for their farms. Scotto his, in the centre of a tierce of salt. Barnabas expressed his through on the back of his oldest son, Joshua.

The Clarks were followed in 1798, by

MATTHIAS GORHAM,

with his 5 sons, Isaac, Matthias 2d, David, William and James.

PERRY, CROWELL, HAMBLIN AND HALLETS.

He was followed by Lewis Crowell, Elisha Perry, Joseph Hamblin and Howes and Gideon Hallet, all of whom had large families. During the first 15 years of the century, the natural increase of the population of the parish, was abundant. The largest population was between 1815 and '25. Since 1830, there has been a gradual but constant decrease. In 1870, there was not, probably, more than half of the population of 1825. The population of 1880 was 480.

MORAL AND RELIGIOUS HISTORY.

From the first settlement of the parish there have been good families, lovers and defenders of good things. Many of them were but a few generations removed from the Puritans, and brought with them, to the forests of the parish, their doctrines and habits. Sabbath began at sundown on Saturday, and ended at sundown on Sunday. All were expected to worship somewhere on the Sabbath. From the earliest settlement of the parish most of the families attended meeting in the east part of the town. Their interests were identified with the settlers there, as they were dependent upon them, to a great extent, for a commerce. This was their only communication with the world outside of the deep vallies of the parish. Many years before the organization of the parish, the settlers held meetings by themselves, and moves were made, looking to an independent parish. They had deacon's meetings before they had any deacons, at which the sermons of the able divines of the preceding generation were read to the families gathered in some private house or barn, the good men taking the part for which their gifts and graces fitted them. Generally, Capt. David Heaton set the tune to the psalm. Ephraim Wells led in prayer. The readers were more varied. All, doubtless, were attentive and benefited. It was a recognition of their dependence upon God, and an expression of gratitude to him for his blessings upon them, as a community, in their rude homes.

The early families in the parish were somewhat divided in their religious views. All, so far as they made any pretension to religion, were Congregationalists, but unfortunately some, "were dry, others wet, Congregationalists."

The families originating from Connecticut and Massachusetts believed, and built after the example of Plymouth Rock. Those from Eastern Connecticut and Long Island were Baptist. There was a large common Christian ground on which they could, and did, for years meet and worship together, but like the herdsmen of "Gezar and Isaac, they strove about water." This, doubtless, delayed somewhat, the definite organization of the parish. Though there were settlements in the parish as early as 1758 or '59, the first record of a meeting to consult for the support of the gospel among themselves, was in 1789, Jan. 10, "called by Elijah Ranney, on petition of the inhabitants of the parish." The votes at this meeting refer to previous action on the subject of supporting the gospel. It was voted:

"That allowance be made to Ephraim Wilcox, for money he had paid to Mr. Bullen for preaching, to be credited to him on the collection bill, to the amount of $11.00."

This and other votes assume the existence of a society with the Congregationalists, for the support of the gospel, prior to 1789.

The town voted, in 1784,

"To divide the money raised to build and repair meeting-houses, between the East and West part of the town, the division to be made as the Militia line runs."

The Congregational Society, at the meeting of the above date, voted to instruct their committee to lay out money raised, in connection with a committee of the Baptists, for supporting preaching in the parish. There was, then, a Baptist and a Congregational Society in the parish, for the support of the gospel, previous to 1789, and they divided their meetings between the two denominations. This continued down to 1799, when was organized by a colony from the church in the east part of the town.

BAPTISTS.

There was a Baptist Society, probably, in town some years before this. Most of their members resided in the West Parish. In 1784, over fifty of the inhabitants of the town, entered their names in the clerk's office, under a certificate, that they worshipped with the Baptists. Among these names is found that of Dea. Benjamin Smith, and Dea. Nathaniel Robinson, and other names, showing a large influence in the parish in favor of the Baptists, as early as 1784.

The date of the organization of the church is not known, neither can it be certainly determined that there was ever a Baptist church in town, distinct from the one in Rockingham, though it is quite probable that there was. Elder Oliver Gurnsey, who lived in the parish, and Elder Wellman, who lived in Brookline, were Baptist ministers, whose names appear often in the early history of the parish. They were uneducated men and scorned the need of preparation for preaching.

They opened their mouths for the Lord to fill, and pitied the preacher that depended on his manuscript. Here was another source of division in the parish, one party seeking an educated ministry, the other wishing for the gospel directly from the Lord, without any culture of the schools. "No man-made ministers" was the demand. The feeling that existed on this subject is clear from what took place at a funeral, in 1800. Mr. Emerson, the Congregational minister, and Mr. Gurnsey, the Baptist, met at a funeral. The latter was to preach on the occasion. He announced his text, and, as was usual, said, "The text has occurred to me since I came into the room. I shall speak from it as the Lord puts thoughts into my mind and words into my mouth." The sermon through, while the people were taking their last look at the corpse, Mr. Emerson complimented his Baptist brother for his sermon, and at the same time asked him if he had not preached from that text before? After some hesitation the answer came in a low voice, "I may have preached from it before. I think I have." The answer is repeated by Mr. Emerson, so that all can hear. "You say, then, you think you have preached from that text before," and, at the same time, added, "Have you not preached from that text many times before?" The low answer comes, "I do not know, but I may have preached frequently from the text; I am preaching in various places and cannot say how many times I have preached from it." The answer is repeated, so that all could hear, "You say, then, you do not know how many times you have preached from that text?" This did much to check the boasting about preaching without preparation.

The families from Cape Cod, to which reference has been made, were mostly of the standing order, as it was called. They were large families, and contained the material for a large increase of the population of the parish. This decided the history of the parish, from 1795, in favor of the Congregationalists. The Congregationalist ministers that are known to have preached in the parish, previous to the organization of the church in 1799, are Joseph Bullen, in 1788, Rev. Mr. Churchill, in 1790. In 1791, the society instructed their committee to lay out the money raised in hiring Mr. Freegrace Reynolds to preach on probation, if he could be obtained, or some other man if he could not. There is no evidence that Mr. Reynolds or any other man was obtained. In 1792, the society gave a formal call to Mr. Stephen Williams to become their minister and pastor. The call stipulates £150 settlement, to be paid in quarterly installments, at the end of the 1st, 2d, 3rd, and 4th years of his ministry, one-quarter cash in hand, the remainder in stock or grain, wheat at 5 shillings a bushel. Also a salary of £45, to be increased £5 a year until it amounted to £65, to be paid one-quarter in cash, the remainder in stock or grain. This call was not accepted.

It is clear from the doings of the society, from year to year, that they had only temporary supplies of preaching before 1800. The names of Mr. Wellman and Holman appear as ministers that were employed at different times, the former, a Baptist. Of Mr. Holman nothing is recorded but his name. The Baptists, too, depended upon a temporary supply for preaching. Beside Mr. Gurnsey and Wellman, above mentioned, there was one Wm. Bowles, a Baptist minister in town, in 1784, but it does not appear that he or any other person was ever settled as a pastor of the Baptist church in town.

The first pastor of the church was born Aug. 12, 1771, in Ashby, Mass., and graduated at Dartmouth, in 1798. He studied theology with Rev. Reed Paige, of Hancock, N. H., and Stephen Farrar, of New Ipswich, and was ordained at Westminster West, Feb., 18, 1800; was dismissed Mar. 9, 1804.

REV. REUREN EMERSON,

Sermon by Rev. Reid Paige, of Hancock, N. H.; ordaining prayer by Rev. Thomas Fessenden, of Walpole, N. H.; charge by Rev. Stephen Farrar, of New Ipswich, N. H.; fellowship, by Rev. Sylvester Sage, of the mother church, Westminster, a fellowship that has never been withdrawn.

The terms of this settlement were a salary of £100, to be paid one-half in cash, the remainder in produce, at cash price, which is the highest figure the society has ever reached in ministerial support. Mr. Emerson was of the old Hopkinsian type in theology, a clear-headed, determined man, a stickler for ministerial dignity, rather abrupt in his intercourse; his sermons were terse in style, somewhat personal, especially when anything occurred in the parish that affected himself. His wood, which the society had promised, failed one cold week. The congregation were treated the next Sabbath to a sermon from the text, "Where no wood is the fire goeth out." It was evident that the fire was in him, and the sermon, though it had gone out on his hearth. It warmed the whole parish so well that the good parson found his yard full of ox teams loaded with wood on Monday. His carriage loaned to a neighbor was returned injured. This brought out a sermon from the text, "Alas! master, for it was borrowed," so personal that it did more injury to him and the parish than was done to the carriage.

Mr. Emerson's ministry was short. He was dismissed by an ecclesiastical council, Mar. 9, 1804.

After he left the West Parish he was settled in Reading, Mass., where he remained until his death in good old age, an honored and useful minister.

Rev. Joseph Brown supplied the pulpit for nearly two years after Mr. Emerson. Of him little is remembered, only he was an old man, and somewhat absent-minded. His horse, which he was leading, slipped his halter, and went off in another direction. The good pastor did not discover the trick until he had tied the halter to the post at his door.

He was evidently familiar with the parishioners, so much, that they felt at liberty to joke him. One Peter Hall, known by all the parish as Uncle Peter, and famous for his jokes, met Parson Brown, one Monday morning, returning from the store with a birch broom in his hand, and hailed him, "good luck, Mr. Brown, this morning, sold all your brooms but one, haven't you?"

REV. TIMOTHY FIELD

was called by the church, Nov. 18, 1806, and installed Jan. 20, 1807. Sermon by Rev. Roswell Shurtleff, D.D.; prayer, Rev. Gersham Lyman, D.D.; charge, Rev. William Hall; fellowship, Rev. Sylvester Gage.

He was a native of East Guilford, Ct., (now Madison). Graduated at Yale, 1797. His ministry practically closed with the year 1834, but he was not formally dismissed until Mar. 31, 1835.

He was a man of noble form, quick in all his movements, a frank, smiling face; he made no display of learning, but was above ordinary ability and worth as a man and a scholar. His sermons were short, terse, delivered without gestures, but with the deepest emotion. He despised all hypocrisy, had no ministerial cant, and always enjoyed more than he could express, except by his tears and laughter. He believed the Bible fully, and preached it just as he found it, without any speculation.

He despised all display in the pulpit. To a certain young minister, who was conversing with him about sermons and the reasons why they were no more effective, he dryly said, "It would not be much credit to the Lord to convert sinner under such big sermons as the young ministers try to preach."

He was a Calvinist in his creed, but not an extremist; in politics, he was a Whig, and always voted and preached according to his views in face of all opposition. One of his parishioners once objected to his voting, because he was a minister of Christ, "whose kingdom was not of this world." His quick reply was: "You that belong to the devil's kingdom are the legal voters."

The parish was greatly improved under his ministry, in its moral and religious character. At the commencement of his ministry the church numbered only 56 members. There were received by profession during his pastorate, 344, 25 by letter. In the year 1825, the church reports in its association, 300 members. The years 1816, '24 and '31, were marked by powerful revivals of religion. The fruits of these revivals mostly united with the Congregational church, but many, it is known, united with the Baptist church at Saxton's River, called, after the year 1812, "The Baptist Church of Rockingham and Westminster."

It should be said here that a large number of families in the north part of the parish have always connected themselves in society at Saxton's River. Geographically, they belong there, which makes the West Parish of Westminster small in territory.

REV. PRESTON TAYLOR

succeeded Mr. Field as pastor of the church; installed Mar. 31, 1835; was dismissed Oct. 19, 1836.

REV. JUBILEE WELLMAN, his successor, was installed Mar. 6, 1838, and was dismissed Jan. 5, 1842. Mr. Wellman had not a collegiate education. He studied theology at Bangor, Me., where he graduated in 1823, was installed at Frankfort, Me., Sept. 17, 1824, dismissed Jan. 3, 1826; installed at Warner, N. H., Sept. 26, 1827; dismissed Feb. 15, 1837. After he left Westminster, he preached 2 years alternately in Cavendish and Plymouth, Vt., after which he preached 5 years in Cavendish alone. Was installed at Lowell, Vt., Oct. 17, 1850, where he remained until his death, Mar. 18, 1855. He was a well read theologian, strictly Calvinistic, very confident, sometimes dogmatic in stating his views; sensitive of his rights as a minister, and anxious about the honor of his office.

REV. ALFRED STEVENS,

the present pastor, was ordained Feb. 22, 1843. The whole number received into the church since its organization is 625 (1867). There have been 668 infant baptisms. By the first pastor, 60; by Mr. Brown, 45; Mr. Field, 464; Mr. Taylor, 13; Mr. Wellman, 16; the present pastor, 60. It will be seen by this that the prosperous periods of the church have been, when parents felt most the importance of dedicating their offspring to God in His church, according to apostolic usage, and the plain direction of Christ, to "let them come because they are of His kingdom."

The first deacons of the church were Elijah Ranney, a son of the first deacon, Ephraim Ranney, of the East Parish, and Edward Goodell. They were large men, of few words, of strong purpose, fast friends of their minister with whom they served the church, who sleeps with them in our cemetery.

Their successors were Elijah Ranney, Jr., a grandson of Dea. Ranney, of the East Parish, and Ebenezer

Goodhue, a grandson of the same by marriage. The former was slow in his plans and execution, the latter was hasty; both were good, determined men, and did not easily give up a measure they attempted to carry. The Scotchman's prayer was appropriate for them both: "O, Lord, keep me right, for thou knowest I cannot change."

THE FIRST MEETING-HOUSE.

The date of the building of the first meeting-house in the parish is not known. Money was raised for that purpose as early as 1784. The location was a matter not easily settled, part desiring it near Crooks' Mills (now Chandler's). Some of the timber for it was drawn upon the ground there, but Mr. Ephraim Wells, the owner of the land where the present church now stands, gave a lot for the church and land to be used for a cemetery, as an inducement to build on the present site of the church. The Society accepted his proposition. The house was in existence in 1792, and occupied, but in an unfinished state, as the Society that year voted to take measures to complete it. It was a high, two-story building, fronting the east; a front door, and one on each side. It was painted white; without a steeple or cupola even; square pews, with high backs; gallery on three sides, filled with young folks every Sabbath, closely watched by a man appointed for that purpose; a moderately high pulpit, a deacon's seat in front of it, occupied, rain or shine, every Sabbath, by the deacons.

This was the place of worship down to the winter of 1828 and 9, when it was destroyed by fire.

The present church was erected the next year. It was first constructed with the orchestra in the rear of the pulpit. The good people of the parish so loved the house of God, in the former days, that they had no need of a bell to admonish them that the hour of assembling had come. The church was without a bell until 1853. Since this year, the cheerful sounds of a bell have been heard daily from the church tower, admonishing the parish of passing time, and calling them every Sabbath to public worship. It has been rung every year, with one exception, by the same faithful bellman.

THE SABBATH SCHOOL

was organized first in 1816, and has been continued every year since. It was at first only for children. The exercises were only repeating texts of Scripture. The older people gradually became interested in it. For many years it has been composed of those of all ages, from the child up to those over fourscore years. There is one person now in the school that has been connected with it every year since its organization, as scholar or teacher.

THE FIRST SCHOOL.

From the earliest history of the parish the people have manifested a good degree of interest in education.

The first school in the parish, of which there is any record, was taught in the house of Robert Crook, located a few rods to the north of where Geo. Campbell's large sheep-barn now stands. This was as early as 1777. The families living in what is now Dist. No. 1, 2 and 4, furnished children for that school.

It was a log-house. The room was warmed by a stone fire-place that would receive wood 4 feet long and of any thickness. From 1815 to '36, the schools in all the districts were large. 50 or 60 scholars to a school was not an uncommon thing, sometimes the number was as high as 100 in one school.

Since then the schools have diminished greatly in numbers. Where once were large schools now there are hardly enough scholars to make a school.

There was a school taught in a log-house (supposed to be the house of Moses Goodell), that stood on the farm now owned by Ansel Moulthrop, in 1790. The next year the school for the same neighborhood was taught in a log-house on the farm south of this.

AARON HITCHCOCK, in 1793, taught in the same neighborhood, in the house of Edward Goodell. This is the first name that appears on the catalogue of teachers in the parish.

Besides the district school there has been generally a select school of one term a year in the parish.

PARISH LIBRARIES.

The first social library in the parish was commenced about the year 1810, and continued to 1834. It contained about 500 volumes. These were mostly histories, theological and metaphysical works, and biography. The time of travels had not come, and novels were not then so much in favor as now.

The second library was commenced in 1836, and now contains 300 volumes. Compared with the first, it shows quite a change in the tastes and habits of the people in reading. It would now be a rare thing to find a person, young or old, that would take from a library the "Spirit of Laws," by Montesquieu, or Butler's Analogy, or Witherspoon's works, and yet such books were attentively read formerly in the parish, as is evident from the remnants of the first library now found scattered over the parish.

A third library has made its appearance this year (1870), with 100 volumes. It owes its existence to the ladies of the parish, and has, of course, a bright future.

There are taken from the post office, in the parish this year (1870): Daily papers, 3; weekly, 162; semi-weekly, 3; monthlies, 78; quarterlies, 44.

Saxton's River office furnishes some 12 families in the north part of the parish with their mail matter. How many papers and reviews are taken from it by families in this parish, is not known. The number of families that get their papers through the West Parish office is 80.

NATIVE MINISTERS.

Ministers that have originated in the parish, and the time of their graduation so far as is known: Rev. Calvin Hitchcock, D. D., A. B., at Middlebury, 1811. J. Q. A. Edgell, A. B., University of Vt., 1827. Josiah F. Goodhue, A. B., Middlebury, 1821. Joseph A. Ranney, A. B., Middlebury, 1839. Timothy E. Ranney, A. B., Middlebury, 1839. Edwin Goodell, A. B., Dartmouth, 1850. Henry A. Goodhue, A. B., Dartmouth, 1857. Jerome Allen, A. B., Amherst, 1831. James Wilcox, Beald Wilcox, Eaton Mason, A. B., Waterville, Me. Anson Tuthill, A. B., Waterville, Me.

REV. JOSIAH F. GOODHUE,

born in Westminster West in 1818; senior to most of his class at Middlebury by his ardent devotion to study, urbanity of manner and earnest piety, he maintained a wide influence over his classmates there, and his theological course was pursued at Andover, during one year of which he was tutor in Middlebury College. He accepted a call of the church in Williston, Vt., in 1824, and remained pastor till 1834, when he accepted a call to the Congregational church in Shoreham, Vt., where he spent 24 years.

The chief value of Mr. Goodhue's ministrations was not in the rhetorical finish of his sermons, nor special grace of delivery; but in the sound character of his discourses and solemn earnestness with which they were delivered. His pastoral labors had a specially happy influence, in that he possessed that general moral excellence of character which caused his people to see a happy manifestation of the power of religion over his own heart and life. Eminently a lover of peace, by wise and judicious advice he was greatly serviceable in the many councils to which he was called, and on occasions calling for wisdom and discretion. He was among the early and earnest advocates for freedom of the captives of the land, and brought the vigor of his mind to bear in giving public sentiment the right tone on this momentous subject.

His published writings are a Sermon on the character of Rev. Thomas A. Merrill, D. D., of Middlebury, and a History of the town of Shoreham, the scene of his last pastoral labors. Both of these productions are happy specimens of his ability as a writer.

He died at Whitewater, Wis., in Mar., 1862.—From the Congregational Quarterly. [See Shoreham, Vol. I.]

NATIVE PHYSICIANS.

Samuel Hitchcock, A. B. at Middlebury, 1816; M. D. at Baltimore. Alfred Hitchcock, M. D., Dartmouth, 1837; Henry D. Hitchcock, M. D., Woodstock, 1842; Homer O. Hitchcock, A. B., Dartmouth, 1851; M. D., New York City, 1856. Alfred Miller, A. B., Middlebury. [Died in Fitchburg, Mass., Nov. 15, 1877. He was a native of West Westminster, Vt., a graduate of Middlebury College, class of 1840; and of medicine in 1844, at the medical school at Woodstock; commenced practice at Ashburnham, Mass., in 1845. He removed to Fitchburg, May, 1862, and continued in practice until his death. He was twice a member of the Legislature, first in 1866, and also in 1876.] Henry Harlow, M. D., Woodstock, 1843. Daniel Campbell, M. D., Woodstock, 1841. Atherton Hall, Charles Witt, Mark Ranney, M. D., Woodstock. Timothy E. Allen, A. B., Amherst, 1858; M. D., New York City. Geo. Clark, M. D., Woodstock, 1841. John Campbell.

PHYSICIANS THAT HAVE PRACTICED IN THE PARISH.

Asaph Wright, son of Medad Wright of the East Parish, settled in the parish about 1787. Edward R. Campbell came to the parish in 1803. John Hall, Wm. Hall, David Allen, a native of Heath, Mass., M. D., at Pittsfield, Mass., 1827; in practice in the parish, 1828, continued to 1839. Wm. Arms, from 1839 to 1840. John Hurd, 1841 and '2. Daniel Campbell, from 1843 to 1855.

NATIVE LAWYERS

that have originated in the parish. Nathan Hall, A. B., Middlebury, 1861. James Byron Brooks, A. B., Dartmouth, 1869. Kirk W. Wheeler, read law at Albany, N. Y. Alfred S. Hall, Dartmouth, 1869.

OTHER GRADUATES FROM COLLEGE.

Luther Hitchcock, A. B., Middlebury, 1811. David Campbell, A. B., Yale, 1850. Holland Wheeler, A. B., Norwich University, Vt., 1858; railroad and civil engineer in Lawrence, Kansas. Horace Goodhue, Jr., A. B., Dartmouth, 1867; professor in Northfield College, Minn. Gorham Clark, A. B., Middlebury, 1839; teacher at Grenada, Miss., where he died, 1844. Charles Campbell, A. B., Yale, 1839; teacher and merchant in Grenada, Miss.; Alfred S. Hall, Dartmouth, 1873; Horace Goodhue, Jr., Dartmouth, 1857; George Goodhue, Dartmouth, 1873; George B. Brooks, Dartmouth, 1860; Willie Hitchcock, Amherst, 1875.

HOTELS.

A hotel existed in the parish before there was a meeting-house, or a school-house. The first was kept by Joseph Ide, near the top of the hill, on the old road that leads from E. R. Goodell's to Geo. A. Goodell's. It was a log-house and did a large business in toddy. This was a necessity to meet the wants of the traveling community as early as 1790. Then, as now, the necessity was found in the neighborhood of a hotel. That log-house was witness to many a fight to let off the fire of New England rum on the brain. The proprietor was often obliged to fall back upon his large physical organism to keep control of his house. At one time, he had the worst of the fight, and was laid in his large fire-place, very much to his discomfort.

Before 1800, a hotel was kept by Josiah Hendee, in the old house now occupied as a shop, by T. O. Dunham. From 1802 to '7, Gideon Warner was the landlord in the same house. In 1804, Ebenezer Goodhue opened a hotel in the house now owned by Warren Peck. At the installation of Mr. Field, in 1807, it was open for what was called an ordination ball. There is no evidence that any members of the church took part in it; but being at the house of a leading member of the society, and largely patronized by the leading families of both parts of the town, it shows the tastes and habits of the times. A person that was present remarked, years after, "that it was not certain which had the most attention, the fiddle or the toddy-stick. The heels kept time to the fiddle, the heads to the toddy-stick." The house now occupied by Ephraim Wilcox for a store and dwelling-house was built for a hotel by Benjamin Smith, about the year 1805. He kept it for a few years only. David Johnson was the proprietor for a few years. It was known as "Abel Edgell's Hotel," for a number of years, and famous for toddy and horse trading. About the year 1813, it came into the hands of Ephraim Ranney, and was kept for a number of years by Gideon Warner.

A remnant of his account-book, for 1815, shows that the good people of the parish were none too temperate. The following is a specimen of account, leaving out the name:

"Dr. to 1 glass of toddy, to 2 toddy, to 3 toddys, to 2 milk-pans, to 10 lbs. hog's lard." The history is this: The debtor got drunk, and mistook his door, and fell down in the pantry, and pulled down after him two pans of milk and a pan of lard, yet warm from the kettle. He was now ready to make his mark in the world. It was training day and he was too noisy and a little too drunk to be respectable.

The captain, a neighbor of his, undertook to get him out of the way. Having exhausted his patience in flattery, and ignorant of the affairs in the pantry, he came to a close hug with the tipsy man, and by a hard struggle shut him up in the barn, when, lo and behold, he found his buff pants and vest unfit for a captain to wear.

ORCHARDS AND CIDER.

The early settlers planted large orchards. In the rich soil they came quickly into bearing, for the use of the next generation. Cider mills became an institution in the parish. As the craving for strong drink was not fully met by cider in its native state, a distillery came to their help. It was set up by Wainwright Witt, in 1824 or '25. The building erected for that purpose is now used by Russell Bailey for a horse barn.

In 1827 or '28, the still was purchased by Ebenezer Goodell, and moved into a building erected for it, near the beautiful falls on the brook, to the left of the road, as you go from the meeting-house to Charles C. Goodell's, the families in the neighborhood approving. The evil of the thing soon was seen, and some compensation was made to the owner, and the distillery disappeared about the year 1834.

THE FIRST TEMPERANCE SOCIETY was formed in 1831. The meeting for the purpose was held in the brick school-house, west of the church. The committee that drafted the constitution were Rev. Timothy Field, Eppa Cone, John Smith and John Brailly, most of them known to be not friendly to the movement. But a constitution was reported and accepted by the meeting, pledging the members to abstinence from all intoxicating drinks, as a beverage, with a qualifying clause that gave some liberty in the use of cider in certain states. This clause, it was thought by some, gave too much liberty for the good of the members, and a new society was formed in 1841, pledging its members, without any qualification, to abstinence from all intoxicating drinks. This society never had the hearty approval of all in the parish, but it doubtless did much to improve the temperance sentiment.

Since the temperance reformation, keeping hotel in the parish has not been a paying business. The house now owned by Wm. Field was opened for that purpose for a few years. Since 1830, the house now occupied as a store has been opened as a hotel, by different persons; none of them have found it profitable.

SAW-MILLS.

The first saw-mill, in the parish, was built by Elijah Ranney, on the brook nearly east of John Platt's. Wm. Abbott, some years later, built one about half of a mile below, on the same brook. The Ranney mill had served its day, and was a matter of tradition only, in 1800. Before 1790, William Crook had put up a mill on the farm now owned by Harlan Dinsmore. In 1811, Joshua Clark leased the privilege of Mr. Cook and built a new mill, and ran it until 1830, when he sold to Russell Ranney. Another mill was in existence as early as 1810, at the left of the road, where it is crossed by the brook, near the house now occupied by Mr. Howe. Joshua Clark built a mill in 1809 or '10. It was run by him until 1859, when it passed into the hands of R. C. Gould. In 1865, it became the property of Alfred Harlow, who built the present mill in 1867, which is now the only saw-mill in the parish. F. O. Dunham put up a saw-mill in the village in 1858. It was burned in 1862.

GRIST-MILLS.

The first grist-mill, in the parish, is supposed to have been built by Robert Crook, on the site of the present mill. It was known in 1790 as Crook's Mill, and is remembered as, then, an old building. The year it was erected cannot now be determined, probably as early as 1780. A second mill was erected where the factory afterwards stood, by whom, or when, is not known. Crook's Mill was owned for years by Elijah Ranney, and was tended by Miller Paine. Dr. Edward R. Campbell built a third mill, on the brook a few feet below, where it crosses the road leading to Mr. Howe's. He also, in 1827, built the mill that now serves the parish. It has had many owners, and been often changed in some respects, but retains about the same look, inside and out, as the year it was erected.

Russell Ranney, in 1856, put in a grist-mill near Horace Foster's, which made the meal for the parish for three years. Since then the business has been carried on at the location selected by Mr. Crook for a mill, probably in 1780 or '81.

MANUFACTURES.

The wives and daughters, in the early history of the parish, of course made the cloth used.

In 1813, Scotto Clark* put in machinery for a woollen factory into the building that had been used for a grist-mill, near Thomas Chandler's. His works were burned Dec., 1723. The next season a two-story brick building was erected on the same spot, and filled with machinery for manufacturing broadcloths and cassimeres. It was burnt in 1832.

CLOTHING WORKS.

John Cambridge was the first clothier in the parish. Before 1812, his works were in the building erected for a grist-mill, and, after him, used for a factory. In 1813, he erected a building in the village, in which the clothier business was carried on, by different persons, until 1826 or '7.

Silisbury succeeded Cambridge, as clothier, and, for a few years, did something in the line of manufacturing hats. David Duncan succeeded Silsbury, as clothier, for a number of years. About the year 1827 the building was connected with a wheelwright shop, and was occupied for that business by Lyman French and Noah Whitney, until 1835, when F. O. Dunham succeeded them as wheelwright. After him Hart Halt owned the shop and carried on the business for years. In 1841, he sold to Geo. Allen, who enlarged the establishment by adding a large two-story building in 1842. In 1843, both buildings were burnt. A new and larger building was erected the same year, by Mr. Allen, and used by him for a until 1854. This year, F. O. Dunham became the proprietor of the shop, and continued the business until 1862, when the building was destroyed by fire. In 1868, F. O. Dunham erected another building on the same spot, but it is yet in an unfinished state.

CARRIAGE SHOP

TANNING.

David Shield is thought to have been the first tanner in the parish. The building which stood on the flat, near where Willard Moultrie's barn now stands, was erected in 1788 or '89. It was large, and answered the double purpose of a dwelling house and a tannery. But a few years later a tannery was started in the village by Ephraim Wells, followed by a Mr. Wymen. The works were to the east of the brook, opposite the house now owned by Wm. Dean. Wm. Simons was his successor in the business, and moved the works a few rods down the brook. The building erected by Mr. Simons for the business, was standing in 1843, and then used by Amos Ball for a barn, and was burned in May of that year. Wm. King succeeded Simons as tanner, but did not long continue the business in the place. Silas Hardy followed him and continued the business down to 1830 or '32, when the business ceased in the parish.

BLACKSMITHS.

From the earliest history of the parish the hammer of the blacksmith has been heard on the spot where the blacksmith shop now stands. The first smith that is remembered, was David Morse, followed in the business by Levi Field, George W. Holland, Charles Black, Daniel Miller and B. F. Winchester.

Peter Hall worked at the anvil many years on the farm known as the Peter Hall place. Wainwright Witt did something in the same line, near Chandler's Mill. James Eaton had a shop in district No. 4, near Geo. A. Goodell's.

Gideon Warner was the smith for the neighborhood west of the church. His shop stood near the old house now owned by F. O. Dunham. The blacksmith in the early times was an important character, when all the tools of the husbandman and mechanic, and all that was worked in iron had to pass under his hammer.

SHOEMAKERS.

The old people remember Thomas Paine, Phineas Ball, Obadiah Barker, Stephen Moulthrop and James Webb, who made their yearly visits to the early families in the parish, with lap-stones, lasts and bench, and did up the shoe-making for the year, for the whole family.

Reuben Printess had a shop in the north part of the parish for many years. John Tower, David Hardy, Amos Ball, W. B. Hamblin and Husey Wardwell have carried on the business in the village, following each other, in the order of their names here given. Thomas Chandler served the south part of the parish as shoemaker, for nearly 50 years. He still lives, but his lap-stone and hammer have been laid by for years.

MERCHANTS.

Eleazer May, of the East Parish, is supposed to have erected the building for many years used for a store. It was in existence in 1800, and stood on the ground now covered by Mrs. Stowell's house. Ebenezer Goodhue occupied it in 1804, and for a number of years following. After him, Josiah Demming, Gen. Levitt, of Putney, and Solomon Mayo, occupied the building at different times, for a store. Otis Haven, who was a clerk of Gen. Levitt's, was the merchant for a number of years. After him, Benjamin Baldwin, for a few years. Then Howes Hallet. John Goodell occupied the building from 1829 to '33. The next name of the merchant that is known is R. Burchard.

The building was burnt in 1839. It was rebuilt by David Hitchcock, in 1841, and occupied by G. W. Daniels, from May, 1842, to May, 1851. William Nutting filled the store in 1853. He continued the business only part of the year. For a few years following, A. S. Clark occupied the building. In 1856, Ephraim Wilcox and Judson Smith filled the store with goods. The partnership continued but a short time, when Mr. Wilcox assumed the whole business, and in a few years moved to the building now occupied for a store by A. P. Ranney.

MILITARY.

The parish line of the town, run in 1785, is often referred to as the "Militia line." There were two companies of militia in town after that date. That in the West Parish, from 1810 to '30, was large, often reporting 100 privates. The June training was a great day. It called out all to see. Generally there was much noise, quite early, about the home of the officers. The one that waked up the captain, and got the first treat, was the best fellow. Toddy was abundant, dealt freely to the company by the officers, and to the multitude at the store and the hotel.

EPHRAIM RANNEY, JR.,

was the first captain. The roll of honor (for it was an honor, in the parish, to be called captain) runs as follows: David Heaton, Heli Hitchcock, Daniel Mason, Elijah Ranney, Rufus Gibbs, Ira Carpenter, Wainwright Witt, Joseph Ranney, Joshua Clark, Stephen Tuthill, Howes Hallett, Amos Hitchcock, Alvin Goodell, Russel Ranney, Edward Hall, David Hardy, Lyman French, Reuben C. Gould, Gideon Bemis, F. O. Dunham, David C. Gorham, Wm. Field.

The parish furnished soldiers for the army of the Revolution, as follows: Francis Holden, Benjamin Smith, Jas. Crawford, Reuben Robertson, — Fuller and son, Charles Holden.

WESTMINSTER WEST SOLDIERS

FOR THE WAR OF THE REBELLION.

William S. Cady, Justus Hitchcock, Henry B. Darling, James W. Darling, Willard Moulthrop, William P. Dean, Orman Holden, Joseph Brooks, Roswell Miller, Henry Houghton, Ransom Miller, Tollman S. Coombs, David C. Moulthrop, George Field, J. Foster Kimball, J. Hunt Clark, Homer F. Buxton, Alfred P. Ranney, Walter W. Ranney, Otis F. Buxton, Henry Buxton, Josiah Hall, Bradley Howe, Geo. R. Harlow, G. R. Harlow.

Of our Westminster West soldiers who died in this war, the following are the names of all that I can now recall:

James Darling, Ransom Miller, Henry Baxter, Walter W. Ranney, and one — Moulthrop. I do not recall his given name. They were all killed in battle, or died of wounds received in battle.

[How the people of Vermont received the ending of the war, is seen so clear in this sermon, we have included it as a descriptive chapter, fitting, not for this town alone, but for the entire State. In Vol. I, page 836, is to be seen the address of Rev. Silas McKeen to a body of Vermont soldiers as they go forth to the war, and here, this venerable Pastor speaking to the people while the pæan of victory yet rings.]

NATIONAL JOY.

APRIL 9, 1865.

THE SABBATH AFTER THE CAPTURE OF RICHMOND, VA., BY THE FEDERAL ARMY.

From the Pulpit of

REV. A. STEVENS,

Pastor of the Congregational Church,
Westminster West, Vt.

I will lift up mine eyes unto the hills, from whence cometh my help. My help cometh from the Lord, which made Heaven and Earth.—Psalms 121, 1-2.

The last week has been one of great excitement and unbounded joy in the loyal States, and we doubt not in many places in the land of rebellion. Richmond, the rebel capital is fallen, and the army of Lee, which has been the strength of the rebellion from its beginning, is retreating in confusion, before our victorious troops, is the news that dies over the land with lightning speed, on Monday. The nation is frantic with joy. The merchant forgets his sales; the mechanic and farmer their work. The white and black unite in demonstrations of joy. Eloquence, poetry, piety, patriotism and humanity are stirred everywhere and speak the best they can, the unbounded joy of the nation. None could speak too loud or enthusiastically the joy for the tidings. The shouts of "glory, hallelujah!" have rolled up from the mouths of hundreds of negroes, for whose enslavement the war was begun. It has been as when "Prophetic Babylon" fell, and the nations are in commotion, "because in her would be bought no more the bodies and souls of men." City answered to city, swelling the wave of joy until the land was full. This is well. It is as it should be. It is the instinctive demand of justice. Love of freedom, of humanity, desire for peace and the establishment of good government, call for and approve of our joy for such a blow at the base conspiracy to destroy our government, and build on its ruin a power with its corner stone laid in slavery—defying the doctrines of Plymouth Rock—mocking at the declaration of independence—trifling with humanity and the tenderest affections of parents and companions, and crushing out with its iron rule all that is filial in children, and blasting the intellects of millions of men and women, and making the word of God a sealed book to them. Richmond was the representative of all this infamous purpose. Her fortifications,—her hundreds of cannon, her naval preparations, her large army and skillful generals, were for the defence of all this. They spoke only defiance to all attempts to put any restraint upon the unlimited spread of slavery on this continent. It is meet that joy fill the land at its fall—that demonstrations be loud and far spread, clothed with piety, adorned with poetry, fired with eloquence, and made wild with enthusiasm, so that every citizen can give utterance to the sentiments of a freeman's heart: My heart is, it has been, in all this. But while I say this, and say it because I feel it, I say there is a phase of this event that calls for a calmer view, a thoughtfulness that takes us back from our flights of joy, to consider the more permanent relations we sustain to this great, glorious event.

There has been no time since the rebellion began that demands candor, impartial purposes, and generous impulses, yet firmness in rulers and people, like the day it falls before our victorious army. Then especially will Christian principle be called for—true magnanimity, decided purposes, yet a leniency becoming a Christian and victorious people. The struggles in our breasts between the demands of strict justice upon our enemies, and Christian forgiveness, must be adjusted carefully and in the fear of God, lest we, under our great injuries, swear vengeance, or in our great desire for peace, overlook what justice and the public safety demand. Duties will now press upon the nation that cannot be performed under the inspiration that has pushed on the war, and kept the armies full and nerved for the fight. Who to blame? who to excuse? who to execute? and who to forgive? what justice and what mercy demands of us towards our enemies? are questions that will occupy the public mind, and be differently answered, and will call out opposing feelings. They cannot, and must not, be answered under the inspiration of martial music. As the rebellion falls, and rebels flock to take the oath of allegiance, we pass to new duties and responsibilities. It is not my purpose to speak of them at this time. What they will be, cannot yet be fully defined. I would call your attention to the spirit needful to meet them as they shall be developed by the prosecution of the war. The text defines in general the position we ought to occupy as citizens in our triumphs. "I will look unto the hills from whence cometh my help. My help cometh from the Lord, which made heaven and earth." The sentiment here expressed is beautiful. It is always becoming—a humble acknowledgment of God's agency in our deliverance, and of our indebtedness to Him. This feeling, if it were universal, would remove much of the friction of society, and the affairs of the world, in the State, the family, and the church, would adjust themselves harmoniously. Let us consider some of the practical results of looking unto the Lord as our deliverer, in this day of triumph.

I. It will produce candor, and keep us from party opinions, and rash measures.

I have said the triumphs of our arms will bring new questions for us to consider. For our opinions and measures we are accountable, as well as indebted to God for permitting us to form our own, and to enjoy them unmolested. This is true of all we do as citizens. We cannot hide ourselves from His notice among the multitude with whom we act. Though we cut ourselves loose from all restraint and act without regard to His law, hiding behind parties and customs, and constitutional interpretations, or the opinions of great names, we are before Him, and there is a day of reckoning for all we do. No recklessness in our opinions and measures can prevent the facts that we are accountable, as directly as though we were the sole actors. Our opinions, our measures, and the manner we prosecute them are ours. We should be always considerate and view things as we wish to meet them before God in judgment. To be thoughtless of our dependence upon God in our rejoicing, and to forget that it is He that has given us the victory is dangerous. We should feel to-day that the everlasting hills are our refuge. Our whole appearance should be that of those seeking wisdom of the Lord, and ready to follow in the openings of His providence. There has been often impatience during the four years of war. We have heard unreasonable complaints, and wholesale condemnation of men and measures. There has been disappointments often, and chagrin. There may have been reasons for all this, regarding human instrumentalities simply. But looking at things as they now appear, it is manifest that there has been done a work in the land that neither our government nor the rebels intended to do. All that vexed us, and about which we were impatient, was needful to the result reached. Delay, defeat, by which the struggle has been prolonged, has cut deep under the foundation of the cause of trouble; slavery has been undermined. It has shown us how slavery had been through all our history, corrupting the nation, and imbruting men, and making them creatures that could defy all law, and revel in cruelty, by starvation, by confinement and brutal treatment of their fellow men. Looking at the result of the four years just passed, we see we did not comprehend at all the divine plan now accomplished. Our views were narrow, erroneous. Our plans, if they had succeeded, would not have brought the result for which we now rejoice—the year of jubilee that has come to millions of our race. We look with astonishment on the colored hosts that have leaped from the condition of cattle, or things, to manhood, praised for their valor, admired for their patient suffering for liberty, and for their industry, and thirst for knowledge. All theories of emancipation are put to shame, except the one that all pronounced impractical, immediate. God has taught us that what is just to the colored race can be done with safety so far as they are concerned. The lesson should humble us to-day, and make us more teachable before God, more candid in our judgment about His commands, and more thoughtful about His ways, and never measure his doings by our hasty and rash conclusions. We must view the work before God, and bring along the lesson into practical life, that we may know our own ignorance, and wait before the Lord in hope and confidence in all the future unfoldings of His providence.

II. Our gratitude will be a selfish demonstration unless we look to the Lord as our helper.

The last year of the war has been one of almost constant success. All the military movements have strengthened our cause and weakened the enemy. We talk much, and justly, about the skill of our commanders, and the bravery and endurance of our soldiers. We regard them as the cause of success. We ought to be thankful for their wisdom and bravery. We think we are. But they are only the gifts of God, raised up for the place they occupy, at the time they are needed to reach the result for which we rejoice. All the leading generals, those by whom the tide of national fortune has been turned, were in comparative obscurity at the opening of our struggle. They came to notice as they have been needed to do the work that God had planned. We praise them. We will honor them. The coming millions of freemen on this continent will honor them. But as Christian citizens we must look higher than this, "our help has come from the Lord, which made heaven and earth." Here has been the point of observation from which all these movements have been directed. The marching and countermarching of the hosts, North and South, East and West, has been under His eye, and superintended by His providence. The winds, the rain, the cold and heat, have held them in check until it was time to move. The rivers, swollen by His command, have stopped the whole until it is time to march. We have looked on with anxiety and some fears, perhaps, for the last year, when the movements manifestly began to converge towards the heart of rebellion, lest so great movements, at so great a distance, should not meet to produce the intended result.

The nation has waited for the last six months, in breathless suspense, seeing how one move after another has been tightening our hold upon the capital of our enemy, until he has been forced to abandon his strong holds, and trust to fortune to find others. Skeptical and blind is the mind that does not see a higher than man that has been guiding these movements so various, and operating at so great a distance, so as to make the result a unit. Hard is that heart that has, to-day, no thanks to Him that sitteth upon the everlasting hills, and has from thence, by His providence, been guiding to the result for which we rejoice. When Sherman cut himself loose from Atlanta last autumn, the world was full of conjectures and predictions of what he wished to do, or could or would do, or whether he would do anything but destroy his splendid army. Whatever may have been the human plans at the time, we know that but one mind knew certainly the result, and comprehended all the circumstances upon which success depended. It was all under the eye of Him, who has by His providence guided the whole so as to accomplish his purpose in this war. Thanks be to Him that sitteth upon the everlasting hills, who has made the wrath of our enemies to praise Him, and work their own ruin. Let our demonstrations of joy be expressed before Him, for He has done all things well. It is only by viewing the work as His, and accomplishing His purpose, that we can appreciate what has been done. The fall of Richmond in itself concerned, is a small event. It is a representative event; that which it was pledged to defend falls. The event goes out over the land and world affecting all the interests at stake in this war,—the principles of republican government—Christian freedom—the right to preach freely the Gospel—to teach and to learn without restraint. The slave mother breathes freer, feels safer, as she looks upon her loved ones for it; her home is guarded against the intrusion of the dealer in human flesh. The land is opened by it to the philanthropist and Christian missionary, to look after the ignorant and degraded slaves, and teach them the way of life from the word of God. The event not only affects our national interest. The church of Christ has an interest in it. The field under God's eye in this war is larger than our land. Grant's war map is but a speck of the whole. His comprehensive plans, and vast moves and glorious results, are but the opening of the divine purpose, to proclaim liberty to the captives in all lands, "to proclaim the acceptable years of the Lord, and the day of vengeance of our God." We do not to-day rejoice and give thanks simply that Gen. Grant has been successful. God's revealed purpose is a reality. The way is opened for a fuller consummation of the purpose of God, that men should dwell together, unmolested, in the free development of all their powers and full enjoyment of the fruit of their wisdom and toil. It is a small affair that our country be saved, if we consider it disconnected from the influence of an enlightened, free Christian people, on the general weal of the world.

It is to be feared that much of the joy of the last week has arisen from selfish considerations; my party has triumphed, my business will be improved by the good news, or my son or companion will be at home again. There has been no thought of the effect on the more general interests of man—free thought, free labor, free worship—free enjoyment of all these—free spread of Christian principles in the world. If we look to the hills, from whence has come our help, we shall see that there is a wider range for our joy than our land. God is here, moving a wheel within the wheel, that is turning the whole earth, crushing despotism, casting out light and knowledge, and overturning and overturning “until He come, whose right it is” to reign. If we fail to see God’s hand in the work, we shall not appreciate its connection with the interests of Christian civilization and missionary movements. Our gratitude will not be Christian.

III. There is another feeling that ought to enter largely into our joy—humility. It will be forgotten if we do not look to God, from whom has come our help. Pride is sin; boasting is its natural language. Sin is defiant, rebellious, and always confident of having its own way, and by its own plans. In counter tendency to this, we should come before God as our deliverer, feel, confess and act on the principle that we are weak. It is He that has brought the nation through the waters. He has brought the heaps of waters over our enemies. We love to say, and ought to, our country, our government, our naval and military strength, and our victories. But there is danger, in such a time as this, that we become vain. Looking unto God reveals a more powerful disposer of events than ourselves—owning all we call ours by absolute right. None can dispute it. No power can maintain a claim against His. The land is His. He has given it to us as a dwelling-place. He has overthrown our enemies that have risen to contest His right to give us the land for a republican government. We hold it sacred to freedom by the best of titles—the gift of God. Like Pharaoh of old, our enemies said: we will pursue, we will overtake, we will divide the spoil. our lust shall be satisfied. God has favored our cause. They have sunk like lead in the waters. They have cast away their chariots of war in their flight. Like Israel, we ought to sing to-day: “Who is like unto thee, O Lord? among the Gods who is like thee, glorious in holiness, fearful in praises, doing wonders?”—Ex. 15: 9-11.

How becoming this song for Israel, who had been but a little before hedged in by the mountains and the sea, and pursued by the Egyptian army. Hardly less dangerous was our condition four years since. A united, treacherous enemy was before us, clad and disciplined for war. Traitors appeared everywhere in the land, in the army, in the halls of Congress. At home and abroad adverse influences met us. The government knew not what to do, or whom to trust. Many that were trusted were false or heartless to our cause. The Capital was swarming with secret foes and declared, defiant enemies, holding at the time nearly all the munitions of war of the nation under their control. The foreign nations said the republic is a rope of sand, and took it for granted almost that we were not as a nation. But there was a voice, as of old, to “Abraham:” “I will give thee the land.”

To-day all the naval preparations of the enemy are in the depths of the sea—“they sank unto the bottom as a stone.” Their heavy ordnance, by the thousand, has fallen into our hands. Their forts and fortifications are abandoned, and their strong army, like Pharaoh’s host, is floating about to find a place to make a stand.

Looking back four years from this time, and seeing what has been developed of plans to destroy the nation, and the malignant, fiendish determination to execute them, and what combinations at home and abroad were against us, we may say to-day, it is the Lord that has been our help, or our enemies would have prevailed. We were then shorn of all our strength but the justice of our cause and our patriotic hearts. We were like Samson in the hands of the Philistines, a sport for our enemies. But, thanks be to God, the pillars of their wicked fabric have been broken and brought down ruin on the lands of the Confederacy. The Lord has helped us this once. It is meet that we rejoice with humility, and praise Him for what we see to-day and hope for in the future. Especially, when we consider that all that we have passed through of suffering, in reaching this point of triumph, has been justly deserved. God has saved us from the brink of ruin, where we had rushed by our sins. He has kept us from anarchy. He has weakened our enemies. In mercy, he has made all our defeats lay firmly the foundation of permanent peace. They have all been heavy blows against slavery—the corner-stone of rebellion—and teaching the slave himself to feel his manhood, and arming and disciplining him to defend himself. We, in our inhumanity and selfishness did not think of this, did not mean it; yea, the government declared a different purpose. But God forced us to declare liberty to the captive. Defeat and reverses attended our cause, and strength and courage came to our enemies. The whole ark trembled until hands were put to it and washed from the wrongs of the oppressed. Before God to-day, we ought to take our place in the dust and mourn, that we were so slow to learn that the negro has the feelings and rights of a man. God had to write it out in blood before we could see the self-evident truth—slavery is a sin. Thousands of cannon must menace the capital, with terrific cannonading, before the ears of the nation were opened to hear God's command "to let the oppressed go free, and break every yoke." We should humble ourselves before God in confession and prayer for forgiveness, that millions, guilty of nothing "but a skin not colored like our own," have been sunk in all the ignorance and degradation of heathen, in this Christian land, and held there by the laws of a professedly Christian people. It is a shame to humanity that slavery, with all its woes, should have ever found supporters in our land, and been defended by men educated under our institutions. It is a sin and a shame that we have insulted the word of God by holding it up as a covert for the abomination of slavery, or as an apology for continuing it. God has helped us, in this war, in a way that has brought out to the light of the world the iniquities of the system. It pours out from the plantations and cities of the whole South, in the hundreds of thousands of half-naked, half-starved, ignorant and degraded beings, whose affections and chastity have been trifled with by their oppressors all their lives. God says to the nation: Look at this mass of ignorance and filth and see what you have been defending and conniving at, and in some cases defending from my word. See your folly, be ashamed of your apologies and soft talk about this iniquity that has spewed out all the way I have led your victorious troops.

The inhumanity that has appeared, in robbing and stabbing the wounded, in mutilating the dead on the battle-field, and starving and slaying in cold blood our prisoners, show us what a barbarity, what a dance of cruelty and death we have been indifferent about in a Christian land. God's ways in this thing shame us for our opinions and practices in relation to the colored race. We ought to humble ourselves in shame and self-reproach, that we have been for years, in Congress, in our State legislatures, by our public men, trying to save the Union and make peace at the expense of justice. God has helped us in a way that shows that the only way of peace is to proclaim liberty to the captive, as he has commanded.

IV. We should look unto the hills, from whence has come our help, that we may feel our dependence. The rebellion has developed a vitality and a strength in our government that we had not known. Foreign nations have been disappointed at the developments of wealth, the intelligent action, the moral and Christian principles, and the power of the government in every respect. The ship of state has met the storm nobly, and nears the port in safety, defying the mad waves that have threatened to engulf her. There is danger in such a position. It is well to feel strong; but it is better to feel that our strength is weakness—so much so, at least, as to keep us from defiant airs and provoking measures. The long and severe military training of the country in this war, and the large naval and military preparations, prepare us for aggression.

There is danger that we become impatient under insult, and jealous of little encroachments, and sensitive, to a fault, of national honor. The education of the nation, at this time, will tend to make us feel large and defiant, if not provocative, as if the world was ours. No nation has ever had its power of endurance more severely tried than ours in the last four years. Our statesmanship has been proved, our valor on the field of battle has been tested, our patriotism has been tried, our Christian principle shown. In all we have met the demand of the hour successfully. But remember that it is the Lord that has helped us. If we forget this, there is danger that we give ourselves up to rashness and insult in diplomacy, and make a cause of war out of trifles, and waste our strength needlessly, and confidently boast of strength when we are weak, only as the Lord helps us. That help can be sought, consistently, only in a just cause. No military preparations, however great, will warrant aggressive war, or give hope of success in oppressing the weak, or defying, needlessly, the strong.

V. If we forget the source from whence our help has come, we shall not fully prize the government the Lord has given us, and helped us thus far to defend. Many seem to have no other idea of a country than a place to live, where they can eat and sleep, and, perhaps, get rich; and that government is regarded as best that gives them the fullest enjoyment in this respect. They overlook entirely the great end for which civil government has been appointed by God. It is for the fullest development of the powers of man, as a social, intellectual and moral being; to enlarge the sphere of his usefulness, and protect and encourage him in it.

That government is best that gives the freest, largest range of the human soul in its mission of good-will to man and glory to God. God has helped us in this struggle that we might have a government for this, a government that puts no brand upon the human soul that degrades it, or dooms it to a service not required by its Creator. God has helped us that there may be no power in law to blast the intellect and crush the manhood, pervert the conscience and judgment, and degrade the worship of the human soul. God has helped us for this; not that we might have a civil organization to use for what purpose we please, and to manage as party feeling or selfish interest may dictate. Our government is God's gift to this whole land, that the wilderness and solitary places shall bud and blossom as the rose, and all men may rejoice in the salvation of our God. He has helped us that there might be here the freest, fullest range to human thought; that, under the culture of our free schools, free press, free Bible and worship, there may be realized the highest attainment of society, in knowledge, in virtue and Christian devotion; and that from our land may go out an enlightening, regenerating influence for the world. For this has God helped us.

We must take no narrow view of the results of this war. Make the hills, from whence has come our help, our point of observation, and we will see the coming millions of our land rejoicing in the joy of our hearts to-day, and thanking God for the results for which we rejoice. All have the means of education within their reach, encouraged from childhood to make the most of their powers and opportunities. The word of God is in a language which all can read. They are restrained by no laws but such as hold them to the high purpose for which God made man—a life of intelligence, of justice and purity. We see them all with free access to the fountain of light in God's word, and rejoicing in it as a common inheritance to the race. Such is the view of the future of our land, if we look from the hills, from which has come our help. We here get a glimpse of the purpose of the Lord in its present unfolding and future promise, and can realize something of the greatness of His work in our struggle. We are prepared to appreciate what he has wrought for us in humbling our enemies by the fall of Richmond. We can say, sincerely, "O praise the Lord, all ye nations; praise him, all ye people, for his merciful kindness is great toward us." — Psalms 117:1, 2.

AN ADDRESS,

By REV. ALFRED STEVENS, D. D.,

February 22, 1883,

THE FORTIETH ANNIVERSARY

Of his pastorate with the CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH, WESTMINSTER WEST.

BRETHREN AND FRIENDS :

It is forty years to-day since I was installed as your pastor. I was first seen in your pulpit ten months before my installation. It was on the second Sabbath in April, 1842; there was no person in the congregation I had ever seen before I came to town. It was a pleasant day.

I had not thought of being a candidate for settlement when I came among you, but I soon learned that that was the expectation among the people, and the congregation was large that day; there was evidently a feeling of anxiety and expectation with most; with some, curiosity to hear a new minister. I was introduced by Deacon Asahel Goodell, into a moderately high pulpit, located between the doors leading into the audience-room. It was reached by stairs on both sides; was without a carpet. A strong board firmly nailed to supports was my resting-place. Behind me in the loft were at least twenty good singers, supported in the service by a bass-viol and a flute. Nearest to me, as I looked from the pulpit, and most prominent among the faces that met my eye, was that of your old minister, the Rev. Timothy Field, whose looks always told his likes and dislikes. In the next pew sat Zadock Hitchcock, then Captain Amos Hitchcock, Atherton Hall, David Gorham, Jabez Miller, Orion Carpenter and Luman Wilcox. In the body pews at the right sat Deacon Ebenezer Goodhue, then Joseph Ranney, Esq., Deacon Elijah Ranney, Calvin Ranney, Mr. Richmond, Elisha Berry, Sr. and Jr., and Edward Campbell. In the wall pews on the right sat Reuben Prentiss, Daniel Bailey, Aaron Gould, Captain Crowell, Abiel Carpenter and Joseph Hamblin. On the left sat Isaac Gorham, Stephen Tuthill, Ebenezer Goodell, David Hitchcock, Peter Hall, John Miller and Ira Carpenter. All of these were men who had passed the meridian of life, and most of them were upwards of seventy years. These have all passed into the congregation of the dead. Most of them had their wives with them that day—noble women, mothers of worthy men and women; they, too, have all passed away. There are only three men and a few women that regularly worship with us to-day that could be regarded as active members of the church and society when I was installed as your pastor.

I think there is not a farm in the parish that is now owned and occupied by the same persons that held them then. Some have passed from the fathers to the children, but most have entirely new occupants; all are changed in many respects. Only a few of your houses had ever had a coat of white paint, and only two had blinds to the windows. There was no piano in the parish; a single melodeon was the only apology for an organ of any kind. Most of the music then in the parish was made by the human voice. There was no lack of singers, then, in any place in the parish. A little observation will show that there has been a great change in all these particulars since I have been your pastor. But there is one thing that has not changed. My first sermon after my ordination, Feb. 22, 1843, was from the text, "For I am determined not to know anything among you save Jesus Christ and him crucified." This was the message from me to your fathers when I was their young minister. This is the message I have borne to you, their children, now I am a gray-headed man. I loved that message then; I love it now for the same reason, "for it is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth."

I have preached often and plainly on questions that have arisen from habits of the parish that needed rebuke or encouragement, on questions affecting State or national interests, but never unless I thought the honor of my Saviour required such discourse. My ordination vows demanded that my gospel to you should be the gospel of Christ, seeking to save the lost. I have tried to be faithful to those vows. But I have much to confess of imperfection, to the parish, and more to my Saviour. The barrenness of my ministry in conversions humbles me, and makes me reluctant to review it. I think I can truly say I have studied to preach Christ to you, and have not kept back anything of doctrine or command that I find revealed in the Bible. The subject of salvation has lost none of its interest by repeated discourse. It does not seem old; it is as fresh to day as when I first spoke to you of the great love of God for sinners.

I find I have preached to you 1,400 sermons fully written, and as many more from briefs or entirely extemporaneous—some of these from the pulpit, but more of them in the vestry or the school-houses in the parish. I have been with you, in my pulpit service, in expositions mostly written out, through Galatians, Romans, Acts of the Apostles, the Book of Job, the Gospels of John and Matthew. In these discourses, which number over 300, we have sat together before the Saviour with the beloved disciple, and heard him speak of the divine love manifested in Christ. We have considered the change effected in Saul, the proud Pharisee, by the spirit of God, and have followed him in his journeyings, preaching Christ in the islands of the sea, in Asia, in Greece and at Rome. We have heard him in the praying circles by the seaside, before kings and in the schools of philosophers, speaking, but always of Christ the Divine Saviour, able to save. We have together considered, in the book of Job, how God comes down into human affairs, how He chastens His children, how He sustains and how He rewards the faithful. The richest hours of my life have been my communings with the great apostle, the beloved disciple and the afflicted man of Uz, in my preparation to teach you what Christ has been to his people, and what he is to you and me.

I have preached Christ in your families, beside the bed of the sick and dying. I do not think of any family long resident in the parish in which I have not been called to speak of Christ to the sick and dying. I have often been carried near to the heavenly world, as I have heard your fathers and mothers, brothers and sisters speak of the blessedness of faith in Christ in the hour of death. These scenes have deepened not a little my interest in your homes. Your homes are precious to me, for in many of them I have learned how precious Christ is when all earthly things fail. The chambers where the good men and women that waited on my early ministry met their fate will always be remembered. Their words of confident trust I still hear. Their looks of resignation to the hand of death I still recall, and shall as long as I remember anything. I would not have blotted from my history the seasons of communings with good men and women that chose me as their minister forty years ago, as the band of death was taking them over the river. To have repeated the promises and invitations of the blessed Saviour, in my poor way, beside the dying-beds in the parish, furnishes the most delightful recollection in the review of the years I have spent with you.

But I must say to-day that all the dying-beds that I have visited in the parish have not been scenes of Christian triumph. Often I could only commend the dying one to Christ, asking him to come into salvation in the eleventh hour. My unfaithfulness has been rebuked as I have often tried to speak words for Jesus into ears fast closing in death, that should have been spoken before. I hear to-day a voice from some of the dying-beds that I have visited, saying, "You should have let no opportunity pass to point the young and old of your flock to Christ, unimproved." I turn to Christ to-day for forgiveness of my neglects, thankful that the promises of Christ may be repeated with hope on the brink of the grave, and that dying eyes may be directed to the Saviour the gospel reveals.

I have preached Christ Jesus to you as your comfort in affliction. There are, I think, only three houses in the parish in which I have not attended funerals—in some of them as many as seven. I have been with you 307 times to the graves of your loved ones, and committed their mortal remains to the keeping of Him who is the resurrection and the life. I have been present and officiated, in part or alone, at all the funerals that have occurred in the parish when I was in town, except two. Twice a Universalist minister has been called by the afflicted family, a Methodist threetimes and a Baptist four times. We shared the services together by the request of the family. I have been called from the parish to attend funerals 75 times.

Of the 307 that have died in the parish during my pastorate, 9 were between 90 and 100 years of age; 57 between 80 and 90, 111 between 70 and 80; 30 between 60 and 70; 16 between 50 and 60; 12 between 40 and 50; 16 between 30 and 40; 16 between 20 and 30, and 40 under 20 years of age [three since over 80 = 60 over 80]. Of all these it is written, "They died." Most of them are forgotten by a large part of those living in the parish to-day. Many of them occupied, forty years ago, the same seats in the house of God that you occupy to-day. They heard the same gospel you listen to from Sabbath to Sabbath. With many of them I took sweet counsel in the house of God, in the social circles and in the houses you now occupy. Of all of them I can say, they were my friends, so far as I know.

I have attended 95 weddings. I have preached Christ to the youth of the parish. It has been a great pleasure for me to do it, but the reflection is embittered somewhat by the thought that they have not all been led to Christ. That they should have spent their minority under my ministry, and gone out from the parish without the love of Christ in their hearts, is my grief to-day.

I have preached Christ to the business men of the parish—preached him as their Saviour, His life as their example, and His law as their rule of life. I have called their attention repeatedly to their civil duties, and urged them to fear God as citizens, in voting, in buying and selling, and as neighbors to be kind and condescending, to be just, "doing to others as they would that others should do to them."

There has been generally harmony and good feeling in the parish in the dealings of man with man; yet I must say there would have been better if all had been more thoughtful about the practical virtues of the gospel I have preached. I know of no difficulty between parishioners the years I review that did not arise very much from a want of good will, and did not find a settlement for the same reason. Those that have taken with them the spirit of Christ in their buying and selling, and kept the example of Christ with them on their farms and in their shops, have lived in peace, generally.

I cannot, without a good deal of trouble, tell how many sermons I have preached on the practical virtues of civil life. I have preached repeatedly on temperance, on honesty in trade and politics, on the duty of bearing one another's burdens, in taxes in the church, the town and State; on economy and diligence in business; on the duty and dignity of labor and the happiness from it; on the sin of avarice and the consequences of it to the individual and society. Next to the importance of salvation, I have tried to show the parish that the gospel demands generosity in business life, a nobleness of spirit in civil intercourse that shows that we think of something besides ourselves in the bargains we make and the votes we cast.

I have labored to make my gospel to you commend the service of Christ as worthy of your first regard. My ambition has been to make this small parish tell the most possible for the cause of Christ in the world. Wherein I have failed to enlist any family or individual in a practical way in preaching the gospel in all the earth, I feel that I have failed in my ministerial work. An individual or a church that is not identified in a practical way with the movement to give the gospel to this sinful world cannot long maintain a Christian standing that commands respect.

The church, during the years under review, has given to other churches, of her members, 113—some of them our most helpful members, as to pecuniary aid and Christian influence. This contribution took the youthful life of the church generally. It has weakened our home influence, but, thanks to God, it has strengthened others. We have not spent the years to enlarge ourselves, but the cause of Christ in the world. Our home influence is relatively less than it was forty years ago, but never, in the history of the church, has her influence been so extended and efficient for the work of the Christian church in the world as now. This contribution has been made in no narrow sectarian spirit. Our Methodist and Baptist brethren have shared it — the Presbyterians largely. It is our pride that our members are good enough for any evangelical denomination, and can work for the honor of Christ with any that hold to "Christ the head."

The benevolent organizations for which contributions have been made every year are the A. B. C. F. M., home missions, A. M. S., and Bible Society. In the early years of my ministry a contribution was regularly taken for the American Tract Society. The American Education Society, the Sabbath-school Society, and the Society for Aiding Colleges at the West, have been remembered in our contributions. We have remembered those suffering by fire and famine, also. The definite amounts that have gone from the society in these years cannot be told, as no record was kept in the early years of my ministry. The ordinary contribution has never been over $300 in any one year. There have been two small legacies. I think it would not be an over-statement to say the total of the contribution for Christian work, outside of the parish, has been $10,000. This does not include the work of the ladies in barrels and boxes of clothing for missionaries and orphan schools, which will amount to $1,500 more. It will be manifest from this that the parish has not practiced very much of self-denial for the cause of Christ during the years under review.

You are not a prodigal people, but it is doubtless true that you have spent, since I have been your pastor, many times the amount of your benevolent gifts in ways of no practical benefit to you or your families. I am sure that there has been more spent in the parish yearly for tobacco than has been given for benevolent purposes—I think I may add to this the salary of the pastor. We should have been richer to-day, as a people, financially, been happier and more united, if we had given more generously for others' good. You have spent on the church, in repairs and for bell, $5,500 since I have been your pastor.

There has been a weekly prayer-meeting maintained in the parish during my ministry; the attendance has generally been small. For many years it was held with the families near the church. For a number of years we had a weekly meeting for the young people, which was quite largely attended for some time, but was gradually neglected, and revived in different forms as a Bible class and a prayer-meeting. The benefits of these social meetings have not been fully prized by the church. As a consequence, our years together have been, comparatively, barren of conversions. The great mistake of these years, as it appears to me, is, we have been more anxious to build up our church than to save the lost. This is a common mistake. To live is not the whole of life. We must do the work of Christ, lead men—sinful men—to him for salvation, if our church has vital growth. The person that spends all his thoughts in care of his health will always be a feeble man. We are placed in the world not to live simply, but to do something.

There has generally been a willingness in the church to share the pecuniary support of the parish, but time and effort have been sparingly given to lead sinners to Christ. This is the great work of the Christian. No amount of paying in money can cancel the Christian's obligation.

There have been added to the church by profession, during these forty years, as follows: 1843, 2; 1844, 1; 1845, 6; 1846, 1; 1849, 1; 1851, 3; 1853, 12; 1855, 1; 1856, 8; 1859, 2; 1860, 3; 1861, 1; 1863, 2; 1864, 3; 1866, 3; 1867, 3; 1868, 31; 1871, 1; 1874, 2; 1876, 3; 1878, 1; 1879, 1; 1880, 1; 1882, 2; in all, 94. There have been received by letter, 37. We have lost by death, 84, and 3 have been excommunicated, making in all, including removals, 200, while we have received only 131, which shows a loss of membership of the church of 69. We now report only 79 members. While we accept this as an evidence of my unfaithfulness and mourn over it, I find comfort somewhat in the fact that the larger part of our loss has been in the furtherance of the cause of Christ. Those we have dismissed to other churches have taken from us families from which we would naturally look for an increase, and from which we know the church has received large increase. Infant baptisms, 100.

I find a corresponding decrease in the population of the parish. I do not know what the population of the parish was in 1842, but I cannot count more than 350 that can now properly be said to belong to the parish. Unless you have given thought to the subject, you will be surprised to know how many farms have been given up to pastures or united with other farms, where there were families living in 1842. I think there are 24. From some of them the buildings have all disappeared; on others they remain empty or occupied by some transient family. On some of these farms, in 1842, were large families; but this decrease in houses in the parish is not the most discouraging look. When I visited the families in the early years of my ministry I was greeted by children, but in the later years we meet but comparatively few children. It is hopeful to be able to say that there has been a great improvement in the past few years. Though the parish has decreased in population, my estimate of its importance as a field of ministerial labor has not changed. It has been, is now and always will be a center of large influence, either for good or evil. Ministerial and Christian labor will not be useless.

When I came here there was no railroad in the state; none nearer, I think, than Old Concord, Mass. A telegraph was not known. A telephone was a thing unheard of. These means of communication have connected larger towns, but have left this parish out in the cold. We must go out to get into the current that is rushing by. Very few come in. We can enjoy only the blessedness of giving out. It is worthy of our best efforts to make what we give of worth to the world.

I would refer, in this review, to what I have not preached.

I have not preached myself. I do not mean by this that I have been free from selfishness in my ministry. I know there has been too much. But I think I can say in good conscience that I have not remained these years in any expectation of wealth or honor of this world. The question has been asked me a number of times, if I would accept of an invitation to show myself in other pulpits as a candidate. I have always replied, I was under obligation to the West Parish so long as they fulfilled their engagements with me, and I had evidence I was approved of my master. I have not studied to be a popular minister. Perhaps it would have been better for the parish and the cause of Christ if I had been more thoughtful in that direction.

You will bear witness to the truth of my words, if I say I have not preached my own wants. I do not know how it is, but my wants have all been supplied in some way, so that no one in the parish has ever heard any complaint from me about my support. I have never asked you to increase my salary. If I have ever been short in my means, as has often been the case, I have regarded it as the common lot of thousands, and waited for some way of relief. Ministers are not the only class that are obliged to put up with small income. When I settled with you, 40 years ago, my salary, $400.00, and parsonage, valued at $50.00, was ample for my support, as my circumstances then were and the prices of the means of living then ranged. I saved a little the first ten years of my ministry, enough to pay some debts that had accumulated in my education. In 1869, you voluntarily raised my salary $100.00, and have continued the same until the present time. I have been remembered a number of times by gifts in cash of $100.00 and more each time. I have a little today, a home that I can call my own.

What I prize more than money, I have always had your sympathy in every dark hour of my ministry.

But it is due to me and you to say in this review, if I could have laid by all that I have received from other sources than my salary, it would have to-day amounted to some thousands more than I now have. I do not refer to this complainingly, but as an illustration of the fact I have stated, I have not sought yours. Like Paul, I have sought that you might be relieved as much as possible of burdens, which you might have properly been asked to bear. But I think I am as well off as my brethren in the ministry, who have preached their wants and resigned to better their condition pecuniarily.

There are but few ministers of our denomination (and it is true of all denominations) that have not changed parishes since I have been with you. In nine-tenths of the removals the question of support determined the action. My judgment, which I wish here to record, is, a small salary with a home is worth more than a large one and no home. I have not known a brother minister that has become rich by removals, rarely have they even bettered their condition financially. But parishes should remember that 40 years has made changes in habits of living. I do not say it is for the better. The fact meets us everywhere. No mother in the parish can satisfy her daughter with the expense in dress that satisfied her when a girl. Fathers do not expect their sons to appear in the simple attire, or ride in the same kind of a carriage, and have only the outfit that met their ideas when young. No business man or farmer expects to be satisfied with the small avails of the year that was enough for the ambitions of his fathers. To live in 1883 as our fathers did 50 years ago is simply to be out of society. Societies must consider these facts in providing for the support of their ministers. Ministers cannot grade their expenses by the standard of living 40 years ago better than any other family. Ministers doubtless must bear their share of responsibility for the habits of society that have made their homes transient, but not wholly. Certainly they have had to bear the effects of the change in their constant removals, without bettering their condition. This trouble of removal is not with ministers simply. Change is a national mania; change in fashions, in business, new adventures, something startling in money making, in speed in traveling, in grotesque exhibitions of style in dress or building. Nothing that has been before satisfies. All are on the stretch to be ahead. As soon as one reports 3 minutes, you will hear another say 2:40, followed quickly by 2:25. Man and beast are put on the track to be ahead. Expense is nothing. Be ahead is everything. Ministers and societies are in trouble from it. What is needful for both is to have patience and be considerate of each other's fault in this respect, and make the expenses of each other as small as possible. I could not have said this early in my ministry without seeming to hint at an increase of salary. Being made at my age and with my resignation before you, you will accept it, I trust, as thoughtfulness about a successor.

At my settlement I was allowed two Sabbaths a year for myself. But my health has been uninterruptedly good, so that I have not felt the need of an annual visit to the springs or places of recreation to improve my health. Ministerial vacations are institutions that have grown up, or at least grown into importance, during my ministry. Ministers need rest like other men without doubt, but that it needs to be taken by an annual visit to places of fashionable resort is more of a fashion than necessity. I cannot tell the number of Sabbaths I have left the parish without a supply. I think not the number of years of my ministry. Only three Sabbaths have I failed to preach from ill-health. I can think of only 10 Sabbaths that I have not preached all or part of the day during the 40 years of my ministry. Most of the Sabbaths I have preached; often three times.

I have had a class in the Sabbath School since 1844. It was a large class of old men and women, a number of them over 80 when I took it. It has changed many times in that time. It is now composed mostly of persons in middle life. There were two other classes in the school that have retained their organization, most of the time under the same teachers, Deacon Goodhue and his wife. There have been nine different superintendents of the school during my ministry. They are all living to-day, with one exception. What we have done in this department of Christian work has not been for ourselves simply. I think of the large families that were connected with the school in the early days of my ministry, that have not to-day a representative in town. I do not know where they all are now, but some of them I know are faithful men and women in the church of Christ in other places. I have often been asked if it was not discouraging to preach to a congregation, feeling that in a few years most of them were to go from the place. It is so; but I am consoled by the thought that I am not here to build up this church simply, but the church of Christ. In a community like ours we must expect that other societies and churches are to reap the fruit of what we do for Christ. I can not mention all the books of the Bible that have been made subject of study in the Sabbath School since I have known it. Early in my ministry the School went through the Assembly's Catechism, each lesson being made the subject of the sermon in the morning service. For years we have followed the lessons noted by the International Sunday School Committee. We would note this as one of the great improvements in the Sabbath School work since 1842; destined as we think, to work good not to the church simply. It is national in its influence, giving to the rising generation one rule of life.

During my ministry the church has been invited 83 times to ecclesiastical councils with sister churches, which I have attended, generally with a delegate; three times to organize new churches, four to settle difficulties between brethren or sisters. The demand for councils in the region has been mostly to settle and dismiss ministers. One of the unpleasant things in my history has been parting with ministerial brethren just as I had begun to prize them as neighbors, and wait in uncertainty for a stranger to come to their place. West Brattleboro church has had but three different ministers during the 40 years of this review. Two pastorates cover most of that period. Grafton has had only two pastorates. All the other churches in the county have made frequent changes. Some have changed many times, so I can say I have made the acquaintance of a large number of ministers of the county. I can recall the names of 106 different ministers that have ministered to our churches in the county a longer or shorter time, during my ministry here. Most of them were good men and highly educated. My intercourse with them has been generally pleasant and profitable. I loved them all, but I loved some better than others. All of those that composed the Association when I joined, May, 1843, have died, with one exception. My very dear brother Foster still lives.* I would here record my appreciation of the benefits of the Association to me. Those meetings I have generally attended with great pleasure and profit. I find on file between 30 and 50 articles in manuscript, that I have prepared for the meetings, on questions of interest to our churches.

The years I have spent here have not been years of general revival in the county, if we except one year, 1864. No church, of any denomination, has maintained its numbers by additions by profession during the years under review. This certainly is true of the churches in rural towns. The young life leaves such towns. This is especially true of religious families. This should be expected. Christianity is inspiring, diffusive, progressive. No country or family can settle into a lifeless condition, content with a living simply, that is permeated by the doctrines of the gospel. It is a moral necessity that Christian families should be the moving influence of the world. I wish I had time to read the names of those that have left the parish since I have been the minister, and notice the positions they occupy and the influence they are exerting in the church and state. Some of 113 that we have dismissed to other churches took with them families; all took impressions moral and religious here received. The membership of the church is less than 40 years ago. The population of the parish is less, but the influence of the parish never was so widely felt for good as to-day. In many respects it is more important that there be maintained vigorous Christian life in such a place as this, than in larger.

We often hear persons speak of centers of Christian and moral influences. Every moral being is such a center, whether he lives on the hills or in the valleys, the city or the rural town.

In closing I say I have had a growing impression of the importance of the West Parish ever since I have known it. You must be little among the thousands of Judah, but there has and can still come out of you the rulers of Israel. It is the glory of the gospel we preach, that it emphasizes the worth of a moral being.

There have gone from the parish during the 40 years under review, 9 physicians. They will be acknowledged as an honor to the profession by all that have known them; four clergymen, two of them have preached the gospel outside of their own land; also four lawyers; two are now filling professors' chairs in colleges. Only one has risen to the dignity of an author. A number have had the title of professor, as teachers in high schools, and in music and engineering. But professional titles are quite insignificant as showing the main current of influence, that has burst the bounds of our narrow valley these 40 years. We must see the business men, the intelligent, pious families that dot the whole land, presided over by your sons and daughters, before we can realize the importance of the West Parish as a center of influence. I have always felt it was a great thing to preach the gospel here. It is the message of the minister that makes him great, not the place. Paul never shone in brighter colors or found a higher place in his wonderful history, than when preaching Christ to his fellow prisoners, or telling the story of the cross on his journeyings among the mountains of Asfa Minor. Everywhere, whether on Mars Hill, in the school of Tyrannus or in the prayer meeting, by the river side, his greatness was in the message he bore. No church, however small, or limited by geographical bounds, need lose self-respect so long as it faithfully can say, Behold the Lamb of God that taketh away the sins of the world. The glory of any church must be in the cross of Christ. The greatness of a minister must be found in the gospel message to a lost world. Rather than feel that our parish is small, let us look upon it as large enough for our best efforts, and mourn and ask forgiveness of the Master, that we have not more fully possessed the land for him. He that touches a moral being here or anywhere else, touches chords that vibrate through eternity. As an inducement to faithfulness in the field given for us to cultivate, I say furthermore, remember our time is passing rapidly. Looking back from the point we occupy to-day, I do not see anything that has stood still. As I look back, I see the youth and children of the parish that met me 40 years ago, rushing by me, some out into the broad fields of active life. They are soon lost to sight. Some to the grave. The passer-by reads to-day the date of their birth and death. That is all that is known of them. I see, too, those that were then the occupants of these farms, passing by me. The sound of their driving, their threshing, their buying and selling soon ceases. The grave holds silent watch over them to-day. I see those of the parish then approaching manhood, rushing by me, to take the places their fathers had just left, striking out for larger fields and with a rush grasping for more than their fathers had, and in a few years of struggle lie down in the grave, or they are lost to my sight in the great business thoroughfares of our growing country. I see, too, the aged of the parish that met me then, moving by me with halting steps.

They are soon out of my sight. Their sun quickly goes down before me. It is as still as night where they were. It seems but the work of the day passing in my dreams at night. No, nothing stands still here that is of lasting interest to me or you or the world. It is the great interest of humanity that crowds upon our thoughts and pushes us to the front and onward, and urges us to faithfulness for the Master who has given us this vineyard to cultivate. This vineyard. Here in this narrow valley we find our field of labor. Here we measure our strength for usefulness, and count the results of our lives that are to appear at the judgment day. It will not be asked there how much improvement you have made on your farms, in your flocks and houses. These have their importance, and I am proud, as you have occasion to be, in the change for the better that has taken place since I first knew the parish. But other things are to determine the result of our lives. We are touching, in all we do as minister and people, that which is to last; while our opportunities are rapidly passing in which we can be of any use to the world. How many opportunities have been lost by neglect since I have been with you, I cannot tell. I have anxiety, a shrinking from the opening of the books that are to show my 40 years passed with you. I and you have forgotten much of these years, but we shall know it all then. I shall never review another 40 years with you, but I shall stand with you in the judgment day. Our years together will then be more perfectly reviewed. Nothing will be left to conjecture or doubt. We shall find it all written. It will be read.

I only wish to say these 40 years have passed quickly. It seems but a little while. They have passed pleasantly. Much has occurred that I could wish otherwise, but nothing that has produced permanent alienation between pastor and people. To have been permitted to preach Christ Jesus to you so long a time is a privilege of which I am unworthy. How much longer this privilege shall be continued, I shall leave to you and the Master to determine. I feel thankful to my Heavenly Father for these years; for my health, and favor with this town and the county and state. My ministerial relations in the county and state, and the other side of the river too, have been pleasant. I feel thankful to this church and society for their patience with my many faults and their forbearance with me as their minister so long. I have not had the misfortune to quarrel with my deacons or the singers, not often with any of the parish. I can account for this only on the supposition that they have regarded my thoughtless, foolish words unworthy of their notice.

If it shall be ordered that the present relation should continue a little longer, I hope it will be peaceful and fruitful in conversions of sinners, and growth of Christian graces in the church and society. When you wish my active pastorate to close, I hope you will frankly tell me. I shall receive it kindly. I only ask you to let my pastorate formally remain, and me have a home with you and be of use to you as a Christian and a citizen. When I die let me rest with your dead. I want to wait with them for the morning of the resurrection.

WESTMINSTER.

EAST AND WEST PARISHES, CONCLUSION.

REV. F. J. FAIRBANKS, the writer of the History of Westminster, was the minister of the Congregational church there from April, 1863, to April, 1871; 40 members being added during his ministrations to the church; during his pastorate, he wrote out the history of the East Parish.

Native also of Westminster is the Rev. C. A. Dickenson, graduate of Harvard and of Andover Theological Seminary; pastor of Portland, Me., and Lowell, Mass.—F. J. F.

HENRY CRAWFORD, born in Westminster, Sept. 21, 1793; fitted at Chesterfield (N. H.) Academy. He studied law with Hon. Wm. C. Bradley, of Westminster, and practiced in Walpole, N. H., till 1822, when he removed to Utica, N. Y., and practiced there till his death in March, 1835.—REV. H. WHITE.

CHAS. M. EMERSON, son of Rev. Reuben and Persis Emerson. Born 1798, graduated at Dartmouth College in 1809; studied and practiced law in Hartford, Ct., Providence, R. I. and New Orleans, La.; he married twice.

GEORGE CAMPBELL, a leading agriculturist, died at his home in West Westminster, May 22, 1882, in his 64th year. He was an enthusiastic breeder of Merino sheep, attaining, in that industry, a world-wide reputation. In his efforts for the improvement and exhibition of his flock, he traveled extensively, visiting England, Scotland, Germany, France and Spain, and many States of our own country. He was a spirited exhibitor, his sheep taking highest honors at State, National and International, as well as local exhibitions. He made frequent and large sales of sheep for shipment to nearly every country on the globe where fine wool is produced, sending a car-load from his own flock to Montana but a few weeks before his death.

He was one of the founders, and, for many years, one of the directors of the State Agricultural Society, and Vice-President of the New England Agricultural Society; a staunch democrat, —eminently just and public-spirited, and commanded the respect of all who knew him. Through a long and very painful illness he retained his interest in public affairs, and especially in the improvement of sheep, which was a work of love that ended only with his life.

He married in May, 1839, Adaline Wilcox, of this town. Children: E. L. Campbell, now of Comstock's Landing, N. Y.; and F. G. and C. H. Campbell, both of Westminster West, and both leading agriculturists; and Carrie C., wife of C. Horace Hubbard, Esq., of Springfield.—From Obituaries.

The wife of John Lane was Olive Jennings, or she was sister of Leah, wife of Capt. Jesse Burke. Jesse Burke was the father of Elijah, and Elijah the father of Hon. Edmund Burke. Thus, Edmund Burke's grandmother, Leah, was sister to my great grandmother, Olive. The Clarks, Scott and Perez were my great grandfather and grandfather, respectively.

CAPT. THEODORE COLE.

In 1694, one Thomas Cole, husband-man, was at Salem, Mass. He may have been the one who came to the Colony in the Mary and John in 1633 and was an original proprietor of Hampton, but this is uncertain. He died in Apr. 1679 leaving two sons, Abraham and John, the latter of whom born in 164— married Mary Knight, May 18, 1667. She died before 1675, and before 1686, he married Sarah Alsbee. He was a cooper by trade and lived first in Salem, then in Malden and last in Lynn where he died Oct. 8, 1703.

His oldest son was John, born in Salem, May 18, 1668. He married Mary Eaton and in 1721 removed from Lynn to Boxford, Mass., and settled in what was afterwards the West Parish. He died suddenly, Feb. 5, 1737. His widow died, Oct. 1, 1746. His oldest son, Jonathan, born in Lynn, 1696, removed to Harvard, Mass., 1696, and in his old age to Westmoreland, N. H. where he died in 1780. He had three sons: Jonathan, one of the grantees of Westmoreland, N. H.; Abijah, who died in Harvard, Mass, in 1768; and John, a soldier of the Revolution, serving as a captain against Burgoyne. He lived his last years in Windham, Vt. His descendants are found in Londonderry.

ABIJAH COLE, named above, was the grandfather of Theodore Cole, a soldier in one of the expeditions against Quebec. On his return, 1757, he married Sarah Kent of Harvard. He died, 1768, about thirty-six, leaving three daughters and two sons. Abijah and Asa. Abijah settled in Prospect Harbor Hancock Co. Me., where his descendants are very numerous. Asa, born in 1768; his early boyhood was passed in Westmoreland, N. H. He learned the mill-wright's trade of his step-father, Samuel Garfield, and worked with him in many places in Massachusetts and in Maine. Jan. 1793, he married Anna Goldsmith of Harvard, resided in Ringe and Westmoreland; died, Dec. 6, 1816, leaving a wife and large family. She was a superior woman and by great exertion kept her children with her until able to go their various ways in life. She afterward married Amory Pollard, whom she survived and died with her daughter, Mrs. Orin Pitkin, in Montpelier, Vt., Sept. 4, 1852.

Children of Asa and Anna Cole:— Asa, died in West Medway, Mass, in 1872, aged 79. Richard Goldsmith, Cashier of a Bank in Burlington from 1832 till his death, and a leading man among the Episcopalians of Vermont. He died in 1864, aged 69; Sarah, married Asa Farnsworth, and died in Londonderry, Vt., aged 35; Benjamin died at Chargres, Panama, 1850, aged 51; Anna Goldsmith, married Rev. Isaac Estey, for a time pastor of the church in Westminster, and long a resident there, died in Amherst, Mass. in 1872, aged 70; Philena, died in Brattleboro, Vt., in 1859, aged 55; John, long a successful whaling captain, afterwards at Walpole, N. H. and Medway, Mass., died in Westmoreland, N. H., 1875, aged 68; Susan married 1st, Elihu Whitcomb; 2d, Orin Pitkin of Montpelier, Vt., where she lived many years; died at 74, 1873; William died at 19, 1830; Theodore; and Charles, who died at 37 from injuries by a whale while in command of a whale ship in 1853.

THEODORE COLE, tenth born of Asa and Anna Cole, Westmoreland, N. H., May 11, 1813, at 9 years old went to live with Abijah French, farmer and lumberman of Westmoreland; lived with him till the summer of 1834; the spring of 1835 when to New Bedford and shipped as seaman on a whale ship, voyage,

18 months; his 2d, April 1837, round the world, was 2 years; his 3d voyage, sailing the fall of 1837, returned in '42, going out second mate in the ship Julian and after a year or more transferred to the barque Pacific as mate. At thirty, he had circumnavigated the globe twice. May, 1843, as master of the ship Parachute he began his 4th voyage, the third around the world and most successful. He returned in July, 1845, and in August married Livilla, daughter of Capt. Wilson Gleason, a prominent and lifelong citizen of Westmoreland, and one of the best known of the old time drovers of Vermont and N. H. Oct. 1845, sailing his 5th voyage; gone 2 years, 10 months. Nov. 1848, he set sail for the Arctic Ocean and Mrs. Cole accompanied him. They sailed round Cape Horn to the Sandwich Islands, where he left Mrs. Cole and steered for Behrings strait. He remained one season in the Arctic Ocean, discovering the Plover Islands, July 15, 1849, although he never claimed the title or credit of a discoverer. On return to the Sandwich Islands, he sailed, Mrs. C. again with him, to Hong Kong, China, where he prepared for another Arctic voyage. They sailed north through the Japan Sea to the Arctic Ocean, where he completed his cargo and started for home, arriving at New Bedford, Mar. 22, 1851. Having now a competency, he decided to give up the sea and as idleness was not to his taste, he engaged in manufacturing and merchandizing in Brattleboro where he remained till 1859, when he purchased a farm in Westminster, where he removed and lived for 7 years, identifying himself with the interests of the town and citizens; in 1862, representing the town in the Legislature. In 1867, he removed to Waverly Village, Belmont, Mass., for better educational facilities. In 1875, he made a prospecting and pleasure trip to California and Colorado, and then moved to Westmoreland N. H., which town, he represented in the Legislature in 1881-82; and there he died, July 2, 1885.

Children of Captain Theodore and Mrs. Livilla Gleason Cole were five: Lucy, Sarah, and Richard G. are dead.

FRANK THEODORE, born in Brattleboro, Vt. June 22, 1853; graduated at Williston Seminary in 1873, and at Williams College in 1877; received the degree of LL. B. on his graduating at the Columbia Law School, 1879; admitted to the Bar of New York, Dec. 1879; to the Bar of Ohio, Feb. 1880; since which time, engaged in practice in Columbus, Ohio, and has been more or less prominent in the charitable and political interests of the city.

WILLIAM HENRY, born in Brattleboro, Aug. 19, 1854; went to Wyoming, 1874; Black Hills, 1875; to California, 1877, 9 years raising grain there; married, June 3, 1883; Addie M. Green, San Joaquin Co., Cal.; has one daughter, Edith. He is now a farmer in Westminster, Vt.

WARDSBORO.

By JOHN P. WARREN, M. D.

WARDSBORO.

MANUSCRIPT BY THE LATE DR. WARREN OF BRATTLEBORO.

The town of Wardsborough is west of the centre of Windham county in the second tier of towns on the eastern slope of the Green Mountains, bounded E. by Newfane and Townshend, S. by Dover, W. by Somerset and Stratton, and N. by Jamaica. The centre of the town is 9 miles from Fayetteville and 20 from Brattleboro. It was granted and chartered by Vermont, Nov. 7, 1780, to William Ward of Newfane, and 62 associates. An act was passed Oct. 18, 1788, dividing the town into two districts, to be called the North and the South districts. The two districts were substantially separate towns, each having a separate board of town officers. They met together once in a year for the election of State officers and a town representative. The districts were incorporated Oct. 30, 1810, into two distinct towns, the northern Wardsborough and the southern Dover, surveyed and allotted by a Mr. Camden.

MARCH MEETING.

The first annual March meeting warned by Luke Knowlton, justice of the peace, was held at the dwelling house of John Jones in Wardsborough, Tuesday, March 14, 1786, and Luke Knowlton was chosen moderator; Aaron Hudson, town clerk; Ithamar Allen, John Ganson, Abner Holbrook, Eben. Sears, Jacob Chamberlain, selectmen, and duly sworn; Philip Newell, treasurer, sworn; Thomas Jewett and Abner Slade, constables, sworn; James Wallis, Abner Perry and Roger Birchard, listers, sworn; Samuel Davis and Edward Walker, grand jurors, sworn; Abner Allen, supervisor, sworn; Samuel Briant, leather sealer, sworn; Elijah Baldwin and John Jones, tythingmen, sworn; Bazaleel Gleason, horse brander; John Ganson, Silas Wright, Elkanah Woodcock, Thaddeus Wright, Samuel Davis, John and Abner Perry, highway surveyors, and sworn.

FIRST SETTLERS.

Zadock Thompson in his Gazetteer of Vermont, 2d edition, 1840, states, upon what authority is unknown to the writer, that John Jones and Ithamar Allen were the pioneers in the settlement of the town. It is shown, however, by the town records that Samuel Davis and wife came into town about one year prior to that of Mr. Jones and Mr. Allen, as his eldest son, Ebenezer, was born May 18, 1779, being the first birth in the town; whereas Jones and Allen did not arrive in town with their families until June, 1780.

Mr. Davis purchased a lot of land in the west part of the town on which he lived many years, and reared a large family. Mr. Davis' native town was Milford, Mass.

Mr. Allen removed from Sturbridge, Mass., with his family, and began a settlement in the north-westerly part of the town where he resided until 1804, when he left town.

Mr. Jones, born in Milford, Mass., came from Orange, Mass., with six sons and three daughters, and commenced a mile or more southeast of the centre of the township. His eldest daughter married Lemuel Braley, and the second Nathaniel Gould. These are believed to have been the first marriages in town.

Other settlers who came early were Phillip Newell, Asa Wheelock, Abner Holbrook, Elijah Holbrook, Josiah Brown, Thomas Jewett, Aaron Hudson, Elkanah Woodcock, Stephen Warren, John Stacy, Asa Underwood, John Holbrook. A large majority of these were young men under 30, of an intelligent class. Some of the number were veterans of the Revolutionary army.

BY REV. JAMES TUFTS, JR.

The Congregational church was organized at the house of John Rice, May 1, 1793, consisting of 12 members—8 males and 4 females: John Smith, Abner Hazelton, John Jones, Samuel Chapin, Lemuel Bryant, Edward Walker, Daniel Hazelton, Asa Jones, Abigail Jones, Elizabeth Smith, Eunice Walker and Beulah Chapin.

Rev. James Tufts was ordained the first pastor, Nov. 4, 1794, and continued pastor 42 years, and for five years senior pastor.

REV. EBEN'Z. G. BRADFORD was installed colleague pastor, Oct. 5, 1836, and dismissed in 1842.

REV. WILLARD BRIGHAM

was ordained over the North church.

REV. S. G. TENNEY was ordained over the South church. The churches have since united.

REV. JAMES TUFTS

was born in New Braintree, Mass., of William and Margaret Tufts, Sept. 30, 1764; graduated at Brown University, 1789, and completed his theological studies with Dr. Emons of Franklin. He was ordained Nov. 4, 1794, at the house of Col. Dan'l Reed.

The first postoffice in town was kept by Mr. Tufts. He was postmaster for over 29 years, and his house was the only office for the three towns of Wardsboro, Stratton, and Somerset.

He died a happy death, Aug. 11, 1841, aged nearly 77, and was buried among his own people, beside the graves of those at whose funerals he had officiated.

THE FIRST MINISTER'S WIFE IN TOWN.

Submit Hayden (Mrs. Tufts,) was born in Grafton, Mass., April 18, 1777, daughter of Daniel Hayden and Submit Flag Hayden, and married to Mr. Tufts, Feb. 1807.

Children: Submit J., — Tufts, born Feb. 29, 1808; married Allen Morron, in 1835, has lived mostly in Aurora and Clinton, N. Y., educated their son at Hamilton College. Mrs. Submit Tufts Morron died Sept. 14, 1878.

Eliza Tufts, born Sept. 9, 1809, married Hollis T. Robinson, Esq., of Newfane, 1830. They lived in Canada till 1848; since then in Williamsville, Vt. Mrs. Eliza Tufts Robinson died Feb. 15, 1885.

Nancy Tufts, born May 29, 1811, married Hon. Marshal Newton, of Newfane, 1836; has lived in Fayetteville, Vt.

REV. JAMES TUFTS, JR.,

born Nov. 2, 1812, graduated at Yale College in 1838. He taught in the Academy in Fairfield, Ct., two years. Was superintendent of schools in Windham county, 1848-'49; has resided in Monson the last 33 years, engaged in teaching; was married in 1855 to Mary E. Warren, daughter of Dr. J. P. Warren, Wardsboro.

JOHN TUFTS,

born Sept. 11, 1814, married D. S. Barber of Townshend, 1847; justice of the peace, State senator two years. He sold the home farm in Wardsboro in 1850, removed to a farm in Geneseo, Ill. He died Feb. 15, 1885. He was a man who will long be remembered for the good he has done—one of those men whose very presence is a rebuke to evil. He leaves a wife and six children—five sons and one daughter, all of whom but one, Dr. A. H. Tufts of Sioux Falls, Dak., were present at the funeral.

The youngest of the family of the old pastor of Wardsboro church was Fanny Woodbury Tufts, born April 17, 1816; married Dr. John Cooke, Manchester, Vt., died in English-town, N. J., June, 1865.

THE BAPTIST CHURCH

of Wardsborough was organized Oct. 1792, by a council composed of five pastors and delegates, Elder Aaron Leland of Chester, moderator, and John Dyer of Jamaica, clerk.

ELD. SIMEON COOMBS was installed in 1795. He was from Massachusetts and was the first preacher, and had the reputation of being a zealous minister. The deacons were Lemuel Braley and Ebenezer Sears.

The society erected their meeting-house on land of Noah Sherman in 1795.

ELD. STEPHEN CHOATE

succeeded Elder Coombs in 1803; ordained over this church in 1806; continued his labors until 1811, when they were terminated by death.

After the decease of Elder Choate, Elder Calvin Orcutt was pastor until 1815; Elder John Shepardson until 1818; Elder Lyman Glazier preached from 1818 to 1824; Elder Joseph Gambill, pastor, 1824-1830.

Elder P. B. Fish from 1830-1836, preached for the church.

Elder Joshua Vincent was ordained over the church at the close of Elder Fish's pastorate.

METHODIST CHURCH.

The earliest Methodist preaching began in 1825. It was connected with Jamaica, Windham, Fayetteville, and Stratton, and called New-fane Circuit. In 1831 the name of the circuit was changed to Wardsboro. During the year the M. E. church was organized under the supervision of Rev. Guy Beckley and colleague, Rev. J. M. Fuller, with 29 members, and increased during the year to 44. Up to this and the succeeding year, the meetings were held in school houses and private dwellings in different parts of the town.

In 1832 their church edifice was built.

THE PREACHERS

during this period were Revs. A. Adams, Z. Twitchill, A. K. Howard, H. Johnson, Charles Olin, H. I. Wooley, B. D. Brewster, C. W. Leavings, W. B. Locke, H. Nutter, G. W. Perham, M. Spencer, C. R. Harding.

In 1842, the M. E. Church became an independent station under the care of one pastor. From this period to the present, 1870, the following pastors have received appointments by the Vermont Conference: Revs. I. Smith, C. W. Kellogg, I. A. Kellogg, I. A. Sherburn, P. P. Ray, I. W. Bemis, H. Eastman, K. Hadley, I. L. Smith, D. Wells, H. I. Forest, W. B. Howard, C. P. Flanders. Succeeding Mr. Flanders was Rev. George E. Chapman. Some of the number were veterans of the Revolutionary army. Their moral and religious characteristics were soon manifested by their inaugurating measures for the support of the preaching of the gospel, and for common district schools; for it is recorded: "April, 1789, that the town voted to raise a certain sum for preaching."

FACE OF THE TOWNSHIP, SOIL, ETC.

As has been represented, the surface of this township is "very uneven and some parts of it rocky," but in neither of these respects is it as much so as some of the adjoining towns. Between this town and Dover there is a range of high hills—a spur from the Green Mountains, which extend from west to east parallel with and nearly on the line which separates the towns.

The eastern part of the town is comparatively level. At the extreme western section upon a high bluff there is presented one of the most magnificent landscapes on which the eye ever rested. The crests of the Green Mountains, Monadnock, Ascutney, Wachuset, and White Mountains are distinctly in view in a cloudless day.

CENSUS POPULATION.

In 1791, 483; 1800, 868; 1810, 1159; 1820, 1016; 1830, 1148; 1840, 1102; 1850, 1112; 1860, 1004; 1870, 866.

The timber is a large growth of the sugar and white maple, beach, birch, ash, bass wood, spruce and hemlock. There was also a large growth of the white pine at an early period of the settlement.

The town is well watered. The main stream, the North Branch, so called, is formed chiefly by the union of two rivulets which rise one in Somerset, the other in Stratton and near the base of the Green Mountains, and uniting with some other streams flows through the entire length of the town and falls into the West River in Jamaica.

MATTHEW MARTIN

came into town with his family of four children from Brattleboro, in 1796, and built the first grist-mill, and first saw-mill. He died Jan. 1831, aged 94 years.

BUSINESS.

There are now in town 2 grist-mills, 6 saw-mills, 2 tanneries, 6 dry goods and grocery stores, 2 taverns, 7 school districts and houses, 4 meeting-houses, viz: 2 Cong'l., 1 Bap., 1 Meth.; shops for the manufacture of buckets, pails, boxes, sieves, etc., have been in operation some years at a place called Unionville.

The first fulling and dressing-mill for cloth was built by Shepard Ellis, 1802.

A machine for carding wool was built by Joseph Crosby a few rods east of the centre of the town in 1806 and he soon came with his family. In connection with his carding machine, Mr. Crosby built a cabinet-shop, and his son-in-law, Joseph Sweetser, built a tannery; about this time, also, came other mechanics and among them Joseph Wilder, the blacksmith, and since the place is known as Wilder Hollow.

AUTOMATIC LATHE.

Within the last few years, Frederick Baldwin, a native of the town, by his own unaided efforts has invented and put in operation a machine, which he styles the automatic lathe, and which can among other things, turn bed-posts, fish-poles of any desired length, and the most delicate penholder. Rights patented have been sold in all the New England States. Mr. Baldwin, has of late made some improvements to render his lathe more practical by which house-mouldings, etc., of any style can be wrought.

FIRST SCHOOLS.

It cannot be determined with accuracy who taught the first district school in town. Mr. William Simpson, a son-in-law of Mr. John Jones, taught several winters in the east part of the town. William Allen, son of Sylvester Allen, taught a school in the winter of 1800, at the dwelling-house of Elijah Holbrook in the west part of the town. These were among the first, if not the very first teachers. Stephen Choate taught school in 1803.

SAMANTHA ROBBINS, was an accomplished teacher. She married Clarendon Mussey of Middlebury, this State, and went a missionary to India, where she died a few years since.

MARY KIDDER,

a daughter of John Kidder of this town was for a time a teacher of schools at the West. She has now gone as a missionary and teacher to Japan.

PAUL DAVIS,

one of the earliest settlers in town and town clerk in 1788.

REVOLUTIONARY SOLDIERS.

Of these were John Stacey, Samuel Kenney, Hinsdale Hammond, Asa Wheelock, Stephen Warren, Elisha Converse, Daniel Read, Eph'm. Rice, Nath'l Chamberlain, Adam Howard, Edward Walker, Gideon Brimhall, David Harris, Thomas Bogle.

JOHN STACEY

participated in the battle of Yorktown, Virginia; but does not appear ever to have been a pensioner.

SAMUEL KENNEY

served during the war of the Revolution in the artillery and had a discharge in the hand-writing of General Knox, which was shown to the writer, and for which the soldier was required no other voucher to entitle him to a pension from the Government.

ASA WHEELOCK AND HINSDALE HAMMOND.

Asa Wheelock and Hinsdale Hammond were both at the battle of Saratoga; Wheelock appears on our pension list; Hammond does not.

STEPHEN WARREN

was at Boston in 1795; at the battle on Long Island in 1778.

ELISHA CONVERSE,

also a hero of the Revolutionary time, was in the battle of Bunker Hill.

OUR REVOLUTIONARY PENSIONERS.

Daniel Read, Asa Wheelock, Eph'm. Rice, Gideon Brimhall, Nath'l Chamberlain, Daniel Harris, Thomas Bogle, Edward Walker, Samuel Kenney.

An interesting reminiscence of an event which occurred while that portion of the army under the command of Gen. Washington was encamped in the State of New Jersey, in 1778, from the mouth of two of the above witnesses, and communicated verbally to the writer, was as follows:

An order had been given to build a breast-work within the lines, and a squad of men detailed to perform that service under the charge of a corporal who felt the grave responsibility of the position which had been assigned him, but who knew not Gen. Washington personally. As the work was nearing completion, the General attended by his staff officers, came to inspect it, and perceiving the need of some more pieces of turf to round off the breast-work, spoke to the corporal to lay it, to which he indignantly replied that he was a corporal and did not lay turf. Without uttering a word in reply the General removed his gloves and laid on the turf and passed along the line. Many of the soldiers of the party knew the General and before he was out of their sight three rousing cheers and "a tiger" were given for the general, and the corporal was from that time, made the scorn and derision of the army, as he deserved to be.

THE MILITIA.

The first militia company here was commanded by Capt. Dan'l Read, afterward known as Gen. Read. His successor in office was Abner Perry. The first captain in the north district was CAPT. NOAH SHERMAN.

The company was formed about the year 1799 or 1800. They first met for drill in the month of June on the farm of Ithamar Allen in the northwest part of the town.

FIELD OFFICERS:

Daniel Read was promoted to the office of brigadier general at an early period in the history of the town.

He was a gallant and meritorious officer.

Of the subordinates, Abner Holbrook, Jonathan Robinson, Holland Plimpton were colonels; Henry Wheelock and William Kelly, Jr., were majors.

SOLDIERS OF THE WAR OF 1812.

Daniel Read, John Braley, John Caffrey, Fuller Boyle, Joseph Smith.

FIRST JUSTICES OF THE PEACE.

Aaron Hudson, Asa Wheelock, Rufus Harvey, Josiah Brown, Daniel Read, Perley Fairbanks, Nathaniel Cheney, Asa Felton.

MERCHANTS.

The first merchant who kept a store in town was

JOHN HOLBROOK,

who came from Newfane in 1789 or '90, and established himself and family near the residence of John Jones.

OTHER EARLY MERCHANTS.

Josiah Brown opened a store at the Centre, 1800—perhaps a year or two earlier. In 1804 he sold to Nathaniel Cheney, who came from Orange, Mass., with a family of five children. He also kept the first tavern. Mr. Cheney sold his store, etc., in 1814.

Benjamin Head opened a dry goods and grocery store at the North Village, then known as "Martin's Mills," 1803.

He remained in town a short time only and was succeeded by two young men, Brown & Stevens, from New Hampshire, Mass. Brown & Stevens sold to Nath'l Chapin, and Jonathan Robbins bought of Chapin in 1810. Other merchants who sold goods in town at an early day were Leland Fairbanks, Nathaniel, Jr., and Adin Thayer.

PHYSICIANS.

The first physician in town was Dr. Samuel Wheeler. He was succeeded by Dr. Paul Wheeler, of whom mention is made elsewhere in these papers.

Of those who have practiced here are Dr. Thomas Barker, whom the writer remembers as an eccentric and intemperate man, who soon left town. Drs. — Allen, W. R. Ranney, J. P. Warren, C. W. Barber, —Austin, A. H. Gilman, A. H. Pettie, H. Ranney, S. Ranney, A. Johnson, S. R. Billings and brother, E. P. Burton, Dana Hyde, M. F. Bliss, —Hungerford and F. Martin. Drs. Bliss and Martin alone remain in town. (1870.)

ASA WHELOCK, ESQ.

was born in Shewsbury, Mass., in 1759. He came to town before the close of the Revolutionary war, 1782; purchased a lot of land about a mile southeast of the centre of the town. This became his permanent residence. After making this purchase for a homestead, he returned to his regiment in the army, until the peace of 1783. He was twice married. His first wife, Lucy Maynard of Shrewsbury, died of consumption, and a few years after, he married Abigail Read of Worcester, Mass. Three sons were the fruit of the first, and two sons and four daughters of the second marriage. He was chosen town clerk in 1791, and held the office 36 years; was a justice of the peace 54 years; represented the town in the legislature 20 years, and was twice elected a member of the constitutional convention of the State. He died, May 23, 1842, aged 83 years.

PAUL WHEELER, M. D.

was born in Rutland, Mass., 1771. In childhood and in youth he was in full health. When about eighteen his father sent him to Leicester Academy where he studied English and Latin, and commenced the study of medicine at twenty-one, with Dr. Reuben Walker, Barre, Mass., whose office he left after two or more years with out-fit of horse, saddle, bridle, medicines, medical books, surgical instruments and 100 silver dollars, to see what dame fortune had in store for him in the new settlements of Vermont.

Having an uncle in the South district, he commenced practice near him, 1794, but soon removed to the South district where he made his permanent home. Middlebury college conferred upon him the honorary degree of M. D. in 1825. He was our representative three years to the legislature, and held many other offices in the gift of the town.

From 1803 to 1814, Drs. Marcus Robbins, Chester Thayer, Shelamath Hall and Eli Perry, were educated in his office and practice. After 1836, the Doctor relinquished practice. He died suddenly July 24, 1846, aged 75 years.

WILLIAM WARD.

from whom the town took its name, was born in Mendon, Worcester, County Mass. He married Hannah Taft of that town in 1778, and soon removed with her to Newfane, Vt. In the record of the town he is styled Col. Ward. One writer, speaking of him, asserts he was chosen the first representative, 1778, to the legislature; but this is a mistake as the records do not show it.

It has been said of him that before the war of the Revolution, he and some others went to Canada for a load of furs and were arrested on the suspicion of being spies, thrown into prison and he died there. The others who were taken with him were released, soon after his death. His widow married Moses Joy of Putney, where she died in February, 1842, aged 86 years.

HON. ABNER HAZELTINE, M. C., son of Daniel Hazeltine, one of the early settlers, was born June, 1793; graduated at Williams College, 1815, at the age of 22 years; commenced the practice of law in Jamestown, N. Y.; served two terms in Congress from 1833 to 1837; was several years district attorney and county judge four years. He died Dec. 14, 1879, at the age of 86.

Laban Hazeltine studied medicine in town and practiced in Jamestown, N. Y., for many years. He was a man of superior and well cultivated mind and a much esteemed physician and citizen.

Abraham Hazeltine studied medicine with the writer and practiced in Warren, Pa. He was much beloved as a man and physician.

Jon'a. B. Kidder, son of Samuel Kidder, graduated at Middlebury in 1821, in the 17th year of his age. He has been a teacher and occasionally preached.

Rev. Corbin Kidder graduated at Amherst College in 1828, and studied divinity at Andover, Mass. He was ordained at Saxonville over a Congregational church, and afterward settled in West Brattleboro. He died in Popple Grove, Ill., December, 1874.

Rev. Pascal P. P. Kidder, brother of the above, was graduated at Yale College in 1836, and is an Episcopal rector in Western New York.

Alberoni Kidder has been a Congregational minister in the West, but has retired from the ministry.

Samuel Kidder died while a student of Lane Seminary, Ohio in 1841.

These four sons were born to

NATHANIEL KIDDER, who with four other brothers came into town from Dudley, Mass., and bought farms adjoining each other and were all exemplary citizens.

Nathan E. Felton was graduated at Middlebury, 1821. He studied law and is in practice in Haverhill, N. H.

Rev. James Tufts, Jr., son of Rev. Jame Tufts, was graduated at Yale College in 1838.

Lafayette Ward took his A. B. at Dartmouth College in 1846, and devoted his life to teaching.

James S. Thayer was graduated at Amherst in 1838. He was a lawyer of distinction in New York.

Professor R. L. C. Robbins, a graduate of Middlebury in 1835, is now a professor of Greek in that college.

David Robbins, father of professor Robbins above mentioned, was a noted teacher, and for many years county surveyor. He died in the great sickness of 1813.

J. Parker Warren and Mark Warren, sons of David Warren, read law and were admitted to the bar.

Luke Warren, son of David Warren, is a physician in the West.

Calvin Ward practiced law several years in Springfield, Vt., and also in Newfane.

Adams Davis, son of Samuel Davis, the first settler, studied law.

Oliver Plympton, a son of Abner Plympton, entered the ministry and preached in Peru. He died in 1813, and was buried on the day he was to have been married.

Frederick Wheelock is in the practice of medicine in Albion, Mich.

Daniel Walker studied medicine and settled in Georgia.

G. W. Barber practiced medicine many years in De Peyster, N. Y., but became insane and committed suicide.

Chas. A. White graduated at Williams College in 1817, graduated at the Dartmouth Medical College in 1820, and practiced medicine over 50 years.

Edward Jenner Warren, son of John Parker Warren, was an alumnus of Dartmouth College. He became eminent as a lawyer and judge in North Carolina.

Lieut. John Wheelock Warren, son of John Parker Warren, entered Williams College in the class of 1860, but was compelled by failing health to relinquish the course. At the outbreak of the rebellion he enlisted in the 1st Wis. Cavalry and served in that Regt. till March, 1865, when he was mustered out. He was several times wounded and for some months was a prisoner of war in the prison at Salisbury, N. C. He died at Brattleboro, March 27, 1875.

Samuel R. Warren, son of John Parker Warren, graduated at Yale College in the class of 1860. He read law and was admitted to the bar of New York in 1862.

Miles Knowlton graduated at Hamilton College, N. Y., and has been a missionary in China the last 15 years.

George Gaiker graduated at Wesleyan University, Conn. He studied law and became a judge in the West.

Levi Knight, Jr., is a teacher in Georgia.

Wales Cheney was educated at the Military Academy, Norwich, Vt.

PROF. R. D. C. ROBBINS.

[BY LYMAN M. KNAPP, ESQ., MIDDLEBURY.]

Rensselaar David Chanceford Robbins was born in Wardsboro, in 1812. He was left an orphan at the age of two and a half years, with a sister who afterward married Rev. C. Muzzy of the Madura Mission, where she died early in the missionary service.

His first years were spent on a farm, with such opportunities for education as a common school afforded, until he was 16, when he attended the academy at Brattleboro for a time, and afterward that at Chester, teaching a district school in the winter. He spent a year in New Jersey as a teacher, pursuing his classical studies meanwhile. In the spring of 1832, he entered Middlebury College and graduated in 1835. In this class, one of the largest ever graduated at Middlebury, and peculiarly rich, as it seems to the author, in every variety of talent, he distinguished himself by his fidelity and completeness in every department of study, and especially by his proficiency in the classics.—Studious and hearty in his intimacies he quietly mastered his place and his work.

In the autumn of 1835 he visited the South, then an inviting field for Northern teachers, and spent a year in that employment, but returned in the winter of 1837, and for nearly a year had charge of the academy in Royalton.

He entered the Theological Seminary at Andover in 1838, but was induced to spend a year at Middlebury College as tutor, when he returned to Andover and graduated with his class in 1841. His ardent relish for classical and sacred literature had here found its gratification and led to his continuation at the seminary till he received his appointment to the Greek professorship at Middlebury College.

Professor Robbins has published a translation of Hengstenbeug's "Egypt and the Books of Moses;" an annotated edition of Xenophon's Memorabilia, and various historical, biblical and classical articles in the Bibliotheca Sacra and Biblical Repository. He also edited Prof. Stuart's work.

DR. DANA HYDE,

a much esteemed physician, and his son 10 years of age were drowned near the North Village in the branch that falls into West River, April 26, 1850. The Doctor was at the time residing at West Townshend Village. Having business in Waresboro, he started at 10 A. M., with horse and wagon to go to the North Village; hearing the bridge that way had been swept away by the flood, he took the hill, or old road through the south part of Jamaica, some farther than the stage-road. About three o'clock, he started back, and thinking, doubtless, to save some travel by fording the stream, though cautioned against making the attempt, he made it. On the abutment of the bridge, he took a view; the water was high and swift, the ford-way full of rocks, yet he resumed his seat in his buggy and drove in. He scarcely reached mid-way, as seen by a man who watched with anxiety the attempt, when the body of the wagon, connected to the axle by a king-bolt not keyed, separated from the fore-wheels, throwing the Doctor and his boy into the water upon the rocks, causing the instant death of both. The alarm was given at the village and the bodies rescued and carried home the same night.

DEATH OF JUDGE WARREN.

From the Washington, Carolina Paper, of Dec. 16, 1876.

We are pained to have to announce the death of one of our most honored and esteemed townsmen. The Hon. E. J. Warren died at his residence on the morning of Sunday, Dec. 10th inst. He was born in Vermont, Dec. 23, 1826, and came to live in this town soon after he arrived of age. He taught school here for a short time. In 1849, he obtained license as an attorney, and soon took a place in the first rank of the profession along with men of such ability as Hawks, Sparrow, Rodman and others.

He represented the county of Beaufort in the Convention of 1860, and several terms in the Legislature. In 1871-72 he was Speaker of the Senate. At the close of the war, he was appointed a Judge of the Superior Court, which office he held until the adoption of the Constitution of 1868. He discharged its duties in such a way as to receive the entire approbation of all who appeared before him, whether as attorneys or suitors. His reading in the law had been unusually extensive, and its principles were familiar. He rarely erred in their application. Naturally of a warm and earnest temper, he had decided opinions on most questions, political or other, and he had decided likes and dislikes among individuals, but on the Bench, to all persons, in every case, he was patient, attentive, and courteous. Every argument was fully heard and carefully weighed, and his quick, cultivated judgment enabled him to give a prompt decision. His perfect impartiality was never questioned. He will be long remembered by all who practiced before him as the model of a Judge.

MRS. H. T. ROBINSON.

At her death it was written [in the obituary—see page 8 of this history.] “She was the second daughter of the late Rev. James Tufts of Wardsboro, of whose family of six children only two now survive—Mrs. Newton of Newfane and Rev. James Tufts of Monson, Mass. Mrs. Robinson was married in 1830, and survived her husband but two weeks. She was a woman of rare mental ability, possessing a tenacious memory and an extensive fund of information upon most literary and scientific subjects—which, however, owing to her extreme sensitiveness, was known only to her most intimate friends. Her familiarity with the Scriptures was well known; in the midst of great trials she always found consolation in the precious promises contained therein. She was the mother of four children—three sons and one daughter—to whom she gave most of her educational advantages. William H. and James T. were residents of Peoria, Ill., for 20 years previous to their decease, and were widely known as successful business men. Henry J. died in early manhood from the effects of malarial fever contracted in Kansas, whither he had gone as a pioneer. The daughter has been spared to take care of her parents in these later years of declining health and strength. By a strange coincidence, the death of Mrs. Robinson’s brother, Deacon John Tufts of Geneseo, Ill., took place of the same day as her own—

Feb. 15, 1885.

Thus brother and sister took their flight almost together from their homes, where they were greatly loved, and entered into the rest that remaineth for the people of God."

IN MEMORIAM.

"AN OLD LANDMARK GONE."

[Brattleboro Paper.]

In Dr. J. P. Warren, who died at his residence on Green street, Saturday, Sept. 14, 1878, Brattleboro loses one of those patriarchal landmarks of a former generation, who are so instinctively honored, and Windham county is deprived of what was once one of its largest and most vigorous intellects. Until within a few days of his death he seemed to be in the most robust health, enjoying life with as much zest as many men 40 years younger. He was born in Wardsboro, Aug. 20, 1795, and at his death was a trifle over 83. He studied medicine, first with Dr. W. R. Ranney, and afterwards with Dr. Jonathan A. Allen of Brattleboro, and graduated from the Dartmouth Medical College in 1820. He continued in practice in Wardsboro until 1842, earning an excellent reputation as a physician, and being called to nearly every part of the county. He represented the town in the Legislature in 1839 and 1840. Leaving Wardsboro, he removed to Chesterfield, N. H., where he remained a few years. He afterwards resided several years in Fayetteville, taking the place of Dr. Olds, removing to Brattleboro about 20 years ago.

In 1820 he married Lucy Maynard Wheelock, who still survives him [died Sept. 15, 1880], a sister of Judges Henry and Emery Wheelock, who have both been prominent men in the county. His family numbered nine sons and three daughters, seven of whom are now living. His oldest son, Charles, died in this village in early manhood. His second son, Edward Jenner Warren, was a judge of the Supreme Court of North Carolina; he died in 1876. Five of the sons were in the late war. Lieut. John Wheelock Warren, a veteran of the 1st Wisconsin cavalry, was several times wounded and for some months a prisoner of war in a rebel prison; he died in this town in 1875. Capt. Frank E. Warren, a veteran of the 8th Vermont volunteers, took part in all of the engagements of his regiment, and was wounded at the battle of Winchester, Va. His youngest son, Charles Herbert, was killed in action. His second daughter, Jennie, died in Michigan in 1880.

Dr. Warren was a man of noble presence and rare dignity, and while familiar with the best works in literature, devoted much time to reading in the line of his profession. He was particularly fond of botany, mineralogy and chemistry, and made one of the best collections of minerals in Southern Vermont. His educational advantages, supplemented by a tenacious memory, practical judgment, vigor and strength of mind, made him, locally at least, one of the great men of the county. Some eight years since he prepared a history of Wardsboro which is now in the hands of Miss Hemenway for publication.

ROBERT BABCOCK.

Died in Wardsboro, Vt., August 23, 1863, aged 104 years and six months.

Very few, probably who read that brief notice, gave it more than a moment's attention, or thought of anything more than the extraordinary old age to which the subject of it attained. But Robert Babcock served his country in the war for Independence, and was an actor in one of the most gallant exploits of the war. Of the actors in that exploit, he supposed himself to be, and there is no reason to doubt that he was, the last survivor.

Rather more than two lines are due to the memory of such a man, and though his personal history is unknown, and perhaps of small account except as connected with that event, it is proper to record in this connection the facts of the transaction.

The capture of Gen. Lee by the British in the summer of 1777, was a serious damage to the American arms, not only by depriving them of his services, which were immediately needed, but by embarrassing them in vain endeavors to effect an exchange of some British officers for him. This they could not do, as they had no officer of equal rank. In this emergency, William Barton, then a lieutenant-colonel in the Rhode Island militia, and afterwards a resident of Vermont and founder of the town of Barton, conceived the bold idea of capturing a British general, and so effecting the release of Lee. Sir Wm. Prescott, the commander-in-chief of the British forces in Rhode Island, had his headquarters at the house of a Quaker, named Overing, on an island near the main land. Barton planned an expedition for his capture, and on the night of July 10, 1777, taking with him 40 picked men in two boats, he eluded the vigilance of the ships and gunboats by which the island was surrounded, and arrived undiscovered at the headquarters of Gen. Prescott. He was not aware of their approach till they arrived at the very door of the chamber in which he slept. The door was closed and fastened, and the Americans were considerably delayed in their endeavors to effect an entrance. At length a negro, named Prince, converted his head into a battering-ram, and, drawing back a little distance he pitched head-fore-most through the door, and surprised the General in his bed. Without allowing him time even to dress, Gen. Prescott's captors marched him to the boat, reached the bay in safety, and eventually delivered their prisoner at Washington's head-quarters. The capture caused a great deal of chagrin to the British and no less exultation among the Americans. It had the designed effect and secured the speedy exchange of General Lee.

Among these forty picked men was Robert Babcock, then only nineteen years of age. His share in that exploit was among the choicest recollections of his life, and after he had outlived a century nothing delighted him more than to recall and narrate the adventures of that eventful night.

REV. EBENEZER G. BRADFORD.

BY REV. PLINY H. WHITE.

Rev. Ebenezer Green Bradford died in Leverett, Mass., August 29, 1861, aged 60 years, 3 months and 5 days. He was a lineal descendant in the seventh generation from the distinguished William Bradford, one of the May-flower Pilgrims, and for thirty years Governor of Plymouth Colony; and through him was related to John Bradford, the intimate friend of Rogers, Hooper, Latimer and Ridley, and like them a martyr at the stake in Smith-field.

He was the fourth son of Rev. Moses and Sarah (Eaton) Bradford, and was born in Francestown, N. H., May 24, 1801. He was graduated at Amherst in 1827; studied theology at Andover one year; finished his course with Rev. John M. Whiton, D. D., of Antrim, N. H., and was licensed by the Union Association, at Goffstown, N. H., August 12, 1829. His first settlement was at Colebrook, N. H., where he was ordained February 29, 1832. Rev. James Tisdale, of Guildhall, Vt., preached the sermon.

He was dismissed from Colebrook in February, 1836, and received a call from the Congregational Church in Wardsboro, Vt., May 30, 1836, and was there installed October 5, 1836. His brother, Rev. Moses B. Bradford, of Grafton, Vt., preached the sermon. He was dismissed May 24, 1842, and removed to Wisconsin, where he was a stated supply of the N. S. Presbyterian Church in Plattville, a year and three months; of the Congregational Church in Prairie du Lac, three years and two months; and of the Congregational Church in Waupun, three years.

In December, 1850, he commenced preaching at Princeton, Wis., organized a Congregational Church there in 1852, and continued his labors with that church till March 30, 1861. His health failing, he returned to New England, and gradually sank of paralysis.

Peter Hammond, of Geneseo, Ill., died on the anniversary of his 102d birthday. Until within a few months Mr. Hammond, despite his great years, enjoyed almost perfect health; retained the full measure of his faculties; walked to church nearly a mile on pleasant Sundays; read without glasses and seemed as happy and connected with life as any of his children. The father of Mr. Hammond was one of the patriots of the Revolution, and took part in the destruction of the tea in Boston harbor. Subsequently he removed to Wardsboro, Windham county in this state, then a wilderness, where he died in 1842, aged 94 years. Peter remained at Newton with his grandparents until his mother made the journey on horseback after him, a distance of 125 miles, and returned with him, he walking the entire way by her side. In 1802, he married Charlotte Holbrook, daughter of a prominent citizen of Wardsboro, and for 53 years they continued to reside in the house which he built and occupied soon after their marriage. At the death of his wife, in 1856, Mr. Hammond moved to Geneseo, Ill. At the age of 100 years, his physicians declared that there was not a diseased organ in his body.

Squire Elmer, born in Somers, Ct., 1781, was a soldier of 1812, for 2 years; at 37, one January day, out on business, so froze his feet that he had to have both amputated, and for 47 years after was a hard working man, always walking upon his knees.

JACKSON NEWELL, ESQ.

died in Shelburne, Mass., Mar. 26th, aged 68 years. He was a native of Coleraine, Mass., but through all the years of active business life resided in Wardsboro. He was a merchant for about thirty years.

PROF. L. F. WARD,

whose life was given to education, who has been already mentioned in this history among the educated and distinguished sons of Wardsboro, and who was deceased about two years since, we think, on the 25th anniversary of the Powers Institute, at Bernardston, was thus eulogized in the speech at the evening of the grand day for Bernardston, by the orator of the occasion, P. W. Williams, Principal of the Davenport (Ia.) high schools:

Prof. L. F. Ward was the first principal of the institute. For seven years his life was the life of the institute. He brought with him the vigor of youth, the ambition of manhood and the discrimination of maturity. As a teacher his illustrations were homely and pointed, his logic clean and his meaning never obscure; with a rich gift of language he never failed for the right word. Soon after Prof. Ward became connected with the school, he demanded a boarding-house, and Cushman hall was built. Under his administration the school was a success, and in 1860 there were 600 pupils connected with the school, a number not since reached. Prof. Ward was the chief and attractive instructor of the first few years. He formed a library and organized debating clubs. He tried in 1860, to get the Legislature to appropriate $20,000 for the purpose of organizing an agricultural department, and the General Court in 1869 was petitioned to found a normal school department in connection with the Powers institute. Both schemes failed. After he left this school he was for three years superintendent of the Northampton schools, a member at one time of the Vermont council of censors, served in the Legislature for two years and for three years was member of the state board of education. He died last year from over-work and the greatest monument of his life is this institution which he loved and for	which he did so much. The old pupils that still live are now scattered and each is spreading his little censor of influence secured from the master hand.

WHITINGHAM.

By CLARK JILLSON.

This Town has in its archives a copy of its original Charter, issued before the Revolution by the Province of New York.

WHITINGHAM.

NEW YORK AND NEW HAMPSHIRE CLAIMS, OR THE FORTY YEARS' CONTROVERSY.

In 1750 the Province of New York claimed all that tract of country now known as the State of Vermont, and the Province of New Hampshire exercised jurisdiction over the same territory to such an extent that it became known as the "New Hampshire Grants." While this difficulty was in progress, both New York and New Hampshire chartered towns within the disputed territory, and in some cases, the authority of both Provinces was exercised over the same township.

The controversy between these governments lasted 40 years, and resulted in admitting into the Union the State of Vermont, in 1791, it being the first accession to the 13 original States.

CUMBERLAND TOWNSHIP.

Previous to the Revolution, the southeastern part of the State was known as "Cumberland," and erected into a county by that name in 1776.

The southwest corner of this county had been called "Cumberland Township," but had not been chartered by that name, therefore, its limits were undefined.

THE WHITING PETITION.

On the seventh day of January, 1767, a petition was presented to the lieutenant-governor of New York, by Nathan Whiting, Samuel Fitch, Eleazer Fitch, James Smedley, David Baldwin, Andrew Myers, Samuel Whiting, Robert Aiton, Amos Hitchcock and Nathan Haines Whiting, covering a part of this territory, which was referred to a committee of His Majesty's Council, who reported favorably, and the petition was granted.

The Patent was ordered to issue, but for some unknown reason the matter was delayed for three years.

THE SEVEN GRANTEES.

On the 26th day of January, 1770, Col. Nathan Whiting renewed the petition in behalf of himself and his associates, setting forth that the lands prayed for were vacant and had never been granted, but were still vested in the Crown. He also stated that this land was part of a tract called "Cumberland," but that no township covering the same had ever been granted. Upon this petition, letters patent were issued on the 12th day of March, 1770.

The grantees were seven British soldiers, who were thus rewarded by their fidelity in the King's service. Their names were Nathan Whiting, Samuel Fitch, Eleazer Fitch, James Smedley, Andrew Myers, Robert Aiton and Samuel Boyer, who were all the persons then interested in said lands.

THE TOWNSHIP NAMED WHITINGHAM.

The township thus granted and chartered was named Whitingham. It occupied a position near the southwest corner of Cumberland county and was laid out six miles square, with more flourish and ceremony than attended the founding of Rome.

The following is the second petition of Col Whiting, and the one upon which the grant was made, and the patent or charter issued:

"PETITION."

"To the Honorable Cadwallader Colden, Esquire.

His Majesty's Lieutenant-Governor and Commander-in-Chief of the Province of New York, and the Territories, in America:—

In Council.

The Petition of Colonel Nathan Whiting, in behalf of himself and his associates,

Humbly Showeth,

That your Petitioner and his Associates, on their former Petition, obtained an Order of His late Excellency, Sir Henry Moore, with the advice and consent of the Council, bearing date the twenty-seventh day of January, One Thousand Seven Hundred and Sixty-seven, for granting to them and their Heirs, the quantity of Ten Thousand acres of a certain Tract of Land, lying on the west side of the Connecticut River, known by the name of 'The Township of Cumberland.' That they have since procured an actual Survey of said Land, and find the Vacant Land to contain only the quantity of Seven Thousand acres. That the same, though part of the Lands formerly claimed by the Government of New Hampshire have not been granted by that Government, but still remain Vacant, and Vested in the Crown.

Your Petitioner therefore humbly prays, that the Letters Patent ordered on the said former Petition, may Issue for the Quantity of Land found to be vacant, and in the Names of Nathan Whiting, Samuel Fitch, Eleazer Fitch; James Smedley, Andrew Myers, Robert Aiton and Samuel Boyer, who are all the persons at present interested in the premises.

And your Petitioner, in behalf of himself and his Associates, Doth further pray, that the said Seven Thousand acres, together with the following Tracts granted to or surveyed for reduced Officers, to wit: Three Thousand acres granted to the Petitioner, Nathan Whiting; Two Thousand acres granted to Lieutenant James Eddington; Two Thousand acres granted to Lieutenant John Nordbergh; One Thousand acres granted to Lieutenant James Etherington; Three Thousand acres Surveyed for Captain John Walker; Two Thousand acres Surveyed for Lieutenant Thomas Gamble, and Two Thousand acres Surveyed for Lieutenant Dennis Carleton, may be erected into a Township by the Name of Whitingham, with the usual privileges,

And your Petitioner, as in Duty bound, shall ever pray, &c.

New York, 26th

January, 1770.

NATHAN WHITING, in behalf of himself and his Associates."

GENERAL DESCRIPTION.

This township is located in the southeast corner of Windham county, and bounded on the north by Wilmington, east by Halifax, south by Heath and Rowe in Massachusetts, and west by Readsboro.

The surface is hilly, but as a general thing the high lands are well adapted to grazing and the other crops. Immense forests formerly covered the soil, and beech, birch, maple, spruce, ash and hemlock were abundant, but the original growth was largely wasted nearly a century ago, by being burned to the ground, for the ashes, and to get rid of the timber for which there was no market.

The center of the town is located upon an eminence belonging to a range of hills running nearly north and south, through the entire length of the town, with Deerfield river at their feet on the west, and North river on the east.

WHITINGHAM SCENERY.

From the summit of these hills may be seen a large tract of picturesque country, embracing a portion of the Green Mountain range, while near, and several hundred feet below, Sadawga pond glistens like a diamond.

Among these elevations is Burlington hill, noted for its bleakness during the winter months. Streeter hill is another sightly location, from which may be seen Haystack Mountain in Searsburgh, the Monadnock in New Hampshire, Wachusett and Greylock in Massachusetts.

In the northeasterly part of the town near the village of Jacksonville and east of North river, is a rocky elevation known as "Hosley hill," and on the other side of the river are the "Holbrook" and "Tippet hills."

The hills in the westerly part of the town near Lime Hollow, and along the easterly banks of Deerfield river for several miles are extremely rugged, and the land about them unsuited to cultivation. The best crop raised here is "All in your eye," and consists of the most magnificent natural scenery, rarely surpassed by any found in foreign lands.

Deerfield river, a stream of considerable size and importance, flows through a portion of the town, at its northwest corner, and also at its southwest corner, which is in conformity with the original "set out," wherein care was taken that the "Length thereof doth not extend along the banks of any river otherwise than is conformable to our said Royal Instructions."

The stream rises in Stratton and runs in a southeasterly direction for about 50 miles and falls into the Connecticut near Greenfield, Mass.

North river runs in a southerly direction, through the easterly part of the town, and unites with the Deerfield near Shelburne Falls, Mass. There are numerous other streams in town flowing north, south, east and west, which indicate an uneven surface, well supplied with water. These streams furnish motive power for numerous industries.

There are no large bodies of water in this town, for the reason that there is not room enough between the hills, but there are several small sheets of water of more or less importance. Sadawga pond is the largest and best known. It is located within a mile of the centre of the town, where the first church was built, in a westerly direction. It is estimated to cover from 300 to 500 acres, with indications that it has sometimes been more than three times its present size. It bears upon its surface a floating island of some fifty acres in extent. This accumulation is increasing from year to year, and within the last 50 years has been changed in form and size very materially.

It is claimed this pond was named in honor of a "Lone Indian" who continued to dwell about its shores after his tribe had moved on. It is said that "Old Sadawga" lived by hunting and fishing, and that he occasionally made a trip to Northampton and Springfield to dispose of his furs and other articles in the market, and that while going down Deerfield river in his canoe, he was wrecked at Shelburne Falls and drowned. As this Indian was known to the first settlers of the town, his traditionary fate is not improbable.

In the northerly part of the town there is a pond, in early times called Beaver dam, but of late, Fuller pond. It formerly covered 50 acres, and is so situated as to have an outlet at each end, both of which reach the Deerfield, one near the north part of Whitingham and the other near Shelburne Falls, but nearly 30 miles apart.

This body of water has decreased in size so that in a dry season less than five acres are covered with water. Traces of the old dam, probably built centuries ago, are still visible, and under the surface may be found parts of trees of considerable size bearing tooth marks of the beaver.

Near the northeast corner of the town is a sheet of water known as Roberts' pond, covering some 30 acres. A small stream runs from it, but none into it from the surface except the rainfall, which can have little to do with the amount of water it contains.

GEOLOGY OF THE TOWNSHIP.

Whitingham contains geological features worthy of notice. The rock formation is gneiss, but its component parts are not so blended as to constitute granite suitable for building purposes.

In the easterly part of the town talcose schist abounds to some extent, but not to render it of great value. The western half of the town abounds in limestone of excellent quality, and in such proximity to the surface as to render it comparatively easy to be quarried.

Sixty years ago the manufacture and sale of lime constituted the principal business of the town, and next to agriculture was the chief industry.

BOWLERS.

Near North river about one mile below the present village of Jacksonville may be seen a bowlder 61 feet in circumference and 10 feet high above the ground. Its angles have not been worn as is commonly the case with bowlders, but looks like a block split from an immense ledge and not transported any considerable distance.

Near this place are several gravel mounds, produced by the action of the ice and water during the glacial period, and it is believed that this rock was formerly carried down this valley in a mass of gravel which prevented its being worn by attrition.

This result of glacial action is often noticed, and it is not uncommon to meet with a moraine, even in this hilly country, and these deposits are made up largely of gravel interspersed with bowlders of various sizes, from a few pounds to several tons.

The largest bowlder in New England, called "The Green Mountain Giant," may be seen in the westerly part of Whitingham upon a hill 500 feet above the Deerfield, and within two miles of that stream. It stands upon a flat rock, is 40 feet in length, its horizontal circumference 125 feet, its height 32 feet, its cubic contents 40,000 feet, and its weight 3,400 tons. The angles of this rock are quite sharp, indicating that its journey, if a long one, was made when incased in ice or a mass of earth.

There are several other large bowlders in the town, notably the one standing on a flat rock at the highest point on Tenny Hill, much higher than the one last mentioned, and within half a mile of Massachusetts line.

Gold, silver and lead have been discovered in several localities, but not in quantities to warrant an extensive outlay in mining operations, though some of the ore, recently found, is said to be quite rich.

There are numerous veins of quartz in the rock formation where traces of gold may be found, but whether these veins are sufficiently extensive and rich to become remunerative is yet undetermined. A mining company was formed here and incorporated by the Legislature in 1867, but no startling results have been developed during the 17 years of its existence.

In the westerly part of the town, in the village of Sadawga, is to which many people resort on account of its medicinal qualities. An analysis of the waters show that they contain muriate of lime, carbonate of lime, muriate of magnesia, carbonate and per-oxide of iron, allumina with an acid trace. It is said to be a specific for cutaneous eruptions, scrofulous humors, dropsy, gravel, chronic ulcers, liver complaint and many other diseases. This spring was discovered in 1822, and has been sought for more or less ever since. David Eames, a much respected citizen of the town, claimed that the use of these waters saved his life.

While this water has some medicinal qualities, its taste is not much different from ordinary spring water, and its hygienic properties, as represented by the chemist are in no way indicated by the taste.

THE NATIVE FORESTS.

In early times the town was covered with a heavy growth of timber, beech, birch and maple being the principal hard woods, and spruce, hemlock and balsam the soft.

No pine timber, of any considerable value, ever grew in Whitingham, and only now and then an oak. Hemlock trees in some parts of the town were of immense size, ranging from three to five feet in diameter.

It will be seen that the town possessed few attractions for the settler, while there were many obstacles to contend with before the soil could be made productive. The climate, the location, uneven surface, the lack of a well defined policy in matters of government, all conspired to discourage a speedy and successful settlement; but were a hardy race; courted the opposition of the elements and of man. They caused the forests to vanish before their sturdy stroke; took issue with wild beasts and unfriendly men; established their independence by solemn decree and forced civilization to establish a new, free State, the first to be admitted into the Federal Union.

The inhabitants of Whitingham bore an active and honorable part in all these struggles, and from that day to the present time have shown themselves worthy of the Green Mountain State.

EARLY SETTLEMENT.

On the 12th day of March, 1770, by virtue of a New York patent, Whitingham became the property of the following grantees:

Nathan Whiting, Samuel Fitch, Eleazer Fitch, James Smedley, Andrew Myers, Robert Aiton and Samuel Boyer.

It was ten years before the town was organized by the choice of officers, during which time large accessions had been made to its population. The census of Cumberland was taken in 1770-71, which discloses the following facts:

White males under 16.....	3
“ “ over and under 60..	4
“ females under 16.....	3
“ “ over and under 60..	4
Total.....	14
Heads of families.....	4

Whitingham as laid out in 1770 was only a part of Cumberland.

SILAS HAMILTON AND ROBERT

were the first settlers and were in town as early as 1770.

The Bratten family came from Coleraine to Whitingham in 1770. They came around through Wilmington. Mrs. Bratten, the wife of Robert, was a brave and resolute woman. On their way to Whitingham from Coleraine, Mrs. Bratten climbed a tall tree in Wilmington and there discovered the valley of the Deerfield river. They pursued their course in that direction and marked trees as they went. Their house was some distance up the river from where Cyrus Wheeler now resides. They returned to Coleraine in the fall and came back three times before they made a permanent residence in Whitingham. Here they commenced farming in a small way. A small iron kettle served as a water pail, milk pail, and was also used for cooking. The milk of one cow was divided among several families. On the 19th of May, 1780, known as the "Dark Day," Mrs. Bratten set out an apple tree on this farm which has since been called grandmother's apple tree.

Silas Hamilton was from Western, (now Warren,) Mass., and became an extensive land owner in Whitingham. He was engaged in and for this offence was tried and sentenced to stand one hour in a pillory and be publicly whipped on his naked back 20 stripes. The charge against him was "For stirring up sedition in this Commonwealth."

Mr. Hamilton was not alone in this business, as Vermont was the place of refuge for many of the insurgents including Shay himself.

ADAM WHEELER

of Hubbardston, Mass., was captured in Vermont by a party of government men under Royal Tyler, Esq., but they were only able to hold him four hours, when he was liberated by a party of 40 sympathizers from over the line in the State of New York.

James White of Coleraine was convicted of high treason and sentenced to death, but was subsequently pardoned.

FIRST THINGS.

Mr. Hamilton was the first representative from Whitingham to the Legislature of Vermont in 1778.

While this early settlement was in progress, the town was without roads and the people were obliged to travel by marked trees. They were obliged to have their grain ground at Greenfield, transporting it there and back on foot.

The first child born in town was John Nelson, Jr.

Thomas Riddle was the first person who died in town. He was taken sick while on a visit. His home was in Connecticut. He could not be carried home as there was no way of transportation except on horseback. He was buried in Whitingham.

During the 10 years from the time this town began to be settled up to 1780 when it was organized, the inhabitants were quite extensively engaged in an industry which might have been remunerative at the time, but of no permanent advantage.

This was cutting wood and timber to be burned for the ashes, the same being leached and the lye boiled down to salts and potash.

This method of clearing off the land and carrying away what the soil so much needed, worked an injury to the farms from which they will never recover. If one-half the cleared land in this town was covered with the original timber to-day, it would greatly add to the value of the town.

We have now passed over a period of great privation on the part of the settlers, who had cast their lot on a sterile soil, away from the comforts of civilization, among wild beasts, in a climate unfriendly to pioneer life.

Up to this time there is no record of any religious expression on the part of the people, or that any clergyman had ventured to set foot upon the soil of Whitingham.

It was now near the close of the Revolution. Independence had been declared by the colonies four years, and by Vermont three years. The English government was not much respected in Vermont, and the inhabitants sought to acquire titles to their lands through the General Assembly. About 1780, Silas Hamilton and seven others petitioned for a grant of 3,000 acres of land in Whitingham.

This petition was referred to a committee, who reported through their chairman as follows:

"The Hon. General Assembly:

Your Committee report as their opinion, that the three thousand acres of land in the Township of Whitingham as Referred to in the Petition of Silas Hamilton to be granted to said Hamilton and the settlers named in said Petition thay Paying a Meat Consideration ——— and that his Exelancy and Council be Directed to Make out a Charter of Incorporation for the same with the Reservations and Restrictions Necessary.—
JOHN THROOP, Chairman."

This report was referred to the Governor and Council and the petition granted.

The criminal code of Vermont in 1780, made nine offences punishable by death, as follows: treason, murder, arson, rape, bestiality, sodomy, bearing false witness against a person for the purpose of causing his death; mutilation: either by cutting out or disabling the tongue, or putting out an eye, or by emasculation, and blaspheming the name of God.

The first town meeting of which we have any record, was held on Thursday, March 30, 1780, when the following business was transacted:

"Att an annual Town meeting March 30, 1780, the men whose names are under Ritten ware Chosen to Ofis.

Town Clerk: Eliphalet Hyde. Selectmen: James Angel, Eliphalet Hyde, Silas Hamilton. Treasurer: Silas Hamilton. Constables: Abner More, Levi Shumway. Highway Surveyors: Abner More, Thos. Hunt, Ebenezer Davis, John Nelson Jr. Listers: Thos. Stearns, Eliphalet Hyde. Collectors: Levi Shumway, Abner More. Grand Juror: Thomas Stearns. Sealer of weights and measures. John Butler. Deer Rief: Amasa Shumway, Thomas Stearns.

At this time the town had a population of not less than 200.

The grand list of 1781 shows who paid the taxes at that time and indicates to some extent the population of the town.

FIRST GRAND LIST.

"John Nelson, John Nelson Jr., Benga' Blodgett, Samuel Day, John Blushfield, Thomas Blodget, Thomas Day, John Howard, Jonnhan Shumway, James Howard, Amos Green, James Reed, Benj. Blodgett Jr., Ebenezer Davis, Isaac Fuller, Samuel Nelson, Leonard Pike, Eliphalet Gusten, Daniel Wilcox, Elijah French, Daniel Holloway, Luther Washburn, Bille Clark, Levi Shumway, Amasa Shumway, Benijah Lampher, James Angel, John Butler, Samuel Butler, Elihue Blake, Jabez Foster, Calvin Fuller, Levi Boyd, Charles Dodge, John Rugg, Nathan Lee, Henry Lee, Abner More, Thomas Hunt, Jonathan Barton, Jonathan Dix, Timothy S. Berton, Capt. Eliphalet Hide, Moses Hide, Jonathan Edgecomb, Roger Edgecomb, Beriah Sprage, Thomas Sterns, Sterling Sterns, Nathaniel Davis, Brinsele Peters, Silas Hambleton, Robert Bratten, Robert Bratten Jr., Joseph Coleman."

The listers for this year were Henry Lee, Benjamin Blodgett and Eliphalet Gusten.

The Brattens, Robert and Moses, and Leonard Pike, settled in the north-west part of the town, and James Angel, Eliphalet Gusten and Benijah Lamphear in the south-east part. John Butler and Silas Hamilton settled in the north-eastern section. Butler built the first grist-mill in town on North river.

The earliest deed on record was from Robert Bratten of Whitingham to John Torrey of Halifax, and is dated Jan. 2nd, 1780.

In 1786, the town made provision for paying taxes in the following manner:

"Voted that the town tax be paid in wheat at 4 s. per bushel, Rey at 3 s., Corn at 2 and 6, Oats at 1 and 6, Flax at 8 d. per pound, sugar 5 d. per pound."

Although pioneer life was not pleasant in many respects, there was constant call for unclaimed lands in Whitingham, by those who desired to become permanent settlers.

On the 15th day of October, 1857, 600 acres of land were granted by Vermont to Jonathan Hunt and Arad Hunt, described as follows, viz: "Three lots in the town of Whitingham, being a part of three thousand acres of land granted to Capt. John Walker, said lots containing one hundred and ninety-six acres in each lot and are numbered 2, 3 and 5, as expressed in a certain indenture of release made to the said Jonathan Hunt and Arad Hunt, by Samuel Wells."

This grant was made in such a way as to render the location doubtful, unless the three lots were more clearly defined than was customary in those days.

The people of Whitingham at this time, as a rule, were law-abiding, so far as they had any law to abide by; but habits of intoxication sometimes required a check from some official source in cases where the law could not be appealed to with satisfactory results.

In 1787 the people of Whitingham adopted a method unique in its conception and salutary in its application.

The number of cases treated by this humiliating process is unknown, but one specimen has been preserved and may be found among the town records, recorded by Amos Green, who was then town clerk. The selectmen who issued this suggestive hint were Samuel Day, Daniel Wilcox and Isaac Lyman. It has no parallel in municipal dictum and is as follows:

"Whereas the mismanagement and bad conduct of A. B. ——— of Whitingham in times Past has apparently Brought himself into such Difficulty that his Family may feel the fatal effects of it in many Instances, Particularly afor their Daly support, which to prevent we, the subscribers, Do agreeable to Law hereby take Inspection of S'd A. B.'s futer affairs under our Emediate Care, and hereby Notify the Publick that we act as Overseers on S'd A. B.'s futer affairs, and warn all that is or may be concerned with S'd A. B. to govern themselves accordingly.

Whitingham, June 30, 1786."

In 1790 an effort was made to secure a burial place, and the town "Voted to Except the land of Calvin Munn and fence the same."

Nothing was done about the fence during the year and on the 7th of Mar. 1791, the town was not satisfied with the Munn lot and choose a Committee "to search for a more convenient place." The lot less than half a mile north of where the old meeting house stood was finally selected.

Gambling and like devices were resorted to for the purpose of raising money for religious and charitable purposes. Churches, roads and bridges were built, repairing loss by fire and paying the State debt, by lottery; clearly showing the tendency of the human mind to be lured by expectation that something is liable to turn up.

These lotteries were not only legalized by towns, but the State was concerned in the same demoralizing business.

Vermont has passed 24 acts, granting lotteries for various purposes, the first being dated Feb. 27th, 1783, and the last one, Nov. 8th, 1804. Nov. 8th, 1792, an act was passed granting a lottery to raise 150£ for building a bridge over Deerfield River at Readsboro.

It was thought that these lotteries had a tendency to relieve the burden of taxation, while it only changed the burden from one class to another by bringing the gamblers to the front in charitable and religious work.

It is to be presumed that the town meetings were legally called, but none of the warrants were recorded during the first 14 years.

The first recorded warrant for a town meeting was for the meeting held March 3, 1794. The principal matter before that meeting was in relation to building a meeting house.

Dec. 30, 1794, at a town meeting,

Jonathan Hunt received 15 votes for member of Congress.

Persons to whom land was granted in Whitingham by authority of Vermont, 1780 to 1796: 1780, Silas Hamilton, Thomas Stearns, John Butler, James Roberts, Abner Moor, James Angel, Charles Dodge, Eliphalet Hyde; 1781, Robert Bratten and seven others, whose names are unknown; 1782, Samuel Wells; 1787, Jonathan Hunt, Arad Hunt; 1796, Amos Green, Samuel Moulton, Thomas Day, Samuel Day, James Howard, Seth Howard, Benjamin Nelson, Benjamin Blodgett, Benjamin Blodgett, Jr., Samuel Nelson, Solomon Moulton, Asaph White, William Nelson, Thomas Blodgett, Abisha Blodgett and Daniel Wallace. These grants were supposed to cover all the unoccupied land in the town.

The liberality of the town in allowing its citizens to pay their taxes in "truck and dicker," and the raising of money by games of chance did not turn out to be a complete remedy for all the financial ills, and numerous farms were sold under the hammer.

May 30, 1798, the town collector, Amasa Shumway, held a great sale of land in Whitingham to satisfy demands for taxes. The exact condition of these sales does not appear to have been recorded. There were 75 lots sold at a cheap rate; 100 acres in lot No. 7 for $1.37, and another lot of 79 acres for 98 cents. It would be interesting to know whether any of the titles under this sale were ever perfected.

The last year of the century was the most prosperous the town has ever seen. Large numbers were added to the population, log huts were abandoned and more modern houses built. The forests were cleared away, roads and bridges built, schools established and general thrift pervaded the town. The old meeting house was built this year, which was a great relief to church-goers. This house was made free to all denominations, by a vote of the town. The population at this time was 868.

WITCHCRAFT.

What was known as the "Salem witchcraft," 200 years ago lingered in the minds of the people more than a century.

Near the close of the last century, there lived in the southeast part of Whitingham an elderly woman by the name of Lamphear, who had the reputation of being a witch.

Julius Clark, a young man who lived near Mrs. Lamphear, claimed that he was bewitched by her and so thoroughly under her influence that he was unable to get off his bed for ten years. When the old lady died, he at once recovered and lived to old age.

Another man supposed himself to be one of her victims, and would exert himself in every possible way to avoid her influence. He related numerous instances where the spirit of this harmless old woman was wont to revel among its victims, and his sincerity was not to be doubted, for he had never been led to believe that witchcraft could only exist in a distempered mind.

Whether a belief in witchcraft had a tendency to weaken the religious sentiment of the people is not clear, but about this time objection was made to paying taxes for the support of a minister who did not preach the right doctrine, and the town, by vote made the way clear for unbelievers as follows:

"Voted that all persons who will come forward to the selectmen and declare that it is against their conscience to pay any sum of money for the purpose of hiring preaching, that it shall be the duty of the selectmen to abate their taxes."

Several persons filed a certificate for abatement, but I fail to find that any action was taken thereon. The following may be found in the town records:

Whitingham, July 5, 1802.

"I do not agree in religious opinion with the majority of the inhabitants of this town."

CALEB RIDER."

Among the early settlers and those prominent in business and town affairs, near the close of the last century, were Nathan Green, James Roberts, Jabez Foster, Amasa Shumway, David Eames, James Reed, Reuben Lamphear, Francis Porter, Amos Green, Calvin Munn, Jonathan Hall, Baxter Hall, Reuben Brown, Amos Brown, Joshua Coleman, Samuel Day, Ambrose Stone, Samuel Parker, David Jillson, William Goodnow, Jesse Hull, John Roberts, Samuel Preston, Isaac Chase, Joshua Newell, Abraham Chase, Abiather Winn, Levi Boyd, Martin Stickney, Abel B. Wilder, Eli Higley, Jeremiah Kingsbury, Samuel Martin, Hezekiah Murdock, Thomas Nelson and many others.

These men assisted in advancing the material prosperity of the town, and took special pride in the success of agricultural pursuit in which they were all more or less engaged.

The first recorded warrant for a town meeting was for the meeting held the third of March, 1794. The time of this meeting was occupied in discussing matters relative to building a meeting house. On the 6th of July, 1795, the town voted: "That they will build a house for public worship, 40 feet wide and 50 feet long, by a majority of 29 against eight."

This meeting house was framed and raised during the summer and autumn of 1799, by Levi Conant of Halifax, and was finished off later by Justus Hall, also of Halifax.

Nov. 14, 1803, the town "Voted to raise the money that is necessary to purchase the military stores necessary to supply the town as the law directs."

"Voted that the place to deposit said stock of ammunition shall be in the upper loft of the meeting house in a chest to be made at the expense of the town for that purpose."

This house stood on a hill, in a climate far from being mild in winter, and yet it was used for religious purposes and town meetings during 19 winters before there was any fire in it. No chimney was put in when the house was built; but time brought its changes, and on the 21st day of December, 1818, the town voted, "To have a stove and pipe erected in the meeting house."

When Whitingham celebrated its centennial in 1880, the east side of this house had been torn away, and the speaker's stand erected close to and partly within this open space.

The oration was delivered by Clark Jillson of Worcester, Mass., a native of Whitingham. His remarks in relation to the old meeting house were as follows:

"Eighty-one years ago to-day, this very spot was busy with the preparation for the erection of this grand old structure; the inhabitants of the town who have permitted the mutilation of its walls and allowed it to be shorn of its inward beauty—its unique pulpit, its square pews, its extensive galleries so tastefully decorated, emblematic of New England life 200 years ago—ought to be indicted for the desecration of the altars of their fathers.

Your modern churches, built to gratify the morbid tastes of those who worship fixtures more than the Deity, lack that spiritual presence that every person cannot but feel when he enters this consecrated temple. It was built by a sturdy race of men, living entirely by the labor of their own hands, but having brains sufficient to admit of a conscience. Two of your modern churches have had at least a private burial, while this ancient building still stands. If it had been left unoccupied and undisturbed, it would have outlived them all, standing upon this hill a monument to the memory of our fathers, a memorial of their unflinching integrity, their perseverance under stress of limited means, their unflinching fidelity to the Christian faith, and their willingness to do what they thought to be right.

On the night of the 14th of October, 1883, this house was cut down by some reckless vandal whose soul was steeped in the dregs of depravity, whose unholy work was too disgraceful to bear the light of day.

Farewell, dear old landmark of our fathers! Your presence was a benediction, your loss will be a perpetual sorrow."

The amount of credits to the town of Whitingham, given to each volunteer who has enlisted and been mustered into service, the time of actual service by each man, dating from the time of muster into the service to the time he was mustered out, discharged or deceased, (not counting fractions of a month,) together with the amount of bounty paid to each man by the town, will be seen by the following table :

Of the above list of men that were credited to the town of Whitingham, eighteen were non-residents of the town. Four were citizens of Massachusetts, one of the town of Readsboro, and thirteen were obtained from abroad, and their residence has not been ascertained. To the eighteen non-residents, the town paid $9,415 bounty, and to the eighty-nine of our own men was paid $14,615, averaging $523 and a fraction over to foreigners, and $164.21 to our own townsmen. The whole amount of credits by men mustered into the service is 271½ years, and the time of actual service is 131½ years. The credits by non-residents is 43 years, and the actual service 12½ years.

The aggregate amount of bounties paid by the town to volunteers, and to men furnishing substitutes, is $31,030. The expense of procuring volunteers, and other incidental expenses connected with the raising of recruits in 1862-3 and 4, cannot be less than $1500, making the total amount $32,530.

Besides the list of men credited to the town in the foregoing table, there are six men credited to Whitingham whose names are not given. They are probably substitutes furnished by enrolled men, and some at least, if not all, have entered the naval service of the United States, instead of the army.

Four men enrolled and liable to draft in Whitingham, enlisted in other towns. Winchester E. Holbrook enlisted in Hartford, Conn., was a prisoner for a long time, and came home sick, and died a short time after from disease contracted in the service. David Jilson enlisted in a Reg't in Massachusetts. James S. Bigelow enlisted in the town of Halifax, went into the 8th Reg't in the same Company with some of our men, and was killed at the battle of Cedar Creek, Oct. 19, '64. David Atherton enlisted in a New York Reg't, and was in Andersonville prison some eight months.

The enrolled men who furnished substitutes to the credit of the town for three years, are the following:

Hosea B. Ballou, Joseph I. Chase, Royal Chase, Royal S. Faulkner, Willard Faulkner, Jr., Eli T. Green, Edward L. Roberts, Benj. F. Roberts, Henry M. Roberts, Albert C. Stetson, Norris L. Stetson, George N. Upton, George W. Wheeler, Ichabod N. Wheeler.

Each of these men received a town bounty of five hundred dollars.

In July, 1863, sixteen men were drafted from the town of Whitingham, fourteen of whom paid the $300 commutation as provided by a law of the United States, and one, Charles C. H. Williams, procured a substitute, and Selah H. Holbrook went into the service under the draft. The following are the men who paid commutation:

Henry S. Blanchard, Alonzo S. Bliss, Elliot A. Brown, Russell D. Brown, Elisha J. Corkins, Charles W. Dix, Joseph Dix, Francis W. Fairbanks, Levi B. Faulkner, Geo. H. Pierce, Henry S. Reed, Charles O. Stone, Joseph J. Streeter, Thaddeus E. Wheeler.

Two of those who paid commutation, George H. Pierce and Joseph J. Streeter, afterwards volunteered and went into the service.

In many instances in this brief sketch of the soldiers from Whitingham, the only available source of information was the reports of the Adjutant and Inspector General of the State, and consequently are not so definite as would have been made had not my time to collect facts been so limited. Whitingham, Feb. 23, 1867.

THE CENTRE VILLAGE.

This village, so long the centre of attraction and business interest for the whole town, fills a place in the history of Whitingham of more importance than those now on the stage of active life would suppose. For nearly half a century, during the most progressive period, it was the cherished centre for every section of the town. And not only that, but the most active, enterprising business place to be found in this section of the county. Both secular and religious interests centered here, and all classes felt this to be the common center of attraction. The old church, now ruthlessly destroyed, was built about the commencement of the present century, and was the pride of the whole town, for whose benefit it was erected, and for many years from two to four hundred devout worshippers, in the summer season, would assemble within its walls, on each returning Sabbath, to test their devotion to the religious ordinances of that age.

STORES AND MERCHANTS.

The first store in this immediate vicinity, of which we can find any account, was built by William and Joseph Goodnow, in 1804. The following have been merchants in town: John Noys & Adin Thayer, Rev. Linus Austin & Asahel Booth, Ephriam Smith & George Boardman, Emory Greenleaf & Royal Houghton, Henry Goodnow, Eli Higley, Reuben Mims, Mims & Chase. John Joyes and Adin Thayer, sold to Rev. Linus Austin and Asahel Booth. Austin sold his interest to Booth.

Meantime another store had been started on the lower side of the way, near where Henry Goodnow's dwelling house now stands. Ephriam Smith, who had been keeping a grocery store over at a place called the "Corners," near the late "Farmers' Inst. Co's." place of business, moved to the centre village, established a general store, and did an extensive business alone for a few years; and afterwards in company with George Boardman, under the firm name of "Smith & Boardman," for several years. They were succeeded by Emory Greenleaf and Royal Houghton, who traded on that side of the way, in the firm name of "Greenleaf & Houghton," till about 1820. This village and the whole town was rapidly gaining in population and wealth, and had already become a town of no small importance in the county and in the State. This was when cities and large towns and villages had no such magnetic attraction for enterprising young men as we witness in these more modern times. The best native talent was retained at home, to guide the public interest, and establish institutions indispensable to an exalted civilization.

Greenleaf & Houghton was succeeded on the lower side of the way by George Boardman; and it was there where Henry Goodnow, whose career as a merchant and citizen, is familiar to most of the people of this town, took his first lessons in the mercantile business. He worked as clerk under Boardman till about 1833, when he bought out Boardman, and was the owner of the store and responsible party in trade, on that side of the way ever after that. He did an extensive and profitable business for the next ten years, and accumulated a property that with prudent management would have made him one of the most wealthy merchants in this part of the State. But his ambition for wealth prompted him to invest too much in land speculations, and real estate securities in Readsboro, and other towns, when lands were high, and still rising; and this, together with some losses in the lumbering and mill business in Hartwellville, and the extensive litigation in which he became involved, used up his spare capital, and the decline in the value of real estate, which he held too long in hopes of better prices, together with the accumulating taxes and costs of litigation, which he was compelled to pay, has reduced him to a position that 35 years ago would have been thought impossible.

In 1824 or 1825, Eli Higley, long a resident and leading citizen of Whitingham, and an active, enterprising business man, formed a partnership with Asahel Booth, who was trading in the store built by Messrs.

Goodnow, and built a new store and hotel near the old one first built. They did business under the firm name of "Higley & Booth," for two or three years after the completion of their new store; then Higley sold out to a Mr. Houghton, and the firm changed to "Houghton & Booth." They did a more extensive business in trade for a few years than any other store ever did in Whitingham. They continued trade there till Geo. Boardman and Reuben Winn bought them out in 1833. The store was then run in the name of "Boardman & Winn" for a year or two, when Winn bought Boardman's interest and run the store alone for a short time, when he took in Rufus Chase as a partner, and the store was run in the firm name of "Winn & Chase" till Chase died in 1846.

For nearly half a century before this, this hill had been the common business centre for the whole town, and for many years drew a large share of the trade of adjoining towns. There was a time when this hill was the most central mart for all kinds of merchandise known in this part of the county. The people all took an interest in its progress. A spirit of enterprising emulation pervaded all classes. The common people were of necessity industrious and economical in their habits; the theory of living upon other people's earnings had not yet become popular; few, if any, in this section of the country adopted that course. Manual labor was no dishonor to any class of citizens; even professional men could work on the farm a portion of the time without detriment to their professional standing. They duly appreciated its invigorating effect on both their physical and mental powers. And the people were bound together in fraternal feelings of sympathy for each other's welfare. "Every man for himself and the devil take the hindmost," had not become the paramount rule of action. If any were unfortunate, the whole neighborhood felt it a privilege, as well as a duty, to render charitable assistance. At that age the people not only of this town, but of all other towns in this part of the State, were a hardy, industrious, self-reliant race of people, depending entirely upon their own labor and their own resources for the support of themselves and their families. Farming was the almost exclusive business of the whole town, and the products of the soil and the growth of stock on the farm afforded a liberal surplus annually to most of the inhabitants. Farming paid then, as well as other pursuits. Dairying business was then profitable, and almost every farmer was, to a greater or less extent, engaged in it. From five to 20 cows might be seen in every farmer's yard, besides a good flock of sheep and other stock; mechanics and laborers were under no necessity of sending to city markets for the necessities of life; the neighboring farmers had an ample supply of the finest quality.

The sound of the woodman's axe and the noise of the flail gave as much satisfaction half a century ago as the hum of machinery at the present time. So, too, the noise of the shuttle and the music of the spinning wheel, were cherished with as much delight by the ladies of that age, as that of the organ and piano of to-day. We cannot too greatly revere the memory of our fathers and mothers for their noble home virtues and the lessons of economy they taught us; their industrious and persevering energy, and the graceful course they pursued in the culture of domestic economy and the arts of civilization, in this then almost wilderness town. We of the present time can have but limited conceptions of the hardships and privations they cheerfully endured for the benefit of their posterity, and to found such institutions for human society as tend to an enlightened and progressive organization. May the successive generations ever be grateful for their exemplary wisdom in laying the foundations of social and progressive elements of the highest form of civilization in an undeveloped and growing township.

But to return to our narrative of the centre village. While this place remained the common centre of the whole town, the store and hotel had all the business they could attend to, and scarce a day passed in the winter, when the weather was favorable, but that from ten to twenty-five teams might be seen there during the business hours of the day. It was no uncommon occurrence to have an hundred tierces of lime bought and sold in a single day. Mechanics too, of every occupation, were kept constantly busy to supply the wants of the farming classes, then more than twice as numerous as now. This was the most progressive and prosperous days of the town; from 1815 to 1835. As early as 1838, the trade and business of this long cherished centre began to decline. Jacksonville began to be a place of some importance, and drew quite a share of the business from this common centre. About that time, Cyrus and Mat-uren Ballou conceived the idea of starting a store to be called the "Farmer's Interest Co." of which we shall give a more definite account hereafter.

In former times, when this hill was the common centre of attraction, on every public day the village would be thronged with people from every section of the town,—for the double purpose of conferring with each other upon social and business matters, and having a good time generally. Not the least enjoyable of these holiday gatherings for all classes, old and young alike, was "June Training Day," when almost the entire town would assemble; the young men for a jolly game of ball, and other athletic sports common in those days, and the old men to relate the news of the day, and enjoy a social chat over their glass of toddy and lemon punch, of which at that time it was no dishonor to partake.

On one of these training days, the boys as usual had taken their position on the public common for a game of ball, and when they had got nicely started in their game, the Captain of the militia company, feeling perhaps a little too proud of his authority, marched his men directly on to the grounds they occupied evidently with a view of routing and driving them off. The boys, in the true spirit of "young America," loudly protested against such invasion of their supposed rights, but finally, with generous magnanimity yielded to the Captain, and took a position in the highway a little below. The Captain, elated with his success in routing the boys, after drilling his company a short time, marched them back into the highway, formed them into platoons with fixed bayonets, for the purpose of marching them down the road directly over the boys' new quarters. But this time they were determined to resist such unwarrantable encroachments of their rights. And as the Captain approached with his platoons covering the entire width of the highway, Jonas Brown, a tall, bony, athletic fellow (but having a bad impediment of speech,) stationed himself in the center of the highway, ball club in hand, with his comrades on his left, and as the platoons approached, straightened himself up at full length, stamping his foot upon the ground, as if to give force to his order, exclaimed "Hah, hah, half the road!"

The Captain, paying no attention to his order, marched his men with their bayonets covering the whole road, intending to scare the boys off; but when they came within reach, they unceremoniously knocked the bayonets right and left with their ball clubs, and some of the soldiers were seen gathering themselves up from the ground amid the shouts and cheers of the crowd. The Captain, seeing the determination of the boys, and by the shouts and cheers of lookers on, finding their sympathies were with them, retreated in disorder. Chagrined at the defeat of his military prowess in routing the boys, he dispatched an orderly to the office of the local lawyer, John E. Butler, with his complaint, and for a warrant to arrest the ball players, for breach of peace, assault and battery, etc. But he was still more stumped, when his messenger returned with the opinion of the lawyer, that in view of the circumstances, he was the aggressor—that the boys had equally as good right to the public common, or highway, with their ball clubs, as he had with his bayonets. And finally the Captain, with his men, peaceably withdrew to another place to drill, a wiser, if not a better man.

CHURCH HISTORY.

Although the Methodist church organization has never been the leading religious denomination in the town of Whitingham, since the Baptist church was formed, in 1808, it undoubtedly held precedence of any other religious organization.

From the published proceedings of the Vermont Methodist State Convention, held at Montpelier, September 20th and 21st, 1870, and the historical statistics therein recorded, we find that the Whitingham Circuit was one of the three first formed in the State.

We give here the names of the Methodist ministers that have preached in Whitingham, under the direction of the Methodist Episcopal Annual Conference: In 1799, Peter Vannest; in 1800, Michael Coats, Joseph Michell; in 1801, Daniel Bromley; in 1802, Elijah Ward, Asa Kent; in 1803, Phineas Peck, Caleb Dustin; in 1804, John Tinkham; in 1805, Ebenezer Fairbanks, David Goodhue; in 1806, Laban Clark; in 1807, Andrew McKain, Major Curtis; in 1808, Reuben Harris, Cyprain H. Gridley; in 1809, and 1810, Samuel Cochran; in 1811, Reuben Harris, Cyrus Culver; in 1812, Cyrus Culver, John Reynolds; in 1813, Andrew McKain, Stephen Richmond; in 1814, Gilbert Lyon, Daniel Breyton; in 1815, David J. Wright, Phineas Dean; in 1816, Samuel Eighmey, Sherman Minor. The minutes and records show no preacher sent to Whitingham, by the Methodist Annual Conference, from 1815 to 1843.

The Rev. Asa Kent, who was sent here in 1802, relates an incident, in one of their meetings in Whitingham, as given in the record of the Vermont Methodist State Convention at Montpelier, in September, 1870. In the early history of the Methodist denomination in Whitingham, Rev. Mr. Kent is quoted as saying: "One important office at that day, was the Tithingman, who, armed with a long rod, at once weapon and staff of office, presided over the Sabbath congregation, with full power to remind unwary hearers by a thrust from his wand, of any undue disposition to sleep, or other indiscretion."

In 1843, the Whitingham Circuit was revived, and the Annual Conference took measures to supply the people with preaching. The Rev. John L. Smith was assigned the pastorate for that year. The records shows no preacher sent to this town, from that time, till 1849, when the Rev. Mr. Smith was again sent here, and preached in 1849 and 1850. In 1852, John Tylor; in 1858, Moses Spencer; in 1859, Michael R. Chase; in 1860 and 1861, Zenas Kingsbury; in 1865 and 1866, John S. Little; from 1867 to 1872, Hubbard Eastman; in 1873, J. H. Gaylord; in 1874, E. H. Bartlett; in 1875, Hubbard Eastman; in 1877, 78 and 79, R. B. Fay; in 1880, F. T. Lovett; in 1881 and 1882, J. Hamilton.

The Methodists have never since the organization of the Baptist church, in 1808, been the leading religious denomination in the town of Whitingham. Although they have ostensibly built two churches, one at the village of Sadawga, in 1861, and one at Jacksonville, both were built mostly by subscriptions from the local inhabitants, outside the Methodist church or society.

FORMATION OF THE BAPTIST CHURCH.

The Baptist was the first permanent church organization established in this town. It was organized in 1808, and its records have been very well kept to the present time. We give an account of its formation as shown by the records.

"At Whitingham, Sept. 8, 1808, a number of the Baptist brethren met according to previous appointment, opened our meeting by prayer, then proceeded to consider the duties we owe to each other, and of the local distance of sister churches. After these serious considerations, we mutually agreed to form ourselves into a church, if thought expedient by council; proceeded to choose Walter Eames to serve as Clerk, and agreed to send to four Baptist churches to assist in embodying said church, viz.: First Guilford, First Coleraine, Heath and Halifax.

These brethren, after due consultation, finally fixed the 18th day of October next as the time to call the council for the purpose indicated, and adjourned their meeting to that date. And on the 18th day of October, 1808, the council met at the meeting-house in Whitingham Centre, according to the previous request of these brethren, consisting of the four churches above named, by their Pastors and delegates, and after solemn prayer to God for direction, proceeded to examine the articles of faith and covenant presented by the brethren present, and voted to accept them. The brethren and sisters that assented to them, and subscribed their names, were as follows:

BROTHERS.

Josiah Brown, William Franklin, Joseph Olden, James Warren, Joseph Stone, Walter Eames, Jonas Brown, James Carpenter, Joseph Brown, Joel B. Eames.

SISTERS.

Milicent Brown, Sarah Franklin, Leah Olden, Susanna Howe, Lucy

Tarbell, Katharine Eames, Lois Brown, Esther Eames, Dorcas Sahin, Olive Eames, Esther Eames, 2d.

At a meeting in September of that year, the church being desirous to join the association then called the "Leyden Association," requested their Pastor, Rev. Mr. Spaulding, to draft a letter to the association setting forth their request. They also voted to call a council to ordain Rev. Mr. Spaulding; he remained two years.

For the next four or five years this church had no settled minister but was supplied with preaching most of the time, by different ministers from Coleraine, Heath, Wilmington and Halifax. In 1816, Rev. Linus Austin, came here and commenced preaching on the 12th day of December, it was decided to give him a call, and he became pastor of the church.

At a church meeting January 23, 1819, a unanimous vote of satisfaction with the labors of Elder Austin was passed, and the same meeting voted to pay him one hundred dollars yearly, for his labors. The church continued to gain in numbers, by the untiring labors of their pastor, and the more active members of his charge.

In 1824, the church contained 61 members, 28 brothers and 33 sisters. At a meeting October 7, 1824, the records show a withdrawal of fellowship with Samuel Tyler, and during the previous year three were dismissed from the church, two died, and two were added, leaving the whole number at that date, 60. The next annual report shows one dismissed, leaving 59.

In January 1826, Elder Paul Hines, and his wife Sally Hines, were taken into the church by letter from the Chesterfield Church, and in March following, he was employed to preach three-fourths of the Sabbaths, Rev. Linus Austin having resigned his pastorate. Rev. Paul Hines continued his labors as Minister during that year.

On the 4th day of Dec. 1827,

Rev. Amherst Lamb, and his wife, were received by letter from the church of Guilford. He was soon after installed as Pastor of the Baptist Church in Whitingham, where he remained a long time, and performed, the greatest part of his clerical labors.

In 1833, the Baptist meeting house in the centre village on the hill was built, with but little funds from outside the church. We find no record of the time it was dedicated, but it was in the fall, or early winter of that year.

June 1, 1839, Foster Hartwell was accepted as pastor.

May 11, 1845, Rev. Amherst Lamb came back from Charlemont, and again labored with the church. For the next ten years there were no very notable changes in the condition and progress of this church; it still continued to be the leading church in town.

In October, 1857, Rev. Erastus A. Briggs came from Hinsdale, N. H., preached to the church till January, 1858, when he was ordained, and became pastor of the church, with which he faithfully labored till his death, June 4, 1861. He was a sincere and beloved pastor.

Rev. Thomas Wrinkle came to this church, was called by the brethren Sept. 9, 1861, from the Baptist church in Colebrook, Conn., and was installed as pastor of this church. He officiated as pastor of the church till he was mustered into the army, Jan. 5, 1864. He served in the army about a year and a half, when he got a discharge and came home. And on the 31st of March, 1865, letters of dismissal were granted by the church to him and his family, and a letter of recommendation as minister of the Gospel was given to him to the Baptist church in Bernardston, or any other church of the same faith and order. And in June of the same year, letters of dismissal were given to James Warren, and Linus A. Warren, and their wives Philena and Sophrona Warren, and letters of recommendation to the Baptist church at Shelburne Falls, Mass. Henry Dodds and family also had letters of dismissal and recommendation given at the same time.

April 3, 1866, Rev. P. T. Briggs was next pastor.

At a communion service, Jan. 5, 1878, the church extended the hand of full fellowship to Deacon Aldis Brown, from whom such fellowship had been withheld for some time.

June 1, 1870, Rev. S. P. Bennett was ordained by council. He and Rev. E. D. Wilcox supplied the church with preaching till June, 1872, when Rev. W. D. Hall from Springfield, Vt., commenced his labors with the church as pastor. He was ordained June 12, 1873, and continued to preach till Oct. 25, 1874, at which time he closed his labors with the church. The church next employed the Rev. Mr. Wooster as a supply, and he occupied the desk from Feb. 1, till March 7, 1875.

June 20, 1875, Rev. J. G. Bennett was employed, and commenced his labors with the church. In October, 1876, Rev. Mr. Bennett resigned. Rev. E. D. Wilcox then came as a supply, and he and Rev. Jacob Davis supplied till the last of March, 1877.

The Rev. L. Tandy was their next minister. He came April, 1877, and commenced his labor as pastor May 13, 1877. He closed his labors as pastor May 4, 1879. Rev. Origen Smith was called June 1, 1879, and labored with them to the time of his death, Dec. 21, 1884.

Since the death of Rev. Origen Smith, the Rev. Mr. Colesworth has been the pastor.

UNIVERSALIST SOCIETY.

We find no record of any society or organization of Universalists in Whitingham till Jan. 1, 1817.

On the 15th day of March, 1817, a meeting was held to see if they would employ Rev. Hosea Ballou to preach the Gospel, any part of the ensuing year.

The meeting was then adjourned to Sept. 6, 1817, at which time it was "Voted to request the General Convention to receive this society into the fellowship of said convention, and Messrs. Waste and Whitney be a committee to prepare a request."

From this time forward, for the next fifteen years, this society kept up its organization; annually electing its proper officers and supported preaching more or less each year. And after Rev. Hosea F. Ballou came to this town in 1833, he was the regular minister of the Universalist denomination while he lived in town.

At an adjourned meeting holden January 28, 1850, it was voted to build a meeting-house. Accordingly they chose a building committee of three to contract for and superintend the building of said house. James Roberts, David Jillson, and Leonard Brown were chosen for said committee.

The house was built in the summer of 1850, and on its completion and acceptance by said committee, the pews, were mostly sold, and the avails applied to cancel the debt. It was dedicated in the early part of the winter of 1850 and '51, and Rev. Hosea F. Ballou was employed to preach one-half the time for the next four or five years.

On the 13th day of May, 1851, at a special meeting of the society, an arrangement was made with Parley Starr, David Jillson, and Martin Brown, to take the unsold pews, and for that consideration to discharge all indebtedness of the society for building the meeting-house. On the 28th of December, 1856, Rev. H. F. Ballou tendered his resignation. It was accepted, and he spent the rest of his life, in Wilmington.

Rev. Jeremiah Gifford preached one-half the time after April 1st, 1857, till March, 1862.

N. C. Hodgden commenced his labors as pastor, June, 1862, preached three years; since that time there has been no settled minister, but Rev. Jeremiah Gifford has preached to the society most of the time. The Universalist society has been the leading religious organization in the village of Jacksonville, ever since its formation in 1849. Present Pastor, E. W. Pierce.

FREE-WILL BAPTISTS.

In 1830, a meeting of a number of the inhabitants of the northeast part of the town was held, and they formed themselves into a church by the name of the "Free-Will Baptist Church."

In the summer of 1831, a meeting-house was built, and public worship was held therein for the next ten years. The ministers that preached in that church during that time, were Rev. Daniel Leonard, Calvin Buckland, Jacob Couliard, Russell Barrett, and Peter S. Gates. Calvin Buckland, and Peter S. Gates were for a long time residents of Whitingham, but they afterward removed to Halifax, where they died.

This church and society have been annihilated, their house of worship demolished, and not a vestige is left to mark the place where it stood.

JACKSONVILLE.

JACKSONVILLE.

This village, now the most important business centre in the town of Whitingham, is situated in the northeastern part of the town, on the banks of North River. It is a narrow gorge between the abruptly rising hills on the east, and the more gradual slopes from the centre ridge on the west. The fall of the river is rapid in this locality, and affords many good sights for water power mills, and manufacturing establishments. It is a thriving village of about 760 inhabitants. Contains two churches, an excellent school-house, with two school-rooms, and a large village hall for public purposes, lectures, concerts, exhibitions at agricultural fairs, town meetings, etc., etc. There are two stores, one hotel, two saw-mills, one grist-mill, sash and door shop, carriage shop, two blacksmith shops, an establishment for manufacturing apple jelly, three shops for manufacturing butter boxes and tubs, besides a tin shop and several other industries in the line of manufacturing different kinds of goods.

FIRST SETTLEMENTS.

The earliest trace we can get of any settlement in this place, was about 1808. There were then three families living in this vicinity: a Mr. Patrick Peebles, living on, or near the place where Josiah French now lives, ran a grist-mill then owned by Col. Isaac Martin. Obed Foster lived on a place later known as the "Burn's place," the house standing a little back from Dea. L. A. Warren's barn. And a man by the name of Brown, lived near where Albert C. Stetson's house now stands.

People settled here for a permanent residence, as fast as houses could be built or tenements procured. It gained so rapidly for two or three years, that some wag in the centre village of the town gave it the name of "New Boston."

Laban J. Childs from Wilmington, came here about 1838, and kept a grocery store in connection with Charles Foster, near the site of the drug store. Mr. Childs soon built a new store and dwelling house. Mr. Childs and his brother Adin T. Childs, went into trade on an extensive scale.

About 1838, Capt. Elias Stone went into company with Willard Foster, in the lumber and turning business. They did a large business in that line for several years, that added materially to the growing importance of the place. But Parley Starr and Martin Brown were at that time the two central figures in business.

This village had become of acknowledged importance as a business centre in the town of Whitingham, as early as 1841 and gained very rapidly for the next decade.

David Jillson, Jr., long a noted citizen of Whitingham, left his old farm on the "Streeter hill" in the spring of 1846, and came to this village and bought the place that Dr. Wilcox had bought and began to build a house upon the fall before his death. He was a prominent and worthy citizen, a man of ample means, a leading citizen in town affairs and represented the town in the General Assembly.

In 1850, Amos A. Brown and his father, Amos Brown, left the old farm that the old gentleman had lived on for nearly half a century, came to this village, built a house, and made this their residence the remainder of their lives. Amos A. was for a long time deputy sheriff. He was a man of keen sensibilities, but took affectionate care of his father and mother in their old age, careful to provide for all their wants. His health failed when he was in the prime of life; he died the 2d day of January, 1869, aged 52. His father and mother both lived to old age.

Norris L. Stetson, so long known as a merchant in Jacksonville, was a native of Wilmington, came here in 1850. In 1867, he built the new store that he now occupies. In 1870, Wells P. Jones, a native of Dover, came to this village and went into partnership with him, and the business was carried on by Stetson & Jones for 13 years. N. L. Stetson has been the leading merchant in Jacksonville, and a leading and influential man in social and business circles; not only in this village, but throughout the entire town as well. Has been postmaster in Jacksonville for 20 years past; was town treasurer and trustee of the public school fund for many years, and represented the town in the General Assembly in 1867 and 1868.

E. L. Roberts, a native of Whitingham, established a store in the upper part of the village, opposite the store lately occupied by M. W.

Stickney, where he carried on the clothing business in connection with his general merchandise. He was an active, persevering business man, and after he left the store was deputy sheriff, and one of the selectmen of the town for several years. He went from this town to Proctorsville, in the county of Windsor, bought a store and went into trade there a few years, but left there and went to Winchester, N. H., where he now is.

In 1867, Parley Starr built the store where M. W. Stickney lately traded.

The business of E. J. Corkins and the Holbrooks is of no small importance to this place; although they do not live in the immediate village, their business affairs all centre here, and their freighting and trade is all done here. And they are really a part of the inhabitants of Jacksonville.

Parley Starr has done more for this village, by way of donations or voluntary contributions, than any other, and perhaps more than all other men living.

The business interests of Jacksonville at the present time consists of three stores, and one hotel; E. E. Putnam's saw-mill and box factory; Porter's grist and saw-mill, in connection with their box business; Stetson Brothers' saw-mill and box shop, cider-mill and apple jelly works; the sash, door, and undertaker's shop of Leonard Brown, blacksmith, harness, and carriage-makers' shops in the immediate village, and the saw-mill and chair-stock shop of E. J. Corkins a mile below, make Jacksonville one of the most productive villages of its size, in southern Vermont.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES OF IMPORTANT FAMILIES.

GREEN FAMILY.

Nathan and Amos Green were amongst the earliest settlers of the town of Whitingham. Their names appear in the early records as prominent men in the public affairs of the town. They came from Hampden County, Mass.; their father, Roberts Green, settled in that county in 1743. He married Sarah Rogers, Oct. 11th, 1744; purchased a tract of land and established a home in the western part of the town of Wales; and the present line between Wales and Munson runs through the old farm where he first settled.

Nathan and Amos were born in Wales; Nathan, the 28th day of March, 1756, but the records of the town of Wales do not show the date of the birth of Amos. He was younger than Nathan, married Mary Nelson, and removed to Whitingham, Vt., when the town was almost an unbroken forest, procured a large tract of land about the centre of the town; and later he deeded to the town, the ten acres of land called "The Common," for public purposes; and also a lot for the burying ground, north of the centre village. His name appears in the first Grand List that the records show taken in town 1781; he was chosen Town Clerk the second year of the town's organized existence, and constantly held some of the important offices in town while he remained in Whitingham; about fifteen years. He had four children by his first wife, all born in Whitingham, where she died. He then returned to Wales, and married two other wives.

Nathan Green, the common ancestor of the Green families in Whitingham, married Sarah Shields, May 10th, 1780, and immediately removed from his native town to Whitingham, Vt. He, with his wife, were amongst the pioneer settlers of this new township; they came when it was nearly all the way from Greenfield an entire wilderness, and were obliged to travel on foot or horseback.

His family consisted of eleven children, five sons and six daughters, all born on the farm where he first settled. Most of them settled and spent the principal part of their lives in their native town. Their names and the date of their births were as follows :

Hannah Green, born January 31, 1781, married Lincoln Hall, went to Pennsylvania.

William A., b. Sept. 14, 1814; m. Alice Starr, Sept. 21, 1877, is now cashier of the People's National Bank at Brattleboro.

Emma M., b. Oct. 19, 1854; m. Henry H. Holbrook, May 4, 1873.

Emma (Faulkner) Holbrook, d. Dec. 17, 1882.

Clarissa Green, m. David B. Flint, Jan. 12, 1853; went to Orange, Mass.

We shall not attempt a further detail of the fourth and fifth generation of the descendants of the Green family in Whitingham, as they nearly all left the town at an early age. Some of the children of Sally (Green) Bowen, however, spent most of their lives in this town. Alfred Bowen was for many years a prominent business man in Whitingham. d. Dec. 18, 1877, age 57.

Henry A. Bowen lives at Shelburne Falls.

BROWN FAMILY.

There is no family name that fills a more conspicuous place in the town's history for the first half of the current century, than that of Brown. Not that anything peculiar marked their course of life, or that they were the most active leaders of that age, but they were men of stern integrity, industrious and enterprising farmers, and wielded an influence both in the church and in business matters in the town, more salutary in effect, than any other one family ever did. The five brothers and one sister (whose husband's name was Brown), that settled in Whitingham, were from a family of 12 children, nine brothers and three sisters, all natives of New Ipswich, N. H. Their paternal ancestor, Josiah Brown, was a direct descendant of the sturdy stock of English yeomanry, and he and his children inherited the persevering energy of our Pilgrim Fathers. He was a man of marked ability and influence in the town where he lived—a true patriot, a devoted Christian, an active participator in the Revolutionary struggle; fought in the battle of Bunker Hill, and his company was the last to retreat before the British regulars.

The names of the five brothers that settled in Whitingham from 1795 to 1807, was Josiah, Joseph, Jonas, Amos and Nathan; and the sister's name was Sarah; she married a man by the name of Reuben Brown. The five brothers were all members of the Baptist church.

Josiah Brown married Milicent Wright, and came to Whitingham about 1795, settled on the farm now owned by Joseph W. Morse, where he lived till he went to Bennington with his son Edmund, and lived there with him the rest of his days. He had a family of nine children, five died in infancy or quite young. The names of the four that lived to be men, were: Rufus, Clement, Edmund and George W. Rufus was the most prominent man of the four; was often elected to important offices of trust in the town, was clerk of the Baptist church five years, and once represented the town in the General Assembly. He was a thrifty, well-to-do-farmer,—owned and lived on the same farm for 55 years, and died at his home, Aug. 9, 1875, at the age of 78.

Clement spent most of his life in Whitingham, but moved to Halifax a short time before he died. He married Polly Eames, had no children, died at Halifax, Aug. 7, 1849, aged 49.

Edmund lived with his father on the old homestead farm, till they sold out and went to Bennington, where he and his father both died. Edmund bought a farm there and followed farming the remainder of his life. Josiah Brown died at Bennington, Jan. 20, 1858, at the advanced age of 91. Edmund also died there at his home, Oct. 11, 1866, aged 61.

George W. acquired a good education in early life, left this town when a young man, went to the State of Pennsylvania.

Joseph Brown married Sally Preston, came to Whitingham about the same time his brother Josiah did, and settled on the farm north of and adjoining his brother's, on which he spent his whole life, and where he died March 2, 1827. His family consisted of two sons and one daughter: Joseph W., James P. and Jemima. The boys were known as Wright and Preston; the former was long and well-known as Capt. Brown, lived and died on the old farm his father first settled on, sometime before the commencement of the present century. He took an active interest in starting and building up the business interests of the village of Jacksonville; was a prominent and active member in the Universalist Society. He died at his home July 18, 1855, aged 63.

Preston married a highly respected lady, and had a respectable and intelligent family of children.

Jemima was an invalid for many years.

Jonas Brown, familiarly known as "Deacon Jonas," married Lois Russell, came to Whitingham in 1797, settled on the farm (then an entire wilderness) lately owned by S. D. Faulkner. He had a family of twelve children, seven sons and five daughters, one of which died in infancy, the rest all lived to maturity, and most of them to a good old age.

His children were trained with scrupulous care.

Harvey, although not amongst the oldest of the children, made himself one of the most noted school teachers Whitingham ever produced. Besides that, he was a noted citizen of the town, was frequently elected one of the selectmen and other town officers, and twice represented the town in the General Assembly.

Jerimah, the oldest son, went to Stamford, in the county of Bennington, when quite a young man, and died there Mar. 4, 1849, at the age of 53. Russel, one of the younger brothers, of whom mention is made under the heading of the Baptist church, was a scholar. He died in Williams College in 1835, at the age of 23. Martin, whose career as a business man was most fully developed in establishing and building up the business interests of Jacksonville, died in the prime of life at the age of 51. All the rest of this family were industrious and worthy citizens, of more than ordinary intelligence. Most of them had large families, and many of their numerous descendants have left Whitingham for a broader field.

Amos Brown, married Sally Tarbell, and came to this town and settled on his old farm, so long known as the Esquire Amos Brown farm (now owned by Charles H. Waste), near the beginning of the present century. His family, that lived to maturity, consisted of three sons and two daughters. Elliot, the oldest son, studied medicine, and practiced his profession here with satisfactory success for several years, was deeply interested in the public affairs of the town, energetic and persevering in whatever he undertook, was town clerk for years, postmaster two years, and was a noted party leader in the centre village. He went to Shaftsbury, practiced his profession there a few years, then went to Wisconsin where we suppose he still lives.

Aldis and Amos A., the other two brothers, remained in Whitingham. Aldis has long been one of the solid and thrifty farmers; has owned and lived on the same farm for more than half a century. He has had two wives, and a large and interesting family of children, most of whom have left their native town, and are now extensively engaged in business in different sections of the country.

Amos A. lived with his father on the old homestead till 1849. He was more of a public man than Aldis; was deputy sheriff of this county for a number of years, and often held offices of trust in this town; was an active business man in matters pertaining to the interest of the town. He lived with, and took care of his father and mother in their last years, and died at his home of a lingering disease, Jan 2, 1860, at the age of 52.

One of the sisters in this family married F. G. Davis, of this town, and spent her whole life in Whitingham. She died in Dec., 1849, at the age of 40. The other sister married Dr. Corkins, who practiced a few years in the county of Bennington, then they went to Wisconsin, where she died at the age of 44.

Nathan Brown married Betsey Goldsmith and came to Whitingham about 1810, and settled on the farm lately known as the "Elder Lamb place." Their family consisted of two sons and two daughters, that lived to maturity. This family was the most remarkable for literary and theological talent of any family in town. Nathan, was a noted scholar from his early boyhood; he went to Williams college, where he graduated with the highest honors as a scholar and a theologian, very young. He was sent to China and Japan where he spent 23 years as missionary of the Baptist church; he then returned to his native country, edited and published a paper called "The American Baptist," a few years, then returned to foreign countries, where he died Jan. 1, 1886. He has translated the New Testament into many foreign languages, has written and published many valuable theological works, both in English and foreign languages. To do justice to his history would require more space than we can allow in this volume.

William G., the younger brother, was also a ripe scholar, and a devoted christian. He had a superior talent for poetry, as the many specimens now extant clearly prove. He ranked high in the volume entitled "Vermont Poets and Poetry." He is still living, in the State of Wisconsin.

The elder sister in this interesting family married Jonathan Ballard of Charlemont, Mass.; had a large family of children, most of them now occupying prominent positions in society and in the church. She is living with her son, her husband having died about 20 years ago. The younger sister died unmarried, Sept. 9, 1872, age 54.

Reuben Brown's wife, the sister of these five brothers that settled in Whitingham, had an intelligent family of 11 children. She was a woman of extraordinary ability, and an acknowledged leader in the social, moral and religious circles of that age. This family left Whitingham about 1825, went to Jefferson County, N. Y.

WASTE FAMILY.

Bezaleel Waste, the paternal ancestor of the Waste family in Whitingham, was born in 1742; Joanna Waste, his wife, in 1743. They lived a few years in the vicinity of Cape Cod, and Ebenezer Waste, Sr., so well known in this town 50 years ago, was born there in 1768. His father, Bezaleel Waste, with his family, removed from Cape Cod to the town of Hague, near the shore of Lake George, in 1790. Ebenezer, soon after, left his father's family and settled in the town of Somerset, in the County of Windham. He lived there about 10 years, and his three oldest children were born there. In this lone wilderness his principal business was hunting and trapping, for which he possessed superior skill. He managed to accumulate $1,200, chiefly by the sale of furs and skins, captured with rifles, dogs and traps.

He married Lydia Baldwin of Mansfield, Conn., October 5, 1796, and immediately moved into the wilds of Somerset, where they lived till 1804, when they moved to Whitingham.

His family consisted of three sons and one daughter.

Charles Waste, born July 3, 1798, went to the State of Ohio when a young man, married there, was a civil engineer, was killed Sept. 15, 1821, by the fall of a tree, leaving a wife and one child, who afterwards came to Whitingham.

Ebenezer Waste, Jr., born October 20, 1801, married, first, Rebecca Fuller. She died June 26, 1826. He married, second, the widow of his elder brother, Charles Waste.

Uriah Waste, born June 1, 1804, died unmarried Feb. 6, 1856.

Deborah Waste, born Aug. 12, 1807, married Levi Sumner, a native of Whitingham. They settled in Heath, Mass., where he died. She is still living on the old homestead with her son, Oscar A. Sumner.

Bezaleel Waste died Sept. 2, 1818, aged 76. Joana, his wife, died May 20, 1815, aged 72. Ebenezer Waste, Sr., died at his home, Dec. 13, 1847, aged 79. Lydia, his wife, d. Aug. 29, 1845, aged 76.

Ebenezer Waste and his two sons, Ebenezer Jr., and Uriah, lived together on the same farm, ever after they came to Whitingham.

The family of Ebenezer Waste, Jr., consisted of three children, two daughters and one son, by his first wife.

Lydia Waste, b. June 26, 1822, m. Dr. Reuben Green of Boston.

Amelia Waste, b. May 5, 1854, m. Diodorus Sawyer, Sept. 1847; they lived on the old Waste homestead. She d. March 17, 1884.

Charles Waste, b. Nov. 15, 1825, m. Hattie S. Warren of Whitingham.

Rebecca Fuller Waste, wife of Ebenezer, Jr., d. at her home, June 26, 1826.

By his second wife, Ebenezer, Jr., had one daughter and two sons; the daughter m. Lyman Stone of Royalston, Mass.

George E. Waste, m. a lady in Boston, lives in San Francisco, Cal.

Lewis Sanford Waste went to Michigan, m. there, has one or more children.

Ebenezer, Jr., d. at his home on the old farm, June 17, 1878, aged 77.

Lucinda Waste, second wife of Ebenezer, Jr., d. April 3, 1854.

STICKNEY FAMILY.

Silas Richard Stickney, the common ancestor of the Stickney families in Whitingham, was a native of Tewksbury, Mass., b. April 7, 1751, m. Sarah Upton of Reading, Mass. in 1774, by whom he had seven children. She d. in 1793. He m. for a second wife, Betsey Preston of Whitingham, Vt. He first settled in Temple, N. H., and on the alarm of war, April 19, 1775, marched to Cambridge—was one of those who were willing to pledge their fortunes and their lives for their country in 1776. On the 13th of May, 1777, he marched under Captain Josiah Brown, of New Ipswich, N. H., to Ticonderoga—was in John Starks' brigade of volunteers, that marched from New Ipswich and joined the army under General Gates, at Stillwater, July 19, 1777, and was in the battle of Bennington, August 16, 1777. And from the pay roll of record, it appears he was discharged on the 20th of September.

Silas and Martin Stickney, two of his sons, were for a long time well known in Whitingham, both born in Temple, N. H.; Silas, August 8, 1779, m. Eunice Wood of Templeton, Mass., June 22, 1803, came to this town and settled. It was then an unbroken wilderness, but he bravely encountered the perils and hardships of pioneer life, while clearing up his farm, and establishing a future home for himself and family. He spent his whole life on the same farm where he cut the first tree. His wife d. June 18, 1840. He m. a second wife, Clarissa Foster, of Wilmington, Vt., May 4, 1842. She d. April 21, 1848.

His children, all by his first wife, were as follows:

Silas Stickney, b. April 8, 1804, m. Matilda Garner.

Sarah Stickney, b. Oc. 2, 1805, m. Duane Stimpson, first; Calvin Clark, second.

Martin Stickney, b. May 19, 1807, m. Charlotte Stickney, first; Mrs. Martha (Preston) Lamb, second.

Susan Stickney, b. Feb. 13, 1809, m. John Haradon.

Stillman Stickney, b. Nov. 18, 1810, m. Emeline Powers.

Rufus Stickney, b. July 8, 1812, m. Adeline Kendal.

Silas R. Stickney, b. April 20, 1814, d. Dec. 26, 1844.

Harvey Stickney, b. June 2, 1816, m. Mary A. Lake.

Lydia Stickney, b. Jan. 4, 1819, now living in Whitingham unmarried.

Silas Stickney d. at his home in Whitingham, Nov. 17, 1857, at the age of 78.

Most of the children of this family left Whitingham at an early age, settled in different parts of the State of Mass. Martin and Harvey were the only two of the sons that stayed in this town. And Martin d. at his home, Dec. 6, 1874. He left but one child, a son named Lewis, who is now living in Jacksonville. Harvey has three sons, two of which are living in Mass., and the other, M. W. Stickney, lives in Brattleboro. Sarah (Stimpson-Clark) lived and d. in this town; she had four sons and three daughters; Martin D. Stimpson, b. May 5, 1828; Joel C. Stimpson, b. Sep. 16, 1829; James M. Stimpson, b. June 30, 1831, d. Jan. 10, 1842. Her first husband, Duane Stimpson, d. Sep. 7, 1831.

She afterwards m. Calvin Clark of Whitingham, June 1, 1837. Their children were Francelia E. Clark, b. March 23, 1838; Dora A. Clark, b. July 28, 1839; d. Feb. 11, 1864; Lucy L. Clark, b. April 7, 1841; d. May 31, 1864; Zimri A. Clark, b. Jan. 31, 1844; enlisted in the army and mustered into service at Brattleboro, Jan. 5, 1864; was sick and obtained leave to go home to Whitingham, and died there before his company left Brattleboro. Francelia E., now Mrs. Pike, is still living in Whitingham.

Mrs. Clark died at her home in Whitingham, Jan. 4, 1882, at the age of 76.

Martin Stickney, born in Temple, N. H., April 22, 1784; m. Hannah White of Middletown, Mass., Oct. 30, 1808; and came to Whitingham and settled on a farm, north of and adjoining his brother Silas' farm, where his ten children were born:

Prentice B. Stickney, b. April 9, 1809; m. Margaret B. Brazer.

Martha Stickney, b. Sept. 20, 1810; m. Daniel Cobleigh.

Hannah Stickney, b. May 4, 1813; m. John S. Trott.

Elizabeth Stickney, b. Feb. 13, 1815; died unmarried in 1839.

Charlotte Stickney, b. Nov. 9, 1817; m. Martin Stickney.

Olive H. Stickney, m. Robert R. Edwards.

Fannie Stickney, m. David Edwards.

Samuel B., d. in infancy.

Diana, b. March 4, 1827; m. Daniel A. Cheney.

Mary Jane, b. July 3, 1832; m. Wright P. Hall.

Mrs. Hannah (White) Stickney, d. in Whitingham, Aug. 29, 1850.

Martin Stickney died at the home of his daughter, Mrs. Cobleigh, in Templeton, Mass., March 1, 1863, at the age of 79.

This family all left Whitingham before 1855, except the wife of Martin Stickney, and settled in different parts of Massachusetts, and none of their descendants ever lived in this town.

DEATH OF CAPT. STICKNEY.

Capt. Almon L. Stickney, who died in his chair at his home in Marlboro, Vt., last Sunday, at the age of 53 years, was a man whose life record was unusual and full of romantic incidents. He was born in Whitingham, his parents being Silas and Matilda Stickney. He ran away to sea at the age of 15 years, and for 32 years followed the life of a sailor, serving in all capacities, but for most of the time as a captain. He made the trip around the world several times, and was for a number of years engaged in whaling, making numerous trips to the Arctic seas, visiting Iceland and Greenland. For a time he followed the business of the merchant marine. He had sailed to different parts of South America, Asia and Africa. His home when on shore was at New Bedford, and later at North Adams. He had the distinction of being the captain of the first vessel which made a trip with a cargo of corn direct from Chicago to London. At one time he taught astronomy in a private evening school at Chicago.

His health began to break down about 10 years ago, and being compelled to give up his life on the sea he moved to Whitingham in 1885, and two years later to Marlboro, where he has since carried on a general country store. His wife was Mary Russell of New Bedford, who survives him. He has a sister, Mrs. Partridge, who lives in North Adams. An uncle, Harvey Stickney, lives at Jacksonville. M. W., O. H. and I. L. Stickney, well known in Brattleboro, are his cousins. Capt. Stickney's logbook shows many thrilling situations which he passed through. He was of direct, forcible ways, and was admirably fitted for the life he followed.—

BRIGHAM FAMILY.

We shall not take space here to trace the genealogy of the Brigham family back to the first landing of their ancestors in New England; but the four Brighams that formerly lived in Whitingham were from a family of 12 children, 10 of which lived to maturity. Their father's name was Edmund Brigham, born Oct. 9, 1758, at Westboro, Mass.; moved from there to Phillipston, and from thence to Templeton, where he died April 22, 1841. The names of the four brothers that lived in this town were John, Lyscom, Edward and Dexter. John was born in Westboro, Mass.; married, first, Rebecca Smith of Phillipston, Mass., came to Whitingham in 1808, settled on the farm where Albert J. Faulkner now lives, then a wilderness, where he spent his whole life. He had seven children by his first wife, three sons and four daughters, one of which died quite young. His first wife d. Feb. 23, 1833.

He m. for a second wife, Huldah Wheeler of Halifax, Vt., Dec. 24, 1833, by whom he had three children, one of which d. in infancy. He m. for a third wife, Rebecca (Bardwell) Goss; she d. July 5, 1844. He m. for a fourth wife, Betsey (Preston) Brigham, widow of his brother, Lyscom Brigham. For nearly half a century he was the most prominent leader in the section of the town where he lived.

His six children by his first wife, were Freeman, Harriet, Mariah, Addison, Elvira, and Francis. Freeman married Mariah Smith, lives in Boston, Mass.

Harriet m. Luke Farnsworth of Halifax, Vt., d. in 1872.

Mariah m. Merrick Chase of this town, who lived in Jacksonville and in the centre of the town for about ten years. He was deputy sheriff for this county for a number of years. He went to Illinois, where he now resides.

Elvira m. Joseph Goodnow, a native of Whitingham, who lived on the old Joseph Goodnow farm, and d. there Sept. 14, 1847. They had one son, b. in Whitingham, Dec. 28, 1843. His widow m. Nathaniel J. Lord of Athol, Mass., where they now reside.

Addison, b. Jan. 25, 1824, m. Emily C. Parmelee of Wilmington, Vt. He resides in Boston, Mass., has two children.

Francis, b. Aug. 1, 1826, m. Millicent A. Brown, daughter of Rufus Brown of Whitingham; went west, resides in Chester, Howard Co., Iowa.

The two children of John Brigham by his second wife were Minerva, b. March 16, 1836, and Hosea W., b. May 30, 1837. Minerva m. Charles H. Nelson, b. Oct. 22, 1825, at Wardsboro, Vt., lived in Whitingham till he enlisted in the army. He was either killed or died of disease in the United States service.

Hosea W., m. Florilla R. Farnum, a native of Whitingham, and studied law in the office of H. N. Hix of Sadawga, and was admitted to the bar in 1872. He practiced in this town till the fall of 1881, and went to New Hampshire, where he now resides, practicing his profession.

Lyscom m. Betsey Preston, a native of Whitingham, settled on the farm where J. L. Shippee now lives, lately known as the "Dea. Warren farm," where he d. Nov. 19, 1844. He had a family of six children; three only lived to mature age, Abigail, Mary, and Lewis L. Abigail m. Elisha Hagar of Halifax, Vt., resides in Heath, Mass. Lewis L. m. Marcia A. Shearer of Coleraine, Mass.

Edward m. Laura Cummings of Phillipston, Mass., settled on a farm just over the line of Whitingham, in the town of Heath, Mass. He had a family of five children, only one of which, Charles E. Brigham, is now living; he m. Sarah A. Lake of Whitingham, and resides in Fitchburg, Mass. Joseph L., his youngest son, enlisted in the army and d. in the service.

Dexter, whose home was in Whitingham, was a cripple; he never could walk without crutches. But for all that he was an active, business man. He d. very suddenly at his brother John's, Nov. 4, 1832, at the age of about thirty-two years.

CHASE FAMILY.

We cannot go back in the genealogical history of this family beyond David Chase, the paternal ancestor of the Chase families in Whitingham. He was the son of Benoni Chase, b. in Douglass, Mass., April 17, 1752; m. Jemima Humes of Douglas. Their children b. in Douglas, were Abraham Chase, b. Sept. 25, 1772, m. Betsey Rich and moved to Whitingham, Feb. 16, 1797. Was long one of the prominent and wealthy citizens of the town in its most prosperous days, often elected to positions of trust in town affairs; and d. at his home in Whitingham, May 11, 1854, aged 81.

Isaac Chase, b. Jan. 29, 1775, m. Susanna Fuller, came to Whitingham, Feb. 3, 1800, was a thrifty and prominent farmer. He d. at his home, Mar. 30, 1825, aged 51.

Jacob Chase, b. Feb. 15, 1780, m. Anna Morse, and moved to Whitingham, Jan. 31, 1806, settled on a farm where he spent his whole life. He and his wife were both members of the Baptist church. He died at his home, Aug. 9, 1858, aged 78.

Samuel Chase, b. Feb. 22, 1782, m. Mable Balcom, and moved to Whitingham with his father, David Chase, in Feb. 1815; he d. in Nov. 1854.

Benjamin Chase, b. Sept. 7, 1786, m. Sarah Sprague, moved to Whitingham, Feb. 15, 1815; settled on a farm, where he spent his whole life.

These five brothers, all prominent and enterprising farmers in the most prosperous days of the town, and their families and descendants that remained in this town, make an important factor in the town's history.

The family of Abraham Chase consisted of five sons, as follows: David Chase, b. Dec. 12, 1798; m. Irene Kingsbury, Feb. 12, 1818, spent his life in Whitingham, was a prominent and wealthy farmer; lived on the same farm nearly sixty years. He d. June 15, 1880, aged 83.

Jacob C. Chase, b. May 21, 1815, m. Caroline Gore. Came to Whitingham in 1865, bought the Joseph Goodnow farm, lived there 10 years, then sold and went to Jacksonville, where he still lives, a wealthy and respected citizen.

Minor Chase, b. Sept. 7, 1817, m. Lucinda Tarbell, lived with his father on the old homestead some time; d. Aug. 8, 1881.

Lucy A. Chase, b. Nov. 9, 1819; d. Jan. 31, 1838.

Willard Chase, b. Dec. 5, 1823; d. Nov. 21, 1825.

Samuel Chase had a family of five children, three sons and two daughters.

Rufus Chase, b. Oct. 11, 1805, m. Mary Hall; d. April 26, 1846.

David Chase, b. April 15, 1809, m. Betsey Tainter, settled in Whitingham; d. March 21, 1837.

Fanny Chase, b. Feb. 21, 1818; d. April 13, 1831.

Paulina Chase, b. Oct. 21, 1822; m., first, Asel Rice; second, Charles Bowker; third, Newman Carley.

The Benjamin Chase family was five sons and two daughters.

Sumner Chase, b. April 21, 1807; m. Roxanna Faulkner, March 16, 1851. He spent his whole life in Whitingham, and was an invalid for a number of years. He d. Feb. 2, 1885.

Jemima Chase, b. Dec. 11, 1809; m. P. B. Putnam, Dec. 5, 1830; went West, where she died.

Merrick Chase, b. Dec. 13, 1811; m. Mariah S. Brigham, Sept. 11, 1834; spent his early life in Whitingham, and was an active business man. He moved to one of the Western states where he now lives, and with his sons is engaged in farming; they are wealthy and prosperous.

Abraham Chase, b. Jan. 5, 1820; m. Catharine Reed, April 23, 1844; he is a prominent man in the business affairs of the town, a wealthy farmer, a close observer of men and things, of more than ordinary sagacity; an independent thinker, frequently elected to offices of trust and responsibility in town business, a man of decisive opinions in all matters of public or private interest.

Luana Chase, b. Feb. 21, 1821; d. Sept. 3, 1854, age 33.

Royal Chase, b. Aug. 3, 1827; m. Margaret Howard, July 4, 1851; is a farmer, has spent his whole life in Whitingham.

PRESTON FAMILY.

Capt. Samuel Preston was a prominent and influential man in the town of Whitingham in the early part of the present century. He did much to establish and guide the institutions best calculated to enhance the literary and social progress of the people of this comparatively new township. He was often elected to positions of trust and responsibility in town affairs.

We have no genealogical history of the Preston family, but Capt. Samuel Preston, the paternal ancestor of all the Prestons of Whitingham, was a native of Littleton, N. H., b. May 18, 1769; m. Susanna Phelps in August, 1797. They came to Whitingham in June, 1800, and first settled on the farm that Rufus Brown afterwards owned and lived on for more than 55 years. They had a family of 11 children, all born in Whitingham except the oldest.

Sophrone Preston, b. Jan. 1, 1798; m. Elijah P. Stone of Whitingham. Betsey Preston, b. July 11, 1800; m., 1st, Liscom Brigham; 2d, John Brigham. George Preston, b. March 12, 1802; m. Esther A. Dennison of Halifax. Susanna Preston, b. Jan. 27, 1804; m. Thomas Smith of Whitingham. Polly Preston, b. June 3, 1806; m. Ira Lovering of New Hampshire. Sally Preston, b. June 13, 1808; m. Erastus Hall of Readsboro. Osmyn Preston, b. Oct. 27, 1811; m. Clarissa Dix first; Effa Lamb, second. Lorenzo Preston, b. Dec. 3, 1814; m. Lucy Clark of Whitingham. Alcander Preston, b. Betsey A. Bond of Whitingham.

The five brothers in this family all spent a large share of their lives in this town, though none of their descendants remain here; they were active, enterprising citizens, possessed of more than ordinary intelligence. In town affairs, and public matters generally, they took a prominent and active part.

Four of the sisters in this Preston family spent their lives, or most of their lives, in this town. Sophrona, Mrs. Stone, spent a long and well-directed life on the same farm where they first settled. She d. March 31, 1881, aged 83. Betsey, Mrs. Brigham, lived in Whitingham nearly all her life; d. April 8, 1884, aged 74. Susanna, Mrs. Smith, spent her life in Whitingham, d. Jan. 21, 1856. Martha, Mrs. Lamb-Stickney, still lives in Whitingham.

TAINTER FAMILY.

Deacon Jonathan Tainter, the paternal ancestor of the Tainter family in Whitingham, was b. in Westboro, Mass., 1755; m. Jemima Root, of Somers, Ct., Sept. 21, 1776. A few days after, he joined the army under George Washington, and served in New York and New Jersey till the close of the campaign in 1778.

Josiah W. Tainter, so long a resident in Whitingham, was the oldest son of this Dea. Jonathan Tainter, b. Jan. 26, 1782, m. Molly Davis, of Somers, Ct., Aug. 26, 1803. He settled in Whitingham, on the farm that James M. Tainter now lives on, and spent his life there. He was one of the thrifty farmers, of which the town of Whitingham was made up, for the first quarter of this century. He was a member of the Baptist church more than forty years. His family consisted of six children, three sons and three daughters.

Rebecca, b. Jan. 15, 1805, m. Benjamin Eames, a native of Whitingham, but spent most of his life in Halifax, Vt.

Betsey, b. Sept. 8, 1809, m. David Chase, Oct. 6, 1829. He d. March 21, 1837; she m. second, Isaac Allard. She m. third, Henry Goodnow of Whitingham, and is still living.

Norris D., b. March 6, 1812, m. Sarah Martin of Whitingham, Sept. 2, 1834. His wife, Sarah (Martin)

Tainter, d. at her home in this town. He has one daughter, Mrs. Lucinda (Tainter) Dix, also living in town. He m. second, Mariah Stratton, of Heath, Mass.

Lydia, b. July 5, 1814, m. Joseph Farnum. She d. at her home in 1879. She had two daughters, one, Mrs. Upton, now lives in town.

Josiah W., b. March 1, 1818, m. Elizabeth Russell of Massachusetts, Nov. 5, 1838. He was killed on the railroad by falling between two cars, Feb. 20, 1854, at 35 years of age.

James M., b. April 5, 1821, m. Catherine Lake of Whitingham. He has spent his whole life on the farm his father settled on when he first came to town, about 80 years ago. Has a family of four sons, three of which now live in Whitingham.

A Deacon Jonathan Tainter, a brother of Josiah W. Sen., came to Whitingham in 1804. He m. a wife from Marlboro, Vt., a daughter of Dea. Benjamin Bowman, Dec. 31, 1821. emima A., sister of Josiah W. Tainter, Sen. m. Joel C. Shumway of Whitingham.

There was a Dr. Stephen Tainter settled and practiced medicine in Whitingham a long time; he was the first settled physician in town of which we can find any account. He was born in Westboro, Oct. 13, 1760, and came to this town some 8 or 10 years after its organization, practiced here with success till about 1803, when he left town and went to Gainsville, N. Y. He married Elizabeth Gorham, a native of Barnstable, born Dec. 20, 1760; she died in Whitingham, Oct. 3, 1801. He was Uncle to Josiah W. Tainter, so long and well known in Whitingham; was said to be a very skillful physician, a man of superior ability, a scholar, and a poet. He was through life a member of the Congregational church, served in the Revolutionary war, was drummer boy at the battle of Bennington, and was also at the taking of Burgoyne in 1777.

ROBERTS FAMILY.

We have no reliable record of the genealogy of the Roberts family, back of James Roberts, the paternal ancestor of the Roberts families in Whitingham. James Roberts was amongst the first settlers in the town; he came from Connecticut when the town was almost an entire wilderness, settled on and cleared up the farm known as the "old James Roberts farm." He was a very prominent man in the early history of the town; his name first appears in the records as one of the town officers, in 1783; and from that to 1800, was constantly in some important office in town and state. Was one of the selectmen of the town ten years; and was town clerk five years, before the commencement of the present century; represented the town in the General Assembly, in 1794; and afterwards represented the town in the General Assembly of the state, for seven consecutive years, from 1797 to 1803, inclusive. This is a longer succession of years than and other one man held that position. He again represented the town in 1806 and 1807; besides filling many positions of trust in the town, and county and state.

He married Eunice Nimms of Greenfield, Mass., and they spent their lives on the farm where they first settled, and the same has remained in the Roberts family to the present day. They had four sons, who spent most of their lives in Whitingham. For the first quarter of a century of the town's organized existence no man did more to establish an order of things best calculated to elevate the people in social and civil progress, than James Roberts.

There was but one man, and that was Jabez Foster, that was his equal; the records show that these two men of all others, were the most conspicuous figures in public affairs, constantly entrusted in the most important positions.

James Roberts, Senior, died at his home, March 12, 1825, aged 79. His wife, Eunice (Nimms) Roberts, having died about two months before, aged 66.

Judge John Roberts, the oldest son, so long and well known as one of the leading citizens of Whitingham in its most prosperous days, lived on the place lately known as the "Ellis Gates place;" was a lawyer by profession, a prominent man in all public matters, both in town and state; and was one of the judges of the county court for several years, and represented the town in the General Assembly for five consecutive years, from 1819 to 1823, inclusive; and also served as member of the council. He again represented the town in legislature in 1832 and 1833. He left this town about 1836, went to Townshend, where he practiced in his profession the remainder of his life.

John Roberts and two sons, John and George, born in Whitingham; John was a lawyer, lived in Jacksonville and practiced his profession till about 1855, when he went to the State of Illinois. George also went to Illinois; enlisted in the army from that state, and it is said he died in the service. None of the descendants of the John Roberts family are now living in Whitingham.

James Roberts, long and well known by most of the people now living in this town, was less a public man than his brother John. He buried three wives, had a large, intelligent, and active family of children. Three of which, by his first wife, one son and two daughters, are still living; the son, James M. Roberts, is now living on the original homestead farm, where James Roberts, Sr., first settled. He has spent most of his life in this town, although he went west to the State of Illinois, when a young man, spent ten years there, at farming and herding. The daughters, Mrs. Goodnow, has spent her whole life here. Mrs. Bement, now lives in Baldwinsville, Mass., but has spent the greatest share of her life in Whitingham. Her husband, John W. Bement, was a physician, practiced medicine in Whitingham Centre, and in Jacksonville, for many years before he went to Baldwinsville, where he died. They had four sons, only one of which now lives in town; they were all active business men. The business career of E. L. Roberts is fresh in the memory of the people of this town. B. F. Roberts, although he lives in Halifax, his business interests are mostly in Whitingham, and he is as well known here as though he was a citizen of the town. Oscar Roberts, one of the brothers, is a physician, living in Pittsfield, Mass. Henry M., the youngest son, remains on the old homestead. All four of these brothers are possessed of ample means.

Horace Roberts was a lawyer by profession, and as he died nearly half a century ago, his eccentric habits and general characteristics are not familiar to the present generation. He was a man of marked ability, a violent partizan in politics, unsparing in his denunciations of the whig party, and especially of the leaders in this town, and throughout this State. He settled and practiced law in the centre village about 10 years. He married a lady from Greenfield, Mass., by the name of Nimms; they had one son, who was but a small child when his father died, Dec. 16, 1837, aged 51.

Thomas Roberts never married; lived with his brother James Roberts on the old homestead farm, where he d. June 21, 1866, aged 76.

We do not trace in this sketch the descendants of this noted family beyond the third generation from their common ancestor; the descendants of the Roberts families to the present time would take too much space, as they are quite numerous.

CARLEY FAMILY.

The Carley family is another of the families in Whitingham that occupy a conspicuous place in the town's history, of which we have no genealogical record. But from the records in possession of some of the descendants of that family, we glean the following:

Jonathan Carley, the paternal ancestor of the Carley families in this town, was the son of Joseph Carley, a native of Leicester, Mass. He moved from there to Spencer, Mass., where Jonathan Carley was b. March 16, 1760. This family of Joseph Carley subsequently moved to Hoodsack, N. Y., from which place Jonathan Carley (afterwards known in Whitingham as Lieut. Carley,) enlisted in the Revolutionary army, at the age of 16 years. He was a member of an Artillery company, and served faithfully in the army, as his discharge, signed by George Washington shows, six years, two months and nineteen days. He was discharged with honors for his faithful service, June 9, 1783.

He was in several of the most severe battles of the Revolution, for instance, at Whiteplains, Germantown, Monmouth, Yorktown and others; at Yorktown he fixed the fuse to the shells that finally took Cornwallis. At the battle of Monmouth, he stood by his gun, loading and firing till he was completely overcome by heat, or sun stroke, the blood starting from his ears. At the close of the war in 1783, he returned to his father's home, was then between 23 and 24 years old. In 1785 he m. Elizabeth Kentfield, and settled in Pownal, in the County of Bennington, where his oldest daughter, Betsey Carley, was b. In the summer of 1788, he moved to Whitingham, where he spent the rest of his life. He had a family of four sons and three daughters, one of which died in infancy. The four sons, Rufus, Jonathan, jr., Washburn and Joseph, and the two daughters, Betsey and Polly, all lived to a good old age; and three of the sons and one of the daughters spent their lives in this town. The oldest daughter m. Thomas Shumway, and spent most of her life in Readsboro. The other m. David Jillson, jr., a well-known and prominent citizen of Whitingham, and spent her life here. Jonathan Carley, jr., left this town when a young man, and has not lived here since.

Rufus, Washburn and Joseph Carley, long prominent and well-known citizens of their native town, spent their lives in Whitingham. Their father (known as Lieut. Carley) was a man of notoriety in his younger days.

PARKER FAMILY.

Capt. Samuel Parker was a prominent and influential man in the early part of the present century. He had three wives, and a large family of children; four sons and two daughters by his first wife. Their names were Rufus, Wyman, Samuel, Flavel, Sally and Polly. Sally m. Joseph Goodnow, long and well known in Whitingham. Polly m. Daniel Green, of whom mention is made in the Green family.

The four daughters by his last wife were Fanny, Betsey, Sophrona and Sophia; all spent most of their lives in Whitingham except Sophia, who m. Everett Williams. Fanny m. Schuyler Murdock first, and Absalom Pike second; she is still living. Betsey m. George Bond first, and Reuben Winn second; she spent her life in Whitingham, except a few of the last years she lived at North Adams, Mass.; she d. there. Sophrona m. Linus A. Warren, a native of Whitingham, and has spent her life in this town, except four or five years at Shelburne Falls, Mass. She is now living in the village of Jacksonville, and is among the oldest of its inhabitants.

We have not been able to obtain a correct account of the births and deaths of this family in detail; but suffice it to say that for the first half of the present century, few, if any, families in Whitingham acted a more conspicuous part in the formation of its history.

The family of John Fuller, and his descendants, who have been lifelong residents of Whitingham, are men of marked ability, have many times been elected to responsible offices of trust in the public affairs of the town, and have contributed their full share to the business progress of the town of Whitingham.

PROFESSIONAL MEN.

Dr. Stephen Tainter was probably the first settled physician. He practiced medicine in this town some 10 years before the commencement of the present century.

Dr. Bugbee practiced a short time. Dr. Tainter left; but the next regular settled physician was Dr. Abel B. Wilder, who was succeeded by Dr. Nathaniel Smith, a native of the town of Halifax, in 1821. He was the most prominent and able physician that has lived in Whitingham since the beginning of the present century.

Dr. Horace Smith, a student of Dr. Nathaniel, was the next regular physician in the centre village, 1835; he sold out to Griswold & Thompson and they practiced till John W. Bement came in 1839; he practiced several years, then went to Jacksonville. He finally left there and went to Baldwinsville, Mass., where he died.

Dr. E. A. Dean succeeded him in Jacksonville. He came there in 1853, and practiced till 1861. Dr. E. H. Harvey was associated with Dr. Dean in practice, a few months before Dean left town. Dr. Fred Temple, a native of Heath, Mass., then practiced in Jacksonville two or three years; and his brother, Dr. Cyrus Temple, so well known in Whitingham, came to this town from Heath, and settled in the village of Sadawga. He was a leading spirit in that village while he was there; he was one of the selectmen of the town in 1870.

Dr. Barnard practiced in Jacksonville a short time, before Dr. F. B. Johnson came there in 1870; who has practiced there from that time to the present. Dr. F. D. Stafford has been the physician at Sadawga (now Whitingham,) since the death of Dr. Temple.

Of the legal profession, John and Horace Roberts, both native born citizens of Whitingham, were amongst the first that made the practice of law a business. John Roberts was assistant judge of the County Court for a long time. Horace Roberts went to the centre village about 1825, practiced law there for nearly 10 years. John E. Butler succeeded him in practice. Henry Closson lived in the centre village and practiced law some 8 or 10 years and went to Springfield, Vt., in 1837.

John E. Butler practiced till 1843, when he was succeeded by his brother, Nathan L. Butler, who practiced there till 1854. He was succeeded by H. N. Hix and A. W. Preston, who practiced in company one year, in the name of "Hix & Preston," when they dissolved partnership, and each practiced for himself till 1858; then Preston went to North Adams, Mass., where he still lives and practices his profession. William H. Follett practiced a few years before Preston left. He went to Halifax, where he died. H. N. Hix left the centre village in 1869, went to Sadawga village, where he has practiced his profession to the present time.

Hosea W. Brigham practiced law in the village of Sadawga a few years in company with H. N. Hix; he left town in 1881. Charles S. Chase has been there since 1880.

John Roberts, Jr., practiced in Jacksonville from 1847 to 1855, when he went West. W. S. Myers was there a year or more about 1860 or 1861. A. A. Butterfield came to Jacksonville in 1868, and has practiced there to the present time.

Of the clerical profession, Rev. Linus Austin, Ebenezer Davis, Hosea F. Ballou, and Amherst Lamb, are the principal clergymen that have lived in Whitingham for any great length of time; and enough is said about them in the church history. There have been some others residents in Whitingham for a number of years. Rev. Hubbard Eastman, Calvin Buckland, and Peter S. Gates, have lived and preached in Whitingham for 10 years or more; besides the circuit preachers mentioned in another place.

FAYETTEVILLE.

FAYETTEVILLE.

The first frame house in Fane was built in the summer of 1768 by Jonathan Park, in the yard in front of what we term the old Parks house, just north of the Fayetteville hotel.

Nathaniel Stedman, Thomas Higgins, Artemus Bruce, Ephriam Fuller, and Thomas Green were among his early neighbors. Fuller settled on the first farm north of the village, now owned and occupied by M. O. Howe. Green came from Worcester and built his cabin on the hill about half a mile west of Park.

Artemus Bruce came September 22, 1776. He built the first saw mill in this part of the town. He had three sons; Ephriam, Artemus Jr., and Elijah; from the latter of whom Mansfield Bruce, the Baptist divine, is a decendant. Samuel, a son of Ephriam, built a dam and first occupied the privilege, where now stands F. O. Burditt's cabinet shop, about 1820. He rented a portion of the shop to a clothier. From them the line of occupancy decended to Ide, Kidder and Burditt. About 1815 Thomas Cook built a dam and trip-hammer shop near the bridge south of the village. From him it passed to Newman & Newton, scythe manufacturers, and from them to Joseph Green, in 1823, who continued the business until 1839. In 1840 he erected a grist mill with a sash and blind shop on the second floor. From him it passed to E. C. Walker, in 1851, and from Walker to the present owner, Frank Wellman, who is engaged in the manufacture of lumber.

Soon after the opening of the Brattleboro and Whitehall Railroad Charles N. Davenport of Brattleboro, and Geo. W. Underwood, started a steam mill at the north end of the village, for the manufacture of lumber and chair stock, which is now occupied by Mr. Underwood.

The county buildings were located on the Park flats, in 1825, Mr. Park giving the land to the country for a common so long as the buildings remain here. It was proposed to call the place Parkville, but Mr. Park was decidedly opposed to the plan, and at the suggestion of Gen. Field it was named Fayetteville, in honor of Gen. Lafayette, who visited this country for the last time in 1824.

During the early growth of the village, religious meetings were held for several years in the court house. About 1830 the several religious sects united and erected the Union church, in 1831. One of the articles of the association provided that each sect should have the right to occupy the desk, in proportion to the number of pews said sect owned in the house. This union was dissolved in 1838, and the Congregationalists erected their new house in 1839. The Universalists continued to occupy the old house until about 1853, when they found themselves unable to sustain a pastor. From that time the house began to decay, and in 1872 it was remodeled and is now called Union Hall.

In 1845 the enterprising farmers of the county organized and established the Windham County Fair at this place, and with the exception of a year or so at Brattleboro, and six at Westminster, it remained here, and as a whole was a successful and prosperous society until the establishment of the Valley Fair at Brattleboro. The last County Fair was held in 1889.

The Windham County Savings Bank was chartered in the fall of 1853. Upon its organization the Hon. Austin Birchard was chosen treasurer, the duties of which position he faithfully discharged for twenty years, retiring January 1, 1874, at the advanced age of eighty, leaving the institution with a capital of $184,500.

Merchants from 1780 to 1891:

Luke Knowlton, John Holbrook, A. and B. Birchard, Birchard & Sawyer, Sawyer & Miller, Geo. Smith, Goodhue, Winslow & Park, Holbrook & Co., Winslow Brothers, N. M. Batchelder, Anthony Jones, Geo. A. Morse, Phelps & Sanford, Baker & Merrifield, William L. Williams, Eager Brothers, Dunklee & Lamb, S. P. Miller, Goodnough & Morse, E. W. Blodgett, Edwards & Pierce, A. V. May.

Daniel Kellogg was the first postmaster, and began to render accounts at Newfane on the first of October, 1811. The following lists give the names of the several postmasters at each office, together with the dates of their appointments, as found in the record books of the P. O. Department at Washington, D. C.

NEWFANE, WINDHAM COUNTY,
VERMONT.

The office was established, July,

1811: Daniel Kellogg, appointed postmaster, July, 1811; Jonathan Nye, Feb. 24, 1812; Adolphus Wing, Oct. 23, 1815; Henry Kellogg, June 2, 1817; Martin Field, Nov. 2, 1818; David W. Sanborn, Nov. 17, 1819; Charles K. Field, June 21, 1825;

On the twenty-fifth of November, 1825, the name of the office was changed to Fayetteville:

Charles K. Field, appointed P. M., Nov. 25, 1825; Roswell M. Field, May 1, 1826; Ira McCollum, April 26, 1830; Dexter Holbrook, Nov. 25, 1831; Wright Pomeroy, Nov. 4, 1834; Jacob Dunklee, Jr., Dec. 27, 1837; Franklin Sawyer, May 10, 1841; Jacob Dunklee, Jr., May 16, 1845; John P. Warren, Sep. 29, 1849; Jacob Dunklee, Jr., October 20, 1853; Samuel P. Miller, Aug. 5, 1861; Chandler Wakefield, Oct. 26, 1864; Amherst Morse, Oct. 24, 1865; Francis W. Fairbanks, Jan. 6, 1868; William H. Goodnow, Aug. 26, 1868; Elliott W. Blodgett, Feb. 12, 1874.

January 20, 1882 the name of the office was changed to Newfane:

Elliott W. Blodgett, re-appointed P. M., Jan. 20, 1882; John D. Pierce, appointed June 15, 1883; Frederic O. Burditt, June 28, 1888; Newton M. Batchelder, Mar. 29, 1889.

WILLIAMSVILLE.

WILLIAMSVILLE.

This village derived its name from William H. Williams, in early years the owner of the larger portion of its business interests. It doubtless owes its origin, and, in a large degree, its subsequent growth, to the natural advantages afforded by the stream upon which it is situated. The development of these advantages commenced at a very early date, as the natural result of their being more available than any other to the inhabitants of the village on the hill.

Referring to the town records we find that the first conveyance of mill property was made in 1790, in October of which year John Wheeler sold to Winslow & Jones, a grist mill and saw mill standing where Hovey's saw mill now does. This property frequently changed hands till it came into the possession, soon after 1800, of Wm. H. Williams, who built the first carding mill in 1810, and operated it until his decease in 1866, when it was bought by S. M. Hovey and converted into a mill for the manufacture of lumber and chair stock,

During the war of 1812-15 a small woolen factory was erected near the carding mill, by William H. Williams and Hezekiah Robinson, but was run but a few years.

In April, 1794, Thomas and Darius Wheeler purchased the privilege now owned by A. L. Simson, and built, during that or the following year, a fulling mill and an oil mill. These mills were sold by the Wheelers, in February, 1801, to Wm. H. Williams, who continued the business until his death. The mills were entirely swept away during the great freshet, September 23, 1815, but were immediately rebuilt. This property was purchased in 1874, by H. H. Hoyt, who put in a circular saw and other wood-working machinery.

A grist mill was built, near the site of the present mill, about the year 1786, by Ebenezer Morse. Wm. H. Williams, built the present mill in 1839, and retained it till 1864, when it was purchased by D. B. & D. J. Lamson. It was now owned and operated by G. B. Lamb & J. H. Merrifield.

Amasa Lincoln came to this village in 1817, and built a small tannery in which he continued business till 1840. It was subsequently enlarged and operated by different parties till 1876.

The building now used by Wheeler & Morse, in the manufacture of butter tubs and kegs, was built by Ephriam Hall, Jr.

The manufacture of wagons and sleighs was commenced here, in 1858, by H. H. Hoyt, who built, the same year, the carriage shop now standing. Geo. W. Dickinson purchased an interest in the business in 1869. In 1872 Mr. Dickinson became sole proprietor and has since continued the business.

A. M. Merrifield erected a steam mill here in 1890, and gives employment to 15 men, in the manufacture of chair stock.

Merchants from 1814 to 1891:

Wm. H. Williams & D. W. Sanborn, Huntington Fitch, Wm. L. Williams, H. F. Houghton & Lucius Walker, John R. Blake, C. H. Cune & Francis Goodhue, Jason, Duncan Jr., Henry Wheelock & John A. Merrifield, H. N. Miller &

George Clark, Abel S. Ward, Martin Perry & G. L. Howe, S. H. Sherman, O. L. Sherman, Abel S. Ward, John D. Blake, Amherst Morse, J. H. Merrifield, C. E. Park.

Chas. K. Field came to this village in March, 1826, engaged in the practice of law, remained two years and then removed to Wilming-ton. Returning in 1855, he remained till 1861, when he sold out to Kittredge Haskins, and removed to Brattleboro. Hon Hoyt H. Wheeler, formerly of the Vermont Supreme Court, and now U. S. Judge for this state, commenced the study of law with Mr. Field, in this village.

Mr. Haskins remained here in the practice of his profession till September, 1862, when he enlisted and entered the army. In the fall of 1863 he removed to Brattleboro.

Geo. W. Davenport opened a law office here in May, 1865, and remained till January, 1867.

Dr. Simon Taylor, son of Rev. Hezekiah Taylor, was the first physician to settle in this immediate vicinity. He commenced practice here in 1813, and died in 1818. Dr. James Cutler came here about 1817, but remained only a few years. Dr. Sewall Foster came the same year, and remained till 1823, when he removed to Shefford, P. Q., where he became highly distinguished as a physician, and received many polit-cal honors. Dr. John Wilson settled in this village about the year 1820, and remained till 1835, when he sold out to Dr. Orville P. Gilman, and removed to Brattleboro. Dr. Gilman remained but a short time. Dr. Elihu Halladay practiced here from about 1833 to 1838. Dr. C. S. Blakeslee came in May of the latter year, and soon built up an extensive and successful practice. He removed to Brattleboro in 1882. Dr. H. B. Chapin came in 1856, and remained in this village and vicinity about fifteen years. Dr. Geo. H. Harvey located here in 1873, and Dr. John Heard in 1874. They were followed by Dr E. S. Weston, who sold in 1881 to Dr. P. P. White.

The following is a list of the persons who have been postmasters at this place, together with the respective dates of their appointment:

Charles K. Field, appointed P. M., May 20, 1826; Jason Duncan, Jr., Nov. 30, 1826; Charles W. Joy, April 16, 1838; Horatio N. Miller, June 28, 1847; John A. Merrifield, July 9, 1851; Henry F. Houghton, Aug. 27, 1853; Oscar L. Sherman, Oct. 18, 1856; Gardner L. Howe, July 20, 1861; Charles E. Park, Sept. 13, 1865; Albert N. Sherman, Sept. 23, 1885; Charles E. Park, June 24, 1889, who is the present incumbent.

PONDVILLE.

PONDVILLE.

The Baptist Society at this place was formerly called "The Baptist Society of Marlboro and Newfane," and worshiped for many years in a meeting house standing on the farm now owned by A. & A. Williams, in the extreme northern part of the former town. The present site was selected on account of its more central location, and the church building now standing was erected in 1841. Upon the completion of the new house, a bell was presented to the society by Caleb Pond, then a wealthy merchant of Hartford, Conn., but formerly a member of this church. From him the village derives its name.

Here may be found a saw-mill, Wool-carding mill and a grist-mill, one store and about twenty dwelling houses.

The mills were established about fifty years ago by David B. Lamson, and are now owned and occupied by W. E. Bingham & Sons.

L. A. Phillips & Co., commenced the mercantile business here in 1840, and have been followed by James Charter, Ira Pierce, Joshua Morse, Moses Merrifield, Lawson

B. Morse, D. J. Lamson, Edward Adams, William H. Goodnow, Thomas A. Morse and Benjamin E. Morse.

A post office was established at this place Apr. 10, 1884, and Mary A. Morse was appointed post-mistress. Upon the death of Mrs. Morse, Feb. 7, 1888, Benjamin E. Morse was appointed. The office was discontinued April 1, 1888, but was re-established May 15, 1889, with Benjamin E. Morse as post-master.

BRATTLEBORO AND WHITEHALL RAILROAD.

After several unsuccessful efforts, Newfane finally voted to aid in the construction of the Brattleboro and Whitehall Railroad to the amount of $24,800, being about eight times its grand list, and issued bonds therefor. The road was opened for business Nov. 18, 1880. J. J. Green, who had been an active promoter of the enterprise, was appointed station agent at Fayetteville. He was on the train which went down with West River bridge at Brattleboro, Aug. 18, 1886, and received fatal injuries.

HIRAM ADOLPHUS CUTTING,

A. M., M. D., Ph. D.

HIRAM ADOLPHUS CUTTING

A. M., M. D., PH. D.,

of Lunenburg, Vermont, born in Concord, Vt., Dec. 23, 1832.

The Cutting family is of Welsh blood; its ancestors specially distinguished themselves in the Holy Wars for the recovery of Jerusalem from the hands of the Saracens, by raising, equipping and commanding a corps of soldiers, and by fitting out and commanding vessels. For this service they received, through the Heraldic College, a coat of arms bearing:—"Shield with silver setting of light in red, on a blue relief, and a scallop shell in gold." The Crest is "a silver device—Griffin collared in blue; holding a scallop shell in gold within his claws."

Asa Cutting, the first American progenitor, emigrated from Wales, settled in Massachusetts, and died in 1707, leaving three sons. His great grandson, George Cutting, of Athol, Mass., was a soldier in the Revolutionary army. Oliver Cutting, of Concord, Vt., was the son of George, and the father of Stephen C. Cutting, who married Eliza Reed Darling on the 2d of September, 1830. Mrs. Cutting was a great-granddaughter of James Reed, the first Brigadier General commissioned by the Provincial Congress at the commencement of the Revolution, and one of the commanders in the historic battles of Bunker Hill, Bennington, Valley Forge and Monmouth. General Reed's ancestry was of illustrious character. Directly descended from the Cornwalls of England, who were part of the progeny of Henry II, King of England, he was as near to that Monarch as the royal house of England and France. Henry II was himself a descendant of the Emperor Charlemagne on the one side, and of the Saxon King Egbert on the other.

Royal blood is little esteemed in this republican country, except as it manifests itself in the moral and physical qualities, which constitute the real kingdom of men. Hiram Adolphus, son of Stephen C. and Eliza Reed (Darling) Cutting, derives no adventitious aid from ancestry or wealth. Entering the district schools of his native locality at an early age, he suffered so much from the habit of stammering that he could neither read nor recite aloud, until he was ten years of age. Yet his educational progress was remarkable. Finding the motto:—"What I will, I find a way to accomplish" on a printed piece of paper, he adopted it, applied it to the cure of his impediment and in six months wholly relieved himself of that painful affliction.

When eleven years of age he entered the Essex County Grammar School, walked several miles daily to and from it, and diligently appropriated whatever advantages its fall terms had to offer.

Young Cutting, in his sixteenth year, was licensed by the County Superintendent to teach, and was engaged by that official—Rev. Joseph Marsh—to take charge of a school in his district. An average of 45 pupils, of whom one-half were older than the teacher, attended. The superintendent spoke of it "as the best school in the county."

The term of the preceptor's engagement was extended from two to three months. His reputation was established, and from that on, until the attainment of his majority, he taught school from three to five months every year. He also attended school at St. Johnsbury East, and the St. Johnsbury Academy, in the spring and fall,—sometimes both—and served in them as assistant teacher.

Hiram A. Cutting

Agriculture to which he was accustomed had few charms for the young man. Medicine attracted, and from the age of 15 he studied its theory and practice, under the tuition of Dr. Geo. C. Wheeler of St. Johnsbury. Zeal was not always tempered by discretion in his plans of study. Reading that two hours of daily sleep sufficed the need of Napoleon Bonaparte, he attempted to make a similar amount answer for himself, of which the result was a physical break down, that disabled him at the age of 20 from entering the Junior class, for which he was prepared, at college. Life was periled, but he recovered. The health acquired as a land surveyor from his 14th year contributed, doubtless, to speedy recuperation. Such was the celebrity acquired in this pursuit that he has frequently been called upon since then to settle intricate questions relative to boundary lines. His earnings were double those of an ordinary farm hand, and were judiciously laid up or expended in furtherance of ulterior objects. His genius was singularly resourceful and practical. He framed a barn which his father had contracted to do, and so successfully that thenceforward he acted as master mechanic, correctly laying out the work for 10 or 15 workmen on buildings, mills and bridges; much of which was done before and after the daily session of his school.

At 19, he became assistant to D. H. Hill, one of the first proprietors of an itinerant daguerreotype car in Vermont. For this, he was by natural endowment, especially fitted. He had already manufactured a small telescope and a compound microscope, and with the latter had successfully studied microscopic anatomy. He now with the knowledge of the laws of light already gained, readjusted the lenses of the camera, so that they cut a sharper, better portrait, than any hitherto obtained. Business crowded upon the associates, and richly remunerated both. Mornings and evenings he canvassed for subscribers for Sears' Pictorial Histories, and thus doubled his salary. Evening study was, also, assiduously prosecuted, and he found time to conduct a series of experiments upon growing plants and the flow of maple sap. An account of these he published, and other observers have verified his statements, which are now accepted as scientific facts. Many other matters of natural history were scrutinized, and subsequently led him to investigate the food of plants and the proper time for bestowing it. His opinions on these points were much controverted, but are now practically accepted by thousands. The result of his experiments has been the demonstration of the fact that nitrogen as usually applied to the soil, seldom pays its cost; that it is often an actual damage to the crop; and that farmers by judicious experimentation, can ascertain the needs of their own holdings, and thus obtain maximum crops for minimum outlays. (See Agricultural Report of Vermont from 1881 to '84 and '86.) The Doctor's industries are manifold. Jan. 1, 1855, John G. Darling, and H. A. Cutting opened a store at Lunenburg. Mr. Darling was the uncle of Mr. Cutting and a successful merchant at Concord. The terms allowed either partner to dissolve the association at his pleasure. The partnership lasted 25 years; when Mr. Cutting purchased the entire stock and business and has since carried on the store alone, Mrs. Cutting, in his absence, efficiently taking care of the same.

The year 1866 was the only unprofitable one of his associate mercantile experience. In July a fire, supposed to have been caused by the spontaneous combustion of rags with which the painters had wiped up linseed oil and then cast in a heap, consumed the store with most of its contents. His loss was heavy and was aggravated by the destruction of a very extensive geological collection, and of more than a thousand volumes, mainly scientific works that had been placed in the second story of the building. Not one geological specimen out of 25,000 was saved.—The blow was staggering; but by the aid of friends he built a new store and re-established his business by December after. The new store is 32 by 96 feet with two wings, 24 by 40 feet, in one of which is a lecture-hall admirably fitted up for audience and experiment, seating 150 persons. On the top is an observatory, containing meteorological instruments for recording the direction and velocity of the wind. Accurate meteorological records have been kept by Dr. Cutting from Jan. 1, 1848, to the present.

PROFESSOR CUTTING.

The Smithsonian Institute provided him with a full set of meteorological instruments, and appointed him one of its special observers. He now acts in a similar capacity for the War Department. His observations, now extending through a period of 50 years, and made at an elevation of 1210 feet above the sea level, in Lat. 44° 28' Lon. 71° 41' show the mean annual temperature to be 41.46° and the annual rainfall to be 14.19 inches. The latter includes a mean annual snowfall of 86 inches.

The medical ambition of Dr. Cutting revived as soon as he found himself in possession of a suitable microscope and of the necessary books. As an instrumental investigator, he studied microscopic anatomy and disease for 14 years. He devised new methods of mounting and preserving specimens, which are now numbered by the thousands, many of which are injected and prepared in the best and most scientific style.

In 1870, he and Dr. G. B. Bulard of St. Johnsbury, studied privately under the tuition of Prof. E. E. Phelps of Dartmouth College, and prepared various objects for purposes of illustration. Professor Phelps soon declared he would no longer continue his instruction to Cutting, who was more proficient than his teacher, and insisted he should lecture at Dartmouth. He accordingly announced a lecture by his old pupil, met him at the depot, conducted him to the hall, introduced him to the faculty, and invited an explanation of his methods of study, mounting, comparing, etc., of anatomical objects. This given, the professor presented the lecturer with the diploma of M. D. from the college, accompanying the presentation with a few felicitous remarks. From Nov. 3, 1870, the date of this event, to the present time, Dr. Cutting has made many microscopic examinations for different New England physicians. The results of these labors are as beneficent as they have been accurate and satisfactory. Life has repeatedly been saved from destruction. His professional practice is large, and his skill and success has been the topic of much conversation.

From 1863 to 1888 Dr. Cutting was postmaster of Lunenburg. Five-sixths of the voters asked for his appointment, and have been rewarded by the increase of the mail service from thrice a week to twice daily, by prompt dispatch of documents, and by the institution of a money order office. His own mail matter was equal in amount to that of all the other inhabitants of the town.

During the war for the preservation of the Union, the doctor proved himself to be worthy of his old crusading and revolutionary sires. Unable by reason of ill-health to serve in person, he enlisted no less than 160 men. He himself made the preliminary examination as to physical fitness, and that with such care that only one man was rejected by the surgeons. The cost of transportation was thus saved to the people. He also, under appointment from Governor Washburn, ably cared for the families of the absent soldiers, as directed by the State law, and when this struggle had ended, he was importuned to collect the bounties, back-pay, pensions, etc., of the veteran patriots, and took out a license as a claim agent, and prosecuted hundreds of claims to successful issue. His enemies attributed this success to other causes than the proper preparation of each case in detail; and in 1872 affirmed that he was defrauding both the Pension office and the claimants. The former detailed a special agent to investigate the charges which he found both mendacious and malicious, and reported so warmly in favor of Dr. Cutting, that June 3, 1873, he was appointed examining surgeon of the Pension Office. He also holds the office of special notary public and of master in chancery.

The scientific eminence of Dr. Cutting naturally led to his appointment as State Curator of Natural History, by Governor Stewart, Nov. 4, 1870. This gave him exclusive control of the State collections. Most of them had been purchased of the widow of Zadoc Thompson. The moths had injured or destroyed the birds, and the minerals were unnamed and unclassified. The doctor very soon clothed the whole with a new appearance. Fine specimens represent now the birds of Vermont. The minerals have been re-arranged and labeled. Thousands of specimens have been added to their number which is so great as to imperatively demand additional room for their proper display.

Dec. 22, 1870, Dr. Cutting received the further appointment of State Geologist from Gov. Stewart and re-appointment from Gov. Converse in 1872, and was subsequently confirmed in the office until change should be necessary. In this relation he has rendered material aid to the industrial interests of the State by his original researches into the capability of various building stones to withstand heat and change of climate. He has also ascertained and formulated their weight, specific gravity, capability of resisting pressure and of absorbing moisture. In connection with Prof. G. W. Hawes, late of the Smithsonian Institute, he has microscopically demonstrated the superiority of some Vermont marbles over other American and European products; and scientifically shown that the Sutherland Falls marble stands in the front rank in respect to compactness and durability.

Dec. 24, 1880, Dr. Cutting was by Gov. Farnham appointed to a position in the board of agriculture; was elected secretary at its first session and charged with the arrangement of its meetings and the expenditure of the moneys granted by the State. In this important post he has merited and received universal approbation. His reports from 1881 to 1886 received universally high encomiums.

The editor of the New England Farmer (Feb. 10, 1883), commends it as the best ever published, and recommends that it should be substituted for the reading books now used in schools.

The large number issued has been wholly inadequate to the demand. Reappointed secretary of the board in 1882 and '84.

Millions of dollars would probably be added to the value of agricultural products in Vermont were the outlays for plant food expended in harmony with his views. Whether potash, phosphoric acid, or any other kind of plant food be most needed can, in his opinion be best determined by the observant and judicious farmer. The quantity and mode of application can be decided by wise experiment.

The Connecticut board of agriculture endorse his doctrines, and the United States Commissioner of Agriculture in his report of 1861, '62, gives them the sanction of his authority.

The popular estimate of Dr. Cutting in this special relation is thus voiced by Editor Cheever of the New England Farmer:

"Secretary Cutting is wonderfully well informed as a scientist;—being familiar not only with physiology, anatomy and medicine; but is also somewhat of a specialist in the studies of botany, mineralogy, entomology, meteorology and chemistry."

As chairman of the Board of the Fish Commission of Vermont, appointed by Gov. Farnham, Feb. 30, 1881, Dr. C. was no less useful. He at once inquired what had been done, and with what success, and began the survey of unstocked waters.

During 1883, he with his colleague, Herbert Brainard, planted many food carp and trout in all favorable waters, and vigorously did what he legally could to protect the fish already planted. His published report is as worthy of study as his opinions on plant food and growth.

In 1885 he was commissioned as State delegate to the "International Forestry Congress," and in 1886, as representative to the "Agricultural Congress" at St. Paul.

Collegiate corporations and scientific societies have been quick to recognize the many-sided merit of Dr. Cutting's services. In 1868 the Norwich University conferred the degree of A. M., and that of Doctor of Philosophy in 1879. In 1881, he was elected an honorary member of the A Σ T Fraternity connected with the college. He is an active member of the Vermont Medical Society and one of its officers; a member of the White Mountain Medical Society of New Hampshire, and several other medical societies; also Fellow of the American Association for the Advance of Science; member of the American Association of Microscopy, member and officer of the Vermont Historical Society; member of the New Hampshire Historical Society; the Wisconsin Geographical Society; The Essex Institute, (Salem, Mass.); The Providence Franklin Society; American Institute of Christian Philosophy; American Forestry Congress, of which he is vice-president; American Chemical Society; Association of American Economic Entomologists; Society of Naturalists, Rome, Italy; etc., etc. In brief, he is a member—active, corresponding, or honorary, of no less than 89 scientific, literary or medical societies, scattered throughout America and Europe.

His fame as a lecturer is solid and widespread. The clergy of the Methodist Episcopal and other churches first urged him to lecture on the Bible and Biblical history. In the former of these denominations he is an active and valued member. Next came pressing demands for lectures on the "Revelation of the Microscope," and on kindred subjects.

Popularity brought the usual penalty of excessive requirement. Lecturing twice or thrice daily, an hour and a half at a time, he could not meet the general wish, and he writes his lectures out—though an effective extemporaneous speaker, in order that they may be published and thus reach the more inquirers. In the latter shape they have often been sold to the Western press. The oral utterances have been chiefly confined to New England, and particularly to Vermont. Literary and scientific critics are invariably eloquent in their praise.

The printed works of Dr. Cutting will perpetuate the memory of his eminently useful life for centuries after his tongue has lost its eloquence and his hand its cunning.

He is a paid correspondent of many magazines and papers. His contributions are in the "Boston Journal," The "Christian Herald of Detroit," "The Weekly Call" of San Francisco, "The Architect and Builders News," (Osgood Co.) of Boston, "The Green Mountain Freeman" of Montpelier and in many others.

He has acted as Agricultural Editor of the St. Johnsbury Republican and also Littleton Journal of New Hampshire.

He has published books and pamphlets: "Plant Growth and Fertilization;" several Monographs on Insects, "Ventilation of Farm Houses,"—"Mining in Vermont," "Parasitic Insects of Domestic Animals," "Insect Enemies," "Climatology of Vermont," "Microscopic Fungi,"—"Notes on Building Stones," "Paper on Plant Growth," "Notes on a hail storm in Concord," "Foretelling Storms," "Catalogue of Birds of Vermont," "Farm Experiments," "Milk," "Genesis and Geology," and different "Reports on Ornithology," and Natural History in connection with the State Cabinet. He was associate editor of the Archives of Science; Editor of the Agricultural Report of Vermont, 1861 and 1862, 1863 and 1864, 1865 and 1866, and as such did much literary labor.

The scientific and philosophical apparatus used by Dr. Cutting in his researches are very valuable. His microscope and its connections, including objects mostly prepared by himself are valued at $5,000. Telescope, spectroscopic and battery with coil have cost as much more. Chemical apparatus for testing rocks and for the assay of minerals are of the best pattern. A stereopicon and microscopic connections for exhibiting minute objects on screens to an audience, and upwards of 2,000 transparencies for illustrating science and history, are owned by him. He possesses novel and interesting arrangements for testing and analyzing the air, for detecting impurities in rooms, &c., &c. Most of his costly and admirable set of meteorological instruments were manufactured by James Green of New York. His library consists of about 16,000 vols, largely medical and scientific, and selected with skill. He has besides, a good collection of miscellaneous books and documents which he lends to the public, whom he permits to consult his library at will. The building is in connection with his residence. Properly subdivided, books shelved in glass cases,—with an office-room, 16 by 17 ft. No private collection in the country (to our knowledge,) agricultural, medical, scientific, theological, excels in interest and value. There are not a few single volumes that cost from $25 to $100 each.

His cabinet, attached to the library, and of the same finish, is divided so as to afford the most possible shelf room. The specimens, of the first quality, are all labelled and arranged in harmony with the designs of Dana, and is richly worthy of minute study. The cabinet contains over 25,000 specimens, and is just what might be expected of the first living scientist of Vermont—"where rocks are marble." His observatory is a circular structure with revolving dome, and contains a telescope of first class character, manufactured by Alvin Clarke & Sons of Cambridge, Mass. This is the only observatory in Vermont. The Doctor lectures on Natural Science to the students of the Methodist Seminary at Montpelier, and to those of Norwich University at Northfield. These lectures are highly appreciated. His farming is chiefly experimental. The great crop of his more than 200-acre estate is hay. This sometimes amounts on his experimental fields at one cutting to $3\frac{1}{2}$ tons per acre. The land is upland. It was worn and neglected when it came into his possession, but has been brought into good condition by the methods recommended in his lectures and writings, and it has far more than compensated for outlays. The stock is young cattle and horses, with cows enough to supply all demands for milk. The Dr. moreover owns a grist mill, a cider, shingle and planing mill, and a butter-tub factory. These properties he pronounces convenient to have, but not remunerative as investments. The Doctor is necessarily a busy man. He thoroughly masters whatever he takes in hand and has no leisure.

His excellent memory has been made more retentive by cultivation, and holds distinct and clear whatever has been committed to its keeping. His observant faculties are comprehensive and conjoined with ability to create as well as to understand whatever mechanism he examines. In reading, he absorbs the contents of a book with readiness and ease. He never went to a dance, drank intoxicating liquors, tea, or coffee, and never used tobacco or stimulating drugs in any form. Hitherto, he has eaten common food, only, and his drink has been cold water. His child motto:—"What I will, that I accomplish," has been exemplified, without exception by his whole life.

The Doctor has given liberally to his church, been generous to the poor and to the working classes,—retained two of his women servants for 18 years, and all his farmhands for several years or since he contracted for their service, and he finds both men and women willing to exchange their labor for his capital at equitable rates. All his employees are paid on Saturday evenings, and none of them are permitted to drink, smoke, or swear.

Such a man, many-sided, resourceful, positive, bringing things to pass,—must have enemies; it cannot be otherwise, while human nature is what it is; all leaders of the race, to say nothing of the Divine Man, had them. But the issue is sure to vindicate the reputation of those who have freely and honestly given their knowledge, judgment and experimental results to their fellows for the public good. As geologist, metallurgist, mining expert, practical and consulting scientist, he is not excelled in New England, if in the United States. Such a life is a various blessing to mankind.

He was married Feb. 3, 1856, to Maranda Ellen Haskell of Lennoxville, C. E.; Mrs. Cutting died March 3, 1886, aged 54 years.

Their union was childless, but the doctor has an adopted son, Burt A. Cutting, born Sept. 24, 1878.

Postscript. Dr. Cutting in 1886 resigned his State offices and has accepted the appointment under the United States department of agriculture of "State Statistical Agent for Vermont," which position gives him more time to attend to scientific work as well as to his profession.

PART III.

GUILFORD.

By Gen. J. W. Phelps.

THE OLDEN INDEPENDENT TOWN:

The only Independent, Republic Town ever in Vermont.

GUILFORD.

BY GEN. J. W. PHELPS.

[Here insert the account of Guilford from Thompson's Gazetteer of Vermont, edition 1842.)

[Fine, old General, he has gone to his grave, his manuscript History of Guilford that he desired to see in print, but never did, we will open and commence to give verbatim.]

"GUILFORD, a post town in the south part of Windham county, is in lat. 42, 47' and long. 4° 26, and is bounded, north by Brattleborough, east by Vernon, south by Leyden, Mass. and west by Halifax. It lies 50 miles south from Windsor, 31 east from Bennington. It was chartered April 2, 1754, to 54 proprietors, principally of Massachusetts, and contained 23,040 acres.

When granted the town was a perfect wilderness, yet by the charter, the grantees were to hold their first meeting for the choice of officers, &c., on the first of May 1754, and on the first Tuesday ever afterwards. It seems the town was organized by and under the very grant itself. Power was given to the grantees to transact the business of the town as a majority should see fit, subject only to the control of the parliament of England.

This little, enterprising band composed of Samuel Hunt, John Chandler, David Field, Elijah Williams, Micah Rice, Ira Carpenter and others, having little to fear from the nominal power of parliament, in the wilderness of Vermont, assumed the title, which was virtually created by their charter, of a little independent republic.

By the records of their first meetings they appear to have been governed by certain committees, chosen for the purpose of surveying the lands, laying roads, drawing the shares or lots, taxing the rights &c.; but their greatest object was to procure and encourage settlers. Their meetings were held at Greenfield, Northfield, Hinsdale or Brattleboro, until 1765, when their first meeting was held at Guilford. There was a condition which if, not performed, went to defeat the grant. The grantees were to settle, clear and cultivate in five years, 5 acres for every 50 in said township. Although much time and money had been spent in making roads and clearing lands, yet, on the 20th of March 1764, the grantees by a special committee chosen, petitioned the Governor of N. H. for a conformation of their grant and an extension of the time, stating that the intervention of an Indian war had made it impracticable for them to fulfil the conditions of the charter. Their prayer was granted, and the time for settling the town extended to the first of January 1766. From the time the charter was confirmed in 1764, the town began to be rapidly settled by emigrants from Massachusetts and other New England states. Through the policy of the original proprietors, the first settlers began upon lots of 50 acres, in order to fulfil the conditions of the grant. So rapid was the increase of population that the town became the largest in the state as to numbers. Yet there was not a single village in the township, or rather the whole township was a village—all the hills and vallies were smoking with huts.

By the charter 350 acres were called a share and all the proprietors shares alike. The reservations in the charter consisted of "one whole share to the society in England for propagating the gospel in foreign parts; one to the first settled minister of the gospel; and one whole share for a glebe for the ministry of the church of England as by law established." The Governor was not unmindful of his own interest. He reserved 500 acres to be located by itself for his own. The town was laid out into 50 and 100 acre lots. The public rights were fairly located, but the Governor's fell upon the only mountain in town, which still bears the name of authority upon the map—"Gov. Mountain."

Although no reservation was made in the grant for the use of schools, yet one whole share was located for that purpose. That was a just and generous act of the proprietors, but it was not the same liberality that governed them when they located, sold and settled one whole tier of 100-acre lots, beyond the extent of their charter. That was the case and the same is held by the town to this day.

"All the pine trees suitable for masting the royal Navy" were reserved to his Majesty. This shews the attention the English nation paid to the navy: one hundred miles from the ocean where was such reservation made. What has been related with a little "proclamation money," was the price of the charter.

The first land was cleared in 1758, by Hon. Jona. Hunt, and Elisha Hunt, on the farm now occupied by the Rev. Asa Haynes. The first settlement was made by Micah Rice and family, in September 1761, on the place now occupied by Jeremiah Greenleaf Esq., Mr. R's widow died in 1832, aged 95 years, and his oldest son is now living here, aged 80.

Soon after followed Jonathan Bigelow, John Barney,, Daniel Lynd, Wm-Bigelow, Ebenezer Goodenough,, Paul Chase, Thomas Cutler, John Shepardardson, and others. They came into town by the way of Broad brook. Beginning at the mouth of that stream on Connecticut river in Vernon, and passing up on its banks they found their way into Guilford.—That was then the only road, and even that was impassable with teams. The first settlers had either to boil or pound their corn, or go 15 miles to mill with a grist upon their backs.

It appears by what records can be found, that the town was wholly governed by a set of officers chosen annually by the people under their charter, until the 19th May, 1772, when the inhabitants at a "district meeting assembled" in the district of Guilford, voted that Guilford was in the County of Cumberland and province of New York and chose officers of the town agreeably to the laws of that province. At that meeting a record was first made in a regular town-book which was purchased by the original proprietors some years before. By that record it appears John Shephardson was chosen "district clerk, John Barney, supervisor," &c. and the meeting was then adjourned to a day after the annual meeting by the charter.

Having renounced their charter, and there being no government which really exercised authority over them they continued to legislate for themselves, and tradition says that good justice was done, yet one principle of the charter was still adhered to, none but proprietors, or those who held under them, had a right to rule or vote in their meetings. Thus was this little republic regulated by a town meeting which was adjourned from time to time, without interruption from abroad, or contentions at home, until the year 1776; then the town was beset with violent tories and Yorkers on the one side and brave Whigs and New-states-men on the other. The Whigs united with those opposed to the claims of the state of New York, that and the succeeding year out-voted the tories and the Yorkers. In 1776, the town voted to pay the expenses of Benjamin Carpenter their delegate to the Westminster Convention of 1775. They voted to raise 9 soldiers for the Continental army, equip them with arms and powder, give them a bounty of £4 "bay money," by a tax upon the inhabitants of the town, and it was done.

They, also, resolved no man should vote for town officers who was not qualified according to the direction of the Continental Congress." Under that resolution their committee chosen for the purpose excluded tories from the polls, vi et armis, and the poor, if qualified, participated in the government.

The title of the town as belonging to the state of New York, was left out of the records. To give some idea of the laws passed by the old republic of Guilford, we will quote the following, passed the next year, 1777.

Voted, not to let any person vote in this meeting, but such as have £40 real or personal estate.

Voted, John Barney and Benjamin Carpenter be a committee to go to Windsor, in June next to hear the report of the agent sent to Congress concerning a new state.

Voted, that any person, who shall, for the future, pretend to hold lands by bush possession shall be dealt with by the town, as a breaker of the peace of the town, a riotous person &c. Attest.

ELIJAH WELCH, T. Clerk.

They further chose a committee to establish the price of labor, all kinds of produce goods, wares and merchandise. The report of the committee was adopted as the law of the town. All the articles mentioned were a legal tender for debts with a penalty for the article sold, or the value thereof with costs.—The punishment of offenders was various, such as "beech-seal," fines, &c., but the most disgraceful of all was to be compelled to embrace the Liberty Pole with both arms, time specified by the committee of inspection, or judges. There was again an entire change of politics in 1778. It appears by the records that a warrant and notification for a town meeting was sent from the Council at Bennington and a meeting held upon the same, when it was "voted not to act agreeable to said warrant." and the meeting was dissolved.

In 1779, after doing the customary town business,

"Voted, Lovell Bullock, Timothy Root, Henry Sherburn a committee to defend the town against the pretended state of Vermont, and to represent the town in County Committee."* "Henry Sherburn, Elliot and Hezekiah Stowell" all violent "Yorkers were chosen to take special care of the powder and lead and other town stores," and the meeting adjourned to the next year.

In 1780, a like meeting was held. There is the following record for 1781 :

"Then all the people met together, that means to stand in opposition against the pretended state of Vermont, and acted on the following articles, viz :

"Voted to defend themselves against the insults of the pretended state of Vermont."

"Voted, Peter Briggs and William Bullock for a Committee to send to Charlestown Convention.†

Voted that Hezekiah Stowell keep the names of those that are against said pretended state."

Also, May 1782 :

"Then the people met in general and voted to stand against the pretended state of Vermont until the decision of Congress be known with lives and fortunes."

"Voted to receive the instructions which came from New York, &c.

"Voted, and chose Henry Evans, Daniel Ashcraft, and Nathan Fitch to forbid the constable acting.

*See Slade's Vermont State Papers, p. 60.

†State papers 128; also Part 2d, p. 60.

These appear not to be regular meetings of the town, but of the Yorkers, who had gotten possession of the town books and stores by a majority of votes in 1778. They in turn excluded the other party from the polls by force of arms. Frequently a company of Yorkers came from Brattleboro to stand sentry at their meetings, when skirmishes ensued and hostile shots were exchanged.

The Whigs and Vermonters, also, kept up their system of government by regular and stated meetings, but their records were lost, as will be related hereafter. In their turn, they sent hostile scouting parties to Brattleboro to the assistance of their friends in that town. The Vermonters had a sheriff in Guilford, and their party had, also, a constable, who continued to collect taxes for the support of their cause.—Those friendly to the new state paid without compulsion, while the property of the Yorkers, both real and personal, was sold at the post for taxes. For that reason the committee before mentioned was chosen "to forbid the constable acting," and their doings were spread upon the records of the town, by proclamation as follows :

To all the officers of the civil authority under the pretended state of Vermont :

You are hereby forbid to proceed against any person, or persons that owns the jurisdiction of the state of New York, according to what is recommended in a handbill by Congress, bearing date June 2, 1780, and we do hereby forbid the constable venduing those numbers hereby given him." (referring to certain lots on the plan of the town) "and we hereby forbid you on your apparel.

Henry Evens,*	} Committee Chosen.
Dan Ashcraft,
Nathan Fitch,

A true record,—Attest,
Samuel Bixby, Town Clerk."

The Yorkers held a like meeting in 1783, April 29, and adjourned to their annual meeting, 1784†

From 1778 to 1783, the town was governed principally by their former laws. Both parties had their committees, and the Yorkers although in authority, could not govern the town, yet, in connection with the tories, prevented anything being done under the direction and government of the new state.‡ In this state of things, Ethan Allen arrived in town at the head of 100 Green Mountain Boys; but as we have already given an account of his proclamation and proceedings, we shall not repeat them here.‡

From 1783 to 1791, no record of the proceedings of the town are preserved. In March of the year last mentioned, the town was for the first time, duly organized under the constitution and laws of Vermont. William Bigelow was chosen town clerk who came, peaceably into possession of the papers and records of the town that were to be found. Traditon says, the 7 years in which no records were kept, both parties held public and private meetings but that it was a perfect rule of anarchy. The Yorkers although they had the town books, dared not record their proceedings in them, and both parties kept secret their own records. During this confusion and jealousy, one party stole the records of the other and hid them, together with their own, many deeds and proprietor's papers, under the earth in the pound, in order to conceal them from the other. There they lay through some sad misfortune until they were totally spoiled. When discovered and dug up they could not be read.

*H. Evens was one of the five who were banished and their property confiscated.

†See Gov. Chittenden's remonstrance, &c., same page 183.

During that time the Yorkers having been so closely pursued by the military and civil authority of Vermont and their property, mostly confiscated fled to the state of New York and settled on the grants made by that state to the New York sufferers. Almost a whole township, now called Bainbridge was first settled by emigrants from Guilford. This accounts for the so rapid decrease of the population from 1784.

While the town was independent of any power superior to the town meeting assembled, refugees from the neighboring states flocked into it, but when the law came, they fled.

The violent Yorkers found but little peace under the energetic and persevering measures of the State's attorney for Windham County. To him the people of Guilford are indebted for the establishment of law and order, without the effusion of blood, and the dispersion of the riotous. Migrations have not only been westward, but northward and eastward. Most of the towns in the northern and middle parts of this state contain inhabitants from old Guilford.

Although the town has decreased in population, it has increased in opulence. Where one farmer now occupies and improves, formerly lived half a dozen, or more; and you now see one respectable dwellings, instead, of as many log-huts.

Since 1791, there has been nothing remarkable in the history of the town. From that time the inhabitants have supported the character of free and independent farmers, very jealous of their rights, and for many years noted for their strong prepossessions in favor of the political school of Jefferson.

THE HON. BENJAMIN CARPENTER.

was a member of the first convention in Vermont, held at Dorset in 1776.

In those trying times with the brave sons of the Green Mountains, when they had not only to oppose the powerful State of New York, the claims of New Hampshire and Massachusetts, the tories and Yorkers at home, and the menacing threats of Congress, abroad; but the power of his Majesty's legions in war, that brave patriot with an allowance of three days' provisions upon his back, would cross the Green Mountains on foot by marked trees, to attend the legislature at Bennington, for the purpose of devising ways and means of defense against all the enemies of the state.

As delegate to the Assembly, as a member of the Council of Safety, as Lieut. Governor of the State, he deservedly holds a conspicuous place in the early history of the State.

Upon a large white marble tombstone in the west part of Guilford, is the following inscription:*

HON. JOHN SHEPARDSON

born in 1718, was a firm patriot of the Revolution, and held the offices of judge of the supreme court and member of the council for several years. He died in 1813.

Among the early settlers of the town since 1796, might be mentioned the names of Hon. Royal Tyler, Hon. Ja.

Elliot, Hon. Richard Whitney, Hon. Micah Townshend, Hon. Henry Seymour, Hon. Gilbert Dennison, Hon. Samuel Elliot, Hon. John Noyes, and many others of less note, who are mostly identified with the history of the state, but who have since removed from the town.

Guilford was the birthplace of Henry Denison, Esq., the late poet of Georgia, also of the Rev. Wilbur Fisk, late president of the Wesleyan University at Middletown, Ct.

THE REV. ROYAL GIRLEY was the first settled minister in Guilford. He was of the Congregational order, and received the right of land reserved and located for that purpose. He was settled in the year 1775, and died soon after. He was a young man of science, much respected for his pious and aimable deportment. The second of the same order was the

REV. HENRY WILLIAMS, who was settled in 1779. Rev. Bunker Gay of Hinsdale preached his ordination sermon. The text was "Death in the pot." He was a violent Yorker and when the town submitted to the state authority, he left with his political bretheren. The third, the

REV. ELIJAH WOOLAGE, was settled in 1794, and dismissed in 1799. The next of that order was the

REV. JASON CHAMBERLAIN.

He was settled in 1807, and in 1811, being elected professor of languages in the University of Vermont, by his own request was dismissed. Afterwards, the Rev. Elijah Woolage returned, and was received for a time, but dismissed in 1818.

An Episcopal church was formed in the East parish, Nov. 8, 1818, by the name of

CHRIST'S CHURCH,

and on the 8th of May, 1819, the Congregational Society voted to unite with the Episcopal society, and invited their minister, the Rev. A. L. Baury, to perform divine service at their meeting-house, in the centre of the town, half of the time. An Episcopal society was formed for that purpose, and a union of the two societies was effected, and so has continued to this time[1842].

THE EPISCOPAL MINISTERS, who have officiated here are:

The Rev. Alfred L. Baury from September, 1820, to May, 1822:

The Rev. Samuel Shaw from 1822 to 1831:

The Rev. Jacob Pearson from 1832 to 1836:

The Rev. Luman Foote 1837 to 1838:

The Rev. John B. Pratt from 1838 to 1841.

The present minister is the Rev. Frederick A. Wadleigh. [1842]

This church consists of about fifty communicants.

THE BAPTISTS

are the most numerous sect. Among the Elders who have had the care of churches in this town may be mentioned Elders Willis, Hicks, Snowe, Allen, Packard, Leland, Bucklin, Wilson, Lamb and Bruce. Their present minister, [1842,] is Elder Milo Frarey.

THE METHODISTS

have several classes and there are two ministers of this order in town: Rev. Asa Haynes, the Rev. John L. Smith. There is also, here, and their present minister is the Rev. William N. Barber.

A UNIVERSALIST SOCIETY

There were formerly a very few of the fanatical sect called Dorrites here.*

The Congregationalists built the first meeting-house, the Baptists the second. The Episcopal church was built and the Methodist chapel more recently.

The town has a neat and convenient town-house, built in 1821, and situated near the Centre.

VILLAGES.

There is a village at the west, one at the south, one at the east, and one at the Centre of the town; the two latter, much the largest, yet, neither containing more than 25, or 30 houses.

EARLY PHYSICIANS.

Elijah Welch was the first physician that settled in town.

Simon Stevens and Dana Hyde were the principle physicians for about forty years.

SCHOOLS.

The town is divided into 15 school districts in each of which is a school-house convenient for teaching from 50 to 100 scholars. In them schools are kept most of the year.

The public school fund has amounted to $210 yearly, arising from the lands. From that sum, deducting rents of the propagation rights, $79, taken up by the original proprietors, leaves $131 still annually in the treasury, arising from the glebe and school lots. The funds of the latter were nearly lost to the town as follows: In 1777, the town voted to sell those lands amounting to 350 acres and put the money at interest for the benefit of schools. It was done, and the price of the lands received in specie which was lent by the Whig administration of the town in 1777, to the recruiting officers, for the purpose of tempting the soldier to enlist into the service of his country. In payment of the loans continental bills were received, which turned out to be of little or no value. Small as is the fund, it has been of great use to the town.

In 1818, a "Female Bible and Prayer Book Society" was established for the purpose of distributing those precious books to the poor of the town, and at the same time a was formed, both of which are under the Episcopal church. A library, consisting of about 300 volumes, styled

SUNDAY SCHOOL.

"GUILFORD SOCIAL LIBRARY," established in 1790, was sold at auction, by vote of the society, in 1818.

CLIMATE AND LONGEVITY.

The air and climate are remarkably wholesome. The oldest people in the town cannot remember any remarkable season of mortality. Most of the inhabitants live to a good, old age, and the physicians remark that not one to a hundred die annually. It is not uncommon in town for people to live to the age of 100 years.

THE AGRICULTURE.

The earth is naturally covered with a deep, strong and rich soil, with a sufficient mixture of earths to make it warm, and, at the same time, to prevent its leaching. The hills make excellent sweet pastures, and the low lands are fine for tillage. The farms consist of from 100 to 500 acres, each, which keep through the year, from 10 to 40 cows with other stock sufficient for the concerns of the farm. Of later

*A band of ludicrous fanatics that sprang up in Leyden Mass. and extended its conquests into some of the Windham County towns;—born in 1797, died in 1938.—See Thompson's Gazetteer, Part II. page 202.

years some of the more wise have turned their attention to the raising of sheep, for which the hills are best suited. The land is naturally covered with maple, hemlock, walnut, beech, birch, ash, bass, butternut and elm. A few traces of black oak, locust and sycamore are found. The most useful tree is the MAPLE.

The farmers take as much pains to keep and preserve an orchard of maples as of apple trees, from which each manufactures from 50 to 2000 lbs. annually, mostly for their own use, but when plenty it becomes an article of commerce. Beside butter and cheese for which the town is famous, it produces beef, pork, poultry, and the finest of horses for market. Wheat does not grow well upon the old fields. Apples, pears, peaches, plums, cherries and quinces grow and bear well. As the stumps and roots decay, some of the hills are washed by the rains and have decreased in value. The prudent farmers have set out shade trees upon their hills, which not only preserve the grass from the scorching rays of the sun, but the roots prevent the ground from washing.

FACE OF THE TOWNSHIP.

Free from rocks, stumps and shrubs, most of the hills and valleys are smooth on the surface, and in summer present to the eye a most delightful scenery. The town is hilly, but not mountainous. Except Governor Mountain, nearly the whole is subject to cultivation. East mountain, so called, extending the whole length of the town, north and south, is the largest hill. It is about one mile wide, descending gradually to the east and south, and, except the bluffs on the west side, is cleared and cultivated. Even the west side is covered with excellent timber. On the top of this hill live some of the greatest dairy-farmers in town. There, you literally see, "cattle upon a thousand hills."

GEOLOGY OF THE TOWN.

The rocks are principally mica slate, lying in tight ledges, interspersed with strata of quartz, and running from north to south. Impure garnets are plenty in the mica slate, and some good specimens of rock crystal have been found. Quartz and schorl in various mixtures are found some having all the appearance of lava. On the east side of the town is a range of argillaceous slate, which is manufactured into roof and writing slate. Rolled rocks of granite, from huge masses to small pebbles, appear on almost every lot. On some few lots is limestone, and on others, bog iron ore, but neither sufficiently pure or plenty for manufacture.

A slight volcanic eruption is said to have taken place here a few years ago upon the farm of Mr. Maxwell.

Gneiss and hornblende slate, with those mentioned compose the principal rocks in town. Rocks of all kinds are not sufficiently plenty for the use of the farmer without much expense. In the banks is found good sand, and in the low lands as pure clay, perhaps, as any in Vermont. On the farm of Maj. E. Houghton, is a which is the resort of invalids, troubled with scrofulous and other cutaneous diseases. It is situated in a piece of low, marshy ground, and the water is impregnated with magnesia, lime, sulphur and iron. The bubbles that arise in the spring, on meeting a torch held upon the surface, will explode with a flame.

MILL-PRIVILEGES.

Green River is a rapid stream running south through the west part of the township, and Broad brook, a smaller stream, running east through the north part. There are two small streams, branches of Broad brook, which run north, one through the centre, and the other at the foot of the east mountain on the west side and empty into Broad brook. On both the former are fine mill-privileges and water sufficient at all seasons of the year. The banks and bottom of these streams are clean, the waters limpid and they contain trout. Eels and suckers are found in most of the ponds; but not in plenty.

There are now in town: 1 paper-mill, 1 extensive tannery, 2 comb factories, 2 oil mills, 2 grist-mills, 6 saw-mills, one clothier's works and carding-machine, 4 stores and 4 taverns. A large cotton factory, situated in the East Village, was burned in 1820..

STATISTICS OF 1840.

Horses, 255; cattle, 2,312; sheep, 2,949; swine, 790; wheat, bu. 920; barley, 1,940. oats, 4,630; rye, 690; buck wheat, 30; Indian corn, 9,028; potatoes, 31,795; hay, tons, 3,438; sugar, lbs. 12,555; wool, 6,472, lbs. Population 1525. C. S. & J. B. P.

The foregoing account is taken from Thompson's Gazetteer of the edition of 1842 which account has already become one of the antiquities of the town. It was composed by two persons at two different periods, the first article being written by Cyprian Stevens a young lawyer of Guilford, about the year 1820, and the remainder by the Rev. John B. Pratt, an Episcopal clergyman, which brought the narrative down to 1840. We now propose to extend this notice to embrace the year 1868, which enters fully upon the second century of the settlement of the town.

But before giving the few unimportant items of later date, we think that it might interest the reader to have a more detailed view than has yet been given of those of an earlier period. To this end, we shall begin with the original charter of 1754, follow this with the charter of 1764, and then add some of the first proceedings under these charters together with incidents that may appear to be possessed of interest. By this means the reader may see the precise manner in which one of those extraordinary emanations of popular freedom, the "corporate town," or township, has grown up from its first initiation in the wilderness of a new country and gradually assumed the form of regular government and established society.

It was not in peace that the town was suffered to grow into shape: the obstacles incident to the opening of a new country were not the only obstacles that the first settlers had to contend with: but it was amid threatened Indian raids, Revolutionary disturbances and domestic conflicts of a peculiarly involved and perplexed character that the foundations of their little municipality were laid. The very act of the government of New York in erecting the district and country to which they belonged into a county, called Cumberland County, at one time being revoked by the King and Councils and again being re-established by them was accompanied by so much uncertainty and indecision as to leave the inevitable misapprehensions on the part of the people; and then subsequently, the fair promises, but faint execution with which New York maintained her jurisdiction, and the wavering and evasive course pursued by Congress, together with the new and strange assumption of authority on the part of "the new state," all tended to confuse and distract society and render the organization a work of peculiar difficulty: a bare reflection of this difficulty will be seen in the proceedings of the town-meetings sometimes, where these proceedings seem glowering with the ill-suppressed hostility of opposite parties. Yet, it can be clearly perceived that this conflict arose from no disruptive spirit of antagonism existing in the community itself, but from the want of a clear and definite course on the part of the superior authorities to which the town was subject. Society in America was undergoing a change; it was letting go the hold of the past and groping its way with uncertainty into the untried future. Beset by the claims of rival authorities to its allegiance finding itself oppressed with the confusion and anarchy thus occasioned, the town at times, acted for itself as an independent colony, just as the Grants themselves subsequently did when they set up to be a new state; but sensible of the limited extent of its dominion, it appeared willing to transfer its allegiance to that party which might have the best original claim to it; in perfect accord with, and even in advance of the general sentiment of the day in respect to throwing off the yoke of the mother country, as will appear by the remarkable proceedings, July 5, 1775, they were forward in shewing their loyal deference to the authority of the Continental Congress, and would have readily complied with whatever decision that new power might have made, whether in favor of New Hampshire, New York, or even "the pretended

State of Vermont." But while they warmly aided the Revolutionary war of the Colonies' they were hardly prepared for that other revolution within a revolution—the independence of the Grants: their material interests had become too intimately involved. — Events, however, have thus far shown that that second revolution was fortunate and appropriate to the condition of things. * * *

DIFFICULTIES OF JURISDICTION.

The difficulties between the Yorkers and new statesmen occasioned some bloodshed and a very considerable display of military force. On the 9th of September 1782, Ethan Allen at the head of 250 Green Mountain Boys entered Windam County from Bennington, which was as noted as a centre of opposition to New York as Guilford was for its attachment to that State.

Allen, arrived at Marlboro, was there joined by companies from that town, Wilmington and Dummerton, which swelled his command to 400 men.— This force was sent off to by detach- ments to various points in the adjoining towns and with the most considerable one, he in person repaired to Guilford. He there made several arrests and with his prisoners continued on with the view of turning them over to the civil authorities at Westminster. He had not gone far before he was fired on by a party of Yorkers.

Tradition speaks of one Broadstreet who was designedly aimed at for Allen who rallied the Yorkers for their bad marksmanship; being a large man and his clothes only having been cut by a bullet.

The Vermonters were brought to a stand and they made threats to kill one of their prisoners for every one of their party who should be injured.

Allen made an announcement to the inhabitants in the most emphatic terms that unless they peacefully submitted to the authority of Vermont, he would "lay their town as desolate as Sodom and Gomorrah, by—." It does not appear that he met with any farther opposition on this occasion.

In 1783, an act was passed at Westminster to raise 100 men for the purpose of assisting the civil authority in carrying into execution the law in the southern part of the County of Windham. But on the eve of the troops being employed a party from Guilford assisted by several from Brattleborough made an attack about midnight, Jan. 16, 1784, upon the head quarters of Gen. Fletcher, a hero of Bunker Hill, which was at an inn in Brattleborough.

Major Boyden, Constable Waters and some others holding office under the new state were lodging at the same inn; and the Major and a traveler were wounded by some of the thirty bullets that were discharged into the building.

Constable Waters, who had rendered himself odious by his enforcement of the collection of state taxes from the Yorkers was captured and taken away.

This inn was about a quarter of a mile N. W. from where the asylum for the insane now stands, on the road to Newfane.

THE SPIRIT OF 76 AWOKED UP.

State troops were already assembled in the neighborhood, and on the morning of the 19th amidst a snow-storm, they took up their line of march toward Guilford. They consisted of companies from Wilmington, Marlboro, Townshend, Rockingham, Westminster, Putney and Dummerston, amounting in all to upwards of 300 men with one piece of artillery. The route which they followed was what is now known as "the old road to Guilford."

From before so considerable a force whose numbers were augmented still by rumor, and which met with welcome from the adherents of the opposite party, the Yorkers retreated toward the southern part of the town. After one or two ineffectual stands they at length fired on their pursuers and wounded two men, Joel Knight of Dummerston and Sergeant Fisk, whose wound proved mortal. They then fled into Massachusetts.

On the 22d Ethan Allen again arrived in town with another party from Bennington; but, after a consultation with the officers from the Eastern side of the mountains, it was not thought proper to follow into Massachusetts—and they decided to retire. The companies from Windham County reached Brattleboro that night; and some of them were dismissed to their homes, while others continued on with the prisoners to Westminster.

Two companies, — the one commanded by Elijah Knight, the other by Benjamin Whitney, the first, consisting of 20 men, the latter, of 65 men. were left in Guilford and its vicinity till near the close of the following March with the object of preserving order, and preventing the return of those who had fled into Massachusetts.

GOODENOUGH AND SPICER.

In this state of things, David Goodenough, who held a commission of Lt. under New York, attempted to return to his home. He was accompanied by a friend, named Spicer. On the evening of the 5th of March, having advanced about half a mile within the limits of Guilford, they were challenged from the roadside by a man under arms "Who comes there?" Endeavoring to make their escape, they leaped the fence and started for the woods, but they were pursued and fired on by Knight's party, and Spicer was mortally wounded. Goodenough escaped unhurt. Spicer was a citizen of Massachusetts, had had nothing to do with the differences between the Yorkers and Vermonters, and he had served in the Revolutionary War, having received his discharge only the preceding June. He was shot in two places one of the balls having "passed through his trunk," and the dying man was treated with great harshness and severity: and, indeed, those inhabitants of the town who had given their allegiance to New York, long remembered the irritating plunderings and exactions to which they had been exposed by some of the troops who were sent against them.

Of quite a different tenor from their martial movements is the traditionary story told of the opposition which was manifested, doubtless by the Vermont party of the town against the Rev. Henry Williams who had distinguished himself by an ardent zeal in the cause of New York. One Sunday morning on going to his pulpit to preach, as usual, he found it occupied by a dead horse, with head erect, forefeet upon the reading desk, and the bands which were then worn by clergymen, around his neck! It is evident that the controversy had reached the moral foundations of society, and had need of being brought to a termination.

POPULATION.

The population of Guilford at about this period, was probably, nearly as large as it ever has been since, and perhaps greater. We can find no record of the number of the inhabitants previous to 1771, and none between 1772 and 1791. In the year 1771, it was 436, of whom three were black males and two black females.

A schedule of the inhabitants is extant, dated May 11, 1772, in which the names of the heads of families are recorded, which gives 586 souls.— By the year 1791, it had increased to 2432, or about one fifteen hundredth part of the then population of the United States. From that period it has steadily decreased until the census of 1860, when it was only 1292.— It is now, probably, somewhat larger than it was at the last census. It has ranged:

1791, — 2432 | 1800, — 2256

1810, — 1872 | 1820, — 1862

1830, — 1760 | 1840, — 1525

1850, — 1389 | 1860, — 1292

This decrease of the number of inhabitants is owing to several causes:

the party differences to which we have alluded; the decrease in the virgin richness of the soil; the greater inducements offered by the fertile fields of the West; the great difficulty in the way of an inland, agricultural community becoming a manufacturing people under the hitherto unfriendly policy of the general government, rendering it impossible for its small capital at home and abroad and the more favorable situation of Brattleboro as a natural centre of the trade of the county. But still, the town has much to recommend it; its cheerful hills and streams lie pleasantly to the sun; its soil responds generously to good and careful tillage, and its climate is healthy;—many of its first born sons, of whom not a few have died during the last decade, often attaining to the age of between 80 and 90 years.

It is not long since we have conversed with those whose axes helped shear the land of its pristine forests, and indeed, though our own memory extends back only fifty years, we can remember when it was customary to "clear a piece" of forest every year for the purpose of bringing the land under cultivation. Some of those pieces are now again covered with a heavy growth of timber.

GRANT TO THE SOCIETY FOR PROPAGATING THE GOSPEL IN FOREIGN PARTS.

One whole share of land, as seen by reverting to the charter was granted to the above society, whose seat is in London—the oldest Protestant missionary society in the world. But many believed by the Revolution, the title to the lands thus granted in the state properly vested in the government of Vermont, and hence, in 1794, the Legislature passed an act directing them to be used for school purposes. But, after the treaty of Ghent in 1815, an agent of the society visited Vermont and transferred the rights of the society in these lands to a Board of agents in favor of the Episcopal Church of the State. The claim, however, was not definitively settled till 1841, after a long, costly and troublesome course of litigation in which Daniel Webster was counsel for the State, and the case had been carried up to the Supreme Court of the United States. The rents of these lands throughout the entire State amount to some $3000, and they are appropriated first to the support of the bishop, and the remainder to the use of the church in the state. The Episcopal church of Guilford has received of late years $100 annually from this fund.

As the glebe lands were designed for building up and establishing, as a state institution, a peculiar form of religion, which is contrary to the tenor of our constitution, those lands are considered as rightly vesting in the state and they accordingly remain, as disposed of by the act of 1764, for the benefit of schools.

THE GOVERNOR'S GRANT.

The mercenary disposition manifested by Governor Wentworth in making use of a public office to enrich himself and family, does not appear to have been much respected by the original proprietors of Guilford since they located his tract of 500 acres on the least valuable land of the town, on a mountain which has ever since gone by the name of Governor's Mountain, and which may be regarded as a perpetual monument of the disapproval by the people of a venal exercise of the functions of public office and trust.

The present proprietors of that land derive their title by purchase from the Governor's heirs VILLAGES AND NOTED DISTRICTS.

There are four villages in town, viz: East Village in the N. E. corner of the town; Guilford Centre, near the middle; Green River in the western part and Hinesburgh in the N. W. corner. The last inconsiderable—a collection of ten or a dozen buildings: the three former are nearly of the same size, containing each from 20 to 30 edifices, in which they have raised but very little for nearly half a century. The East Village, also, called Algiers, is probably the largest of the three, and may contain within a mile's radius some 40 houses. Within this limit there is an excellent water-power which has never been brought into use.

Besides these villages there is a collection of houses to the southward of Guilford Centre which used to be called South Neighborhood.

South Hollow is a deep, narrow valley in the eastern part of the town containing some very fine farms. It runs nearly north and south, and is several miles in length.

To the eastward of this hollow and separated from it by East Mountain is a region which is called the Slate Rock from the principal slate quarries being in that quarter.

In each of the three principal villages there is a tavern and a small store. There is, also, a post-office in each on a mail route, running from Brattleboro to North Adams, Mass.

LITERATURE.

There was at one time a circle of literary men in Guilford, whose ambitious aspirations had an elevating effect on the tone of society, and whose influence was felt long after they had left the town. Between 1790 and 1800, Royal Tyler wrote "The Algerine Captive", a work of merit and of considerable celebrity. In the course of this work, the author gives a graphic picture of the horrors of the slave trade. He, also, wrote a play at this period, probably, the third ever written in America, (the writer, himself, having written the first two,) called "The Georgia Spec, or Land in the Moon", which ridicules the fever then prevailing for speculation in Georgia lands. It was repeatedly played on the Boston stage and was received with favor. He was, also, a prolific writer for various periodicals, one of which was a spirited paper, the "Farmer's Weekly Museum, at Walpole, N. H.

Judge Tyler resided in Guilford about 11 years, 1783-1800, when he removed to Brattleboro, where he died in 1836. His widow, who survived him about 30 years, died 1865. æ. 94 years. She contributed largely by her talents and the natural grace and refinement of her sex to give a stimulus to the ambition of the literary circle alluded to, of which her husband was the head and inspiring example.

Of this circle, we may mention John Shepherdson, James Elliot, his brother, Samuel, J. H. Palmer, John Phelps, Henry Denison and Miss Elizabeth Peck. These were all poets, and the two Elliots and John Phelps became lawyers.

JAMES ELLIOT was born in Essex Co. Gloucester, Mass. At the age of fifteen we find him in a store in Guilford. He devoted himself to reading and in the perusal of Rollin's History, he gained a thirst for military glory. The Indians were active in their hostilities upon the settlements northwest of the Ohio, and on July 17, 1793, he enlisted at Springfield, Mass. as the first non-commissioned officer in the Second U. S. Sub Legion, commanded by Capt, Cornelius Lyman. Having performed a term of service against the insurgents in Pennsylvania, and against the Indians in Ohio, he returned to Guilford, Aug. 23, 1796, and in 1798, published a volume, called "The Poetical and Miscellaneous Works of James Elliot, Citizen of Guilford, Vermont, and late a Non-Commissioned Officer in the Legion of the United States."

Many of the pieces are versifications of the odes of Horace. Among the pure original effusions is one on "The Autumnal Season", addressed to Royal Tyler of which the four, concluding stanzas are:

Oh Thou! my early and my constant friend!
 In thee the fruits of early knowledge shine:
 In thee the graces and the virtues blend—
 A soul sincere, a feeling heart, are thine.
 In thee has nature various powers displayed;
 Art, eloquence and taste, alike to grace
 The bar, the senate, or the studious shade,
 To wield the sword, or tread the walks of peace.
 On thee, long may the rays of science fall,
 And in thy life and writings greatly glow:
 Long be thy useful life—and thine be all
 The bliss that conscious virtue can bestow.
 Be thine throughout life's variegated year,
 The meed of genius and the poet's lays;
 And in thy autumn may bright suns appear,
 To gild the happy winter of thy days.

Considering the period at which our author wrote, soon after the close of the Revolutionary war, his ideas of equality may be considered as possessed of peculiar interest. We give his

ODE TO EQUALITY.

All hail, divine Equality!
 Benignant daughter of the sky!
 Sister and friend of Godlike LIBERTY!

Descend from the etherial plains,
 Proclaim on earth, JEHOVAH reigns!
 'Tis Nature's King who rules on high,
 O'er COUNTLESS EQUAL WORLDS EQUAL POWER MAINTAINS!

Thou gentle, soothing, sovereign balm of woe!
 And purest bliss that human beings know,
 'Tis thine to cheer old age and guide the youth:

Come issue from thy calm retreat,
 And fix on earth thy peaceful seat,
 Attended by the radiant ORB OF TRUTH!

On REASON's basis build thy throne;
 Exalt the peer and prince to MAN,
 And humble all the ignoble clan!
 Beneath Oppression's iron rod,
 Obedient to a tyrant's rod,

No more, the wretched, human race shall groan—

Oh! come with VIRTUE in thy train, And o'er the UNIVERSE extend thy glorious reign!

The book contains 25 short essays, called "The Rural Moralist," which had been generally published in "The New England Galaxy." Of these, one was written by his brother, Samuel Elliot, and another by John H. Palmer, then a youth of seventeen. They are apparently imitations of Addison, Steele and other English authors of that time and are quite creditable to the writers. But the most interesting part is a journal kept by the writer during his military service.

FROM THE ELLIOT JOURNAL.

At Springfield, Mass., Aug. 7, 1794, he writes:

"Information is received that the insurrection in the western counties of Pennsylvania is assuming an extremely serious aspect.

On the 16th of July, at dawn of day 100 of the rioters attacked the house of Gen. Neville, the inspector of the revenue: The General with the assistance of his servants and family, is said to have defended his house for upwards of an hour, wounded a number of the rioters, and ultimately obliged them to retire.

On the following day, having augmented their number to five or six hundred, they renewed the attack. In the meantime a sargeant and twelve men, detached from the garrison at Pittsburg, (all recruits and several of whom marched from this place on the 2d of April) had taken possession of Gen. Neville's house. The General escaped before the attack began and the insurgents permitted his lady and the females of the family to retire. The attack then commenced, the little party defended it for a considerable time, with a degree of bravery which displays an illustrious example for the imitation of those who may hereafter be called to support the laws of their country.

The Corporal, whose name was Doud, conducted in a manner which ought to immortalize his name.

Ebenezer Walker and William Grigley, two lads of seventeen years of age, natives of Massachusetts, fought with astonishing bravery.

Three of the soldiers were wounded and four of the insurgents killed—James McFarland, the leader, was killed, and a number of them were wounded.

Our little band of heroes were ultimately forced to surrender, and the rioters burned the house and out-houses and all the property which they contained; but either because they respected their courage, or dreaded the resentment of government they immediately liberated the soldiers.

AUG. 12

An account is this day published of an attack on Fort Recovery, in the Western Territory, by the Indians, on the morning of the 30th of June. The enemy were repulsed with great slaughter; but they again renewed the attack, keeping a very heavy and constant fire all that day, and by intervals during the night and morning of the 1st of July, but were ultimately compelled to retreat between the hours of 12 and 2 o'clock of that day, with loss and disgrace, from the field, where on a former occasion, they had been entirely victorious.

AUG. 20.

The President of the United States has issued orders for embodying 1300 of the Militia of New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland and Virginia to suppress the insurrection.

AUG. 30.

Cap. Lyman with a detachment of recruits, embarked at Springfield for Middletown.

New Brunswick, Sep. 9.

The Militia of New Jersey and Pennsylvania drafted by order of the President to oppose the Pittsburg rioters, are now in motion and will rendezvous in Trenton and Carlisle.

SEP. 24.

Arrived at Carlisle. Carlisle is a large and handsome borough, shire of the County of Cumberland, 120 miles west of Philadelphia * * * The barracks are situated a quarter of a mile east of the town, and are large, but decayed buildings, capable of containing several thousand men.

SEP. 28

This morning an express passed through town on his way to Philadelphia with information of a victory gained by the army under General Wayne, over the Indians, on the 20th ult. on the river Miami of the Lakes.

Three troops of cavalry from the city of Philadelphia arrived this day.

Oct. 2d

150 infantry arrived from Philadelphia. Gen. Mifflin, who was appointed second in command, arrived this day.

Governor Lee of Virginia, who is vested with the chief command of the Federal army, under the order of the President, is now moving toward the scene of rebellion, at the head of 8000 men from the states of Virginia and Maryland.

Oct. 3 & 4

On these days large bodies of artillery, cavalry and infantry arrived from various quarters. The President, Gen. Washington, arrived on the 4th.

Oct. 6

President Washington reviewed the troops under arms, amounting to between three and 4000 men.

From Carlisle the march was to Chambersburg, and there the President arrived on the afternoon of the 12 Oct. "without any escort, attended only by the Secretary of the Treasury, Col. Hamilton, who acted as his aide de camp." He left on the 13 for Williamsport, Maryland, where the Maryland and Virginia lines are to rendezvous.

On the 17th Oct. the author arrived at Bedford, a town of fifty or sixty houses.

Oct. 18

Large bodies of troops arrived from the eastward. Governor Mifflin arrived this day.

Oct. 19

The number of troops at Bedford including those that arrived this day, amounted to between five and 6000, and occupied a circular encampment, entirely surrounding the town. * * * Many men of independent fortunes and the most respectable character were in the ranks as private soldiers. All ranks and conditions of men were united in one common band of citizen soldiers, and appeared to be irresistably determined to vindicate and maintain the violated majesty of the laws. It was deservedly styled "The Army of the Constitution." * * *

This day, the President and Gov. Lee arrived in town from the encampment of the Maryland and Virginia lines [about 30 miles south of Bedford] and were received with a discharge of 15 cannon.

The following general order was issued: The President of the United States directs that Capt. Lyman who commands the detachment of continental troops shall be annexed to the light corps under the command of Col. R. Pherson.

Oct. 20

The troops were paraded and reviewed by Generals Lee and Mifflin, who express their approbation of the soldierly appearance, spirit and good conduct of the army in general.

Oct. 21

The President being about to return to Philadelphia to attend the approaching session of Congress, made an elegant address to Gen. Lee, expressing generally his approbation of the appearance, spirit and good conduct of the army, and his warmest wishes for their success in the cause of rational liberty, and the support of the laws of their country. This address and the order to march to Pittsburg was published to-day.

The town of Washington, the "centre of the territory of sedition," is graphically described: "the country," he continues, "trembles around us and the late insurgent inhabitants are as humble and submissive as they had been insolent and daring before the army appeared. David Bradford, whose abilities, influence and exertions placed him foremost on the list of rebels, had descended the Ohio with a number of associates, intending to reach the Spanish territories; and many more of the fomentors of discord were seeking their safety in flight.

Nov. 17

Arrived at Pittsburg * * the whole of the Federal army was now at this place, except about 1500 who were left at Washington. The number now at Pittsburg was calculated at 12 or 1300.

FROM NOV. 17 to 24

Those who had been principally concerned in the rebellion, and who did not choose to abandon their country, were now generally secured; and the professions of repentance in the deluded inhabitants at large, had the appearance of sincerity. In order however to preclude the possibility of a renewal of the unhappy scenes that had lately distracted this country the Commander in Chief, General Lee, continued at Pittsburg, and was employed in organizing a body of 1500 men to be commanded by Gen. Morgan, who established his head quarters on the Monongahela, a few miles from Pittsburg, for the purpose of enforcing an exact obedience to the government.

Nov. 26

Gen. Lee left Pittsburg on his return to Virginia.

The Continental troops to which the author belonged continued on down the Ohio and arrived in Cincinnati on the 29th December. The Spaniards were then at work on fortifications at the mouth of the Ohio.

The whole journal during the service of Sergeant Elliot in Ohio is interesting, and we would like to give it entire, did space admit: we conclude with the following entry on the 3d of August:

"This day the treaty was concluded and signed by Gen. Wayne, on the part of the United States, and the Sachems, Chiefs, and warriors of the Wyandot, Delaware, Chipeway, Otte-way, Shawanee, Miami, Potawatamy, Eel River, Neea? Kickopoo and Kaskias,— nations or tribes of Indians."

Not long after the publication of this work, Mr. Elliot was elected to Congress, where he served, 1803—1809.

He then published a paper in Philadelphia. After this, he entered the army as a Captain, but after a brief period of service, returned to Vermont where he finally became the Clerk of the Court of Windham County, in which position he died at Newfane on Nov. 10, 1839.

An incident connected with his life while in Guilford shews that the people of that town did not entertain so high an opinion of the right to vote as is manifested at the present day,— It appears that at a freeman's meeting Jan. 1793, for the election of a Federal representative, only eleven voted while the number of qualified electors in town was four hundred! But at the election in 1797, there was a considerable improvement, about one hundred voted.

JOHN PHELPS, a contemporary of James Elliot, and a warm friend and admirer of Judge Tyler, was the author of several pieces of poetry one of which, called "New England" became quite popular in its day. He composed several Christmas hymns for choir at the usual celebrations of Christmas at Christ Church, Guilford, which are still extant; and in 1835, he published a compilation, called the "Legal Classic, or the Young American's first book of Rights and Duties," a small work of about 150 pages. He was also the author of one, or more political pamphlets.

His wife, Mrs. Almira Phelps, prepared, for the press, one edition of her Botany in Guilford, and wrote several other works of instruction on chemistry and other subjects, somewhere between 1830 and 1835.

MISS STELLA PHELPS, daughter of John Phelps, wrote numerous pieces of verse, some of which were very flatteringly received by the public.

FROM:
LINES ON THE DEATH OF A FATHER.

BY ELISABETH PECK.

Say, Spirit of my Father! dost thou know
When oft my mother at the silent eve
Ascends with all the "luxury of woe,"
To weep in silence o'er thy dewy grave?
Oft at that lonely hour, when all is still,
When labor ceases, and the laborer sleeps,
She climbs with hasty steps the village hill,
And o'er thy humble grave in silence weeps
Oh! if thy blessed spirit, lingering near,
Would soothe her woes and bid her sorrows cease,
Wipe from her grief-worn cheek the trickling tear
And to her throbbing bosom whisper peace.

FROM:
THE GRASS.

Lowly my lot—
Among the flowers of gorgeous dyes
And thousand perfumes that arise,
I am forgot.

Yet through the earth
All flesh that move in gentle mood
For carpet, sustenance and food
Must own my worth.

My name is grass:
And though of poor, ignoble birth
And crushed and trampled to the earth
By all that pass.

I stronger grow,
My roots with firmer fibre prest,
My leaves in brighter verdure drest,
And brighter glow.

And learn of me
When ingrate mortals rudely spurn
And ills for blessings give, to meek return
Sweet charity.

JEREMIAH GREENLEAF

entered the U. S. service from Guilford during the war of 1812, and was promoted to a lieutenant in 1816; at what period he left the service and returned to his home, we have not learned; but at about that period he published a work on grammar, called "Grammar Simplified," which is regarded by many even now as the plainest and best treatise on that difficult subject which has ever been produced. It first appeared in 1821 and speedily run many editions, the 20th edition being published in Brattleboro in 1822. At a later period he prepared a modified form of this work called the "Labor Saving Grammar," which was published in 1855, but it is not equal to his original treatise.

Since that period the published literature of Guilford has consisted almost exclusively of an occasional piece of poetry; generally by some young lady. Some of these productions are possessed of considerable merit but it is evident there is not such literary aspiration as existed formerly. The freshness and attending life in a newly opened country have already felt the effects of time and are like the music of the birds that pass away with the vernal season.

THEIPIAN SOCIETIES, LYCEUMS AND AMUSEMENTS.

Of a kin to literary circles are Theipian Societies and debating clubs. Of these, several have arisen from time to time, though they have never continued for any lengthy period.

Between the year 1825 and 1832, a Theipian Society was established by the young people of the East Village which enacted several plays on different occasions. Their exhibitions were held in the hall of the tavern; and one of the principal plays brought forward was Sheridan's "Pizarro."

But generally shorter and more amusing plays were selected.

A strolling company of players about this period came from Albany to Brattleboro to exhibit there: but as Gen. Jonathan Hunt, a resident of Brattleboro, a member of Congress, and a person much beloved by the people, had recently died, the inhabitants were averse to gayety at that time and the players exhibited for a night or two at Algiers.

It was in the hall above mentioned, that Potter, the Magician used always to exhibit his performances. This Potter was a mulatto, who had been brought away from Southern slavery by a New Hampshire sea captain; and he was one of the most expert jugglers of the age. He always drew a full house whenever he came; and with the proceeds of his art he finally retired from active life and built a house in Andover, N. H. where he died some years since.

The hall of the tavern was designed chiefly as a dancing hall. It was there thanksgiving balls and dances, so called sleigh-rides, used to be held, and occasional dancing-schools.

The tavern, itself has been the centre of various changing scenes.

A Masonic lodge once held their meetings in its hall; but in course of time a hot dispute arose about the relation which such societies bore to a free government, and in the earnest conflict of opinion the lodge succumbed. In those days the very passengers in the stage coach that stopped to change mails were heard in sharp disputation about masonry. The coach arrived from the south about 9 o'clock P. M. Sometimes the driver announced his approach by winding a melodious tin horn; and not until he had dashed away did the usual knot of villagers depart.

Among the amusements of the villagers who spent their evenings around the barroom fire were telling stories and singing songs which were often enlivened by a circulation of mugs and half-mugs of flip and punch. A blind miller by name of Stevens composed songs and set them to music. The refrain, in which all joined, of one, ran:

Thus as through life we go, I would have you to know

There are slaves in high life as well as in low.

The celebration of

THE FOURTH OF JULY

was seldom omitted at least so far as the consumption of powder extended and we remember festivities on one occasion in honor of the victory of Lake Erie, Shooting matches were frequent during the winter.

Base ball was played by the young men on Fast day; and once, at least, while snow was on the ground, there was a hunt for the white rabbit. Elihue Field, the keeper of the tavern and the post-office was the leading spirit in this sport, and often were the corners of his bar-room decorated at the close of a day's hunt with the fowling-pieces of the party and the rabbits which they had shot.

He, also, took a lively interest in the political affairs of the country; and when the great speck of Webster was jingling through New England, we remember to have been struck by his appearance on one occasion: a tall, slim man with a large bright black eye, as stretching forth his hand, he repeated the following passage:

"I shall enter on no encomium upon Massachusetts; she needs none, there she is. There is Boston, and Concord and Lexington and Bunker Hill, and there they will remain forever. The bones of her sons, falling in the great struggle for Independence, now lie mingled with the soil of every state from New England to Georgia; and there they will lie forever."

THE FINE ARTS.

No person from Guilford, as we are aware of, has ever distinguished himself as an artist; but a young gentleman,—Richardson, Billings—produced several oil paintings between the years 1840 and 1850, which evinced a high degree of artistic talent and genius. Unfortunately he died at an early age; had he lived, he promised to become the equal of the artists, Mead and Brown, of whom he was the cotemporary, who are natives of the two adjoining towns of Brattleboro and Leyden.

AGRICULTURE.

The dairy interests, which used to be very great, the butter and cheese of Guilford ranking first in the Boston market, is now reduced to a comparative small scale, there being but little cheese produced, and much less butter than formerly. The pastures are greatly worn out and need renewal by fertilizers, which can hardly take place so long as the labor of the town continues to seek as it has done for the last forty years, the more fertile fields of the West. That principle of the soil, phosphate of lime, which goes to form bone and also lime, was so thoroughly exhausted during the dairy period that the cows came at length to suffer from the bone disease, and in many cases could hardly stand to graze from the weakness of their bones, the phosphate of lime necessary to their strength having been almost entirely taken from the soil and carried off in butter and cheese to Boston. It was at one time customary for the principal farmers to carry to that market the product of their own dairies; going in the winter season with two, and sometimes four horse-teams, and returning in the course of two weeks with a supply of groceries for the year.

The land produces excellent crops of corn, grass, and oats; but does not yield potatoes as well as formerly.—Stock-growing may now be considered as the principal interest, and efforts have been made during the last five years to introduce good breeds of cattle, horses and sheep. Bone-dust, either given in meal, or liberally strewn upon the pastures is found to be an effectual cure for the bone-disease. Not enough grain is raised for the consumption of the stock, and a great deal of corn is imported from the West for this purpose.

Fruit thrives so well that the proper care need only to be taken to insure success in its cultivation. Peaches have always been produced to some extent, ever since introduced, while the precious plums and pears of Mr. Briggs in the north-west part of the town, shew what can be done in that way by intelligence and attention. The southern slopes, where well sheltered from the northern winds, would doubtless yield good grapes; but unfortunately the cultivation of that fruit is not genial to the habits of the people, and but few as yet have attempted it.

In 1863-64, an effort at associated action was made for the improvement of the stock of the town, and a was formed at the Middle of the town, of which Mr. Charles Lynde became president.

A good breed of cattle was introduced, and a corresponding movement was made at the same time by Mr. Perry Melendy of the East Village, and others; and at the same time another movement was made by Mr. Bryant Melendy of South Hollow, to improve the breed of horses, which promises some success. Mr. George C. Hall of New York, has also kept some fine horses in town, where he purchased a farm for this purpose.

The statistics of 1860 exhibit a very considerable falling off from the census of 1850. This may be owing in part to some defect in the taking of the census; but still there has doubtless been a decrease in the agricultural products of the town.

RELIGION.

It appears from the church records of Brattleboro that arrangements were made as early as 1769, between the inhabitants of that town and those of Guilford for the support of Mr. Reeves, a Congregational preacher. The people of Guilford were to pay half the salary, £ 60, New York currency, and one sixth of the settlement, which was also £ 60, and Mr. Reeves was to preach half the time for them, they losing the time when bad weather prevented his preaching there."

The first edifice erected for Congregational service was located upon one of the highest hills, at what is called Guilford Centre, though the village, so called, is about a mile to the northward of the geographical centre of the town.

The early settlers, descendants of the pilgrims, on entering and taking possession of a new country, seem to have associated their religious condition with that of the Jews on entering the Holy Land, and their idea of worship was always connected with the act of going up to the temple of the Lord." There is moreover, a natural association between religious sentiment and elevated position.

The size of the township from its origin in early colonial times, arose, doubtless, from the limits over which a congregation of healthy, energetic persons could conveniently travel, on foot, if necessary in going to and returning from church. It was in fact the religious parish that determined the size of the civil municipality; and when Benning Wentworth made his township grants embrace six miles square, he was following a custom that had already become established by usage.

Persons from all parts of the town used to attend this church, and at times the roads were thronged on the Sabbath by those who wended their way to it.

The house though large, was often more than filled, so that many sat around the doors outside. It was built during the last decade of the last century, at a time when the town had attained its maximum population. The graveyard was on one side of it, and the large two-story mansion of Doct. Hyde on the other. This church was as we remember it, a large, two-story weather-stained building, without a steeple, a circular window at the gable-ends, large, square pews, the seats on hinges, and an upper gallery extending round three sides. The congregation stood while at prayers, and the seats were raised to give more standing room. When the prayers were finished the seats were lowered and were usually allowed to fall to their places with a great clatter. There was no means of warming this edifice in winter, since it was before the days of furnaces and stoves; but ladies often carried small foot-stoves made of tin, which were heated by a cup of coals placed within.

In summer when the weather had become warm, young ladies appeared in white dresses; and as wheeled vehicles had hardly begun to be introduced, many rode on horse-back. Following the primitive custom of the times, some of the foot-travelers carried an extra pair of shoes with them, which they put on in the place of an older and poorer pair just before entering the church, leaving the old pair tucked away outside. Boys and girls often went barefoot in summer time, and when they attended church, they carried their shoes in their hands until they reached the church door.

After the union of the Congregationalists with the Episcopalians of the East Village in 1819, this church was still used on alternate Sundays for a time; but finally, it went into the possession of the Universalists who arose in town and by them was taken down in 1837, and put up in a new shape, in the village at the foot of the hill. The mansion of Dr. Hyde was destroyed by fire; and nothing now remains upon the hill from which these two stately edifices used to overlook the country around except the grave-yard. The monuments there will shew by their inscriptions that the town has seen better days.

Across an intervening valley, stood another similar edifice with the same weather-stained appearance, and the same circular windows in the ends.—
It was designed for the use of the Baptists. At what precise time it was built we have no authentic information. It was never entirely finished, and was taken probably down about the year 1833, for the purpose of being rebuilt in Brattleboro, where it is now called the "Valley Mills."

A smaller building nearer Hinesburg and on a lower site was erected in 1816, and has been in constant use by the Baptists ever since. It has recently been repaired and ornamented with the addition of a small steeple. It contains about 40 pews, and may average an attendance of 100 persons. In 1860 it was presented with a communion service of silver by Mr. E. Blake of Springfield, Mass.

It would appear from the records of this church that the early settlers of Guilford were largely composed of Baptists, since at one period there were four considerable societies in town of that denomination.

RICHARD WILLIAM'S CHURCH.

so called, was organized in 1780, and by the close of the following decade it numbered 100 members.

This congregation was probably located in South Hollow or the eastern parts of the town and perhaps in both.
There was formerly a church edifice in East Guilford which has long since been taken down and moved.

SECOND BAPTIST CHURCH.

The second Baptist church was constituted in 1781. Its preacher in 1796, was Rev. Whitman Jacobs.

THIRD BAPTIST CHURCH.

The Third Church was constituted in 1782. It was located in the northern part of the town and the Reverend Peleg Hicks was its presiding elder for some 18 years, when in June 1800 it became united with the Second Church.
It is now the only Baptist society in town.

FOURTH BAPTIST CHURCH.

The Fourth Church was constituted in 1797, in the southern part of the town. In 1802, Benjamin Bucklin became its pastor and preached some 20 years. It then dissolved.

These church societies usually assembled in dwelling-houses, barns, school-houses and groves; the only established place being those which we have already mentioned.

The members are gratified with the belief that the church is now in a reviving condition. It has remained as a bright light through the darkest periods of the town's decline, and has been the centre and principle of Christian union and social comfort to some of our substantial and most worthy families.

We are indebted for the principal of these facts to DEA. JOHN CARPENTER, Church Clerk, who is a native of the town, and is now [1869 or '70] seventy six years of age.

THE EPISCOPAL CHURCH EDIFICE of the East Village has been newly slated, painted and thoroughly repaired since 1860, for which service the parish gratefully acknowledged the assistance of Mrs. Jane McMillan of Cleveland, Ohio, a native of Guilford.

This church used formerly to have an attendance of about 300 ; but of late years it has been maintained under great disadvantages ; its members having been gradually, but constantly reduced by death and emigration until regular attendance numbers only between forty and fifty persons. Yet these are full of hope that their days of greatest trial are past, and that they may transmit to future times a worship which with its old pleasant memories has been such a warming source of union to themselves and their fathers.

The clergymen who have officiated in Christ Church since the ministration of the Rev. Frederick Wadleigh from Sept. 18, 1841 to June 30, 1845, are :

Rev. John B. Pratt, a second time, Aug. 23 1846 to Aug. 8, 1850.

Rev. G. C. Eastman, May 18, 1851.

Rev. Ethan Allen, October 1855 to May 19, 1867, at which time this worthy pastor died.

Rev. Silas M. Rogers, from Aug. 4, 1867.

THE METHODISTS

have a small chapel at Green River which was built some years ago and which has been recently repaired. Its erection and the support of service there were largely due to the efforts of MR. SAMUEL CUTTING.

According to tradition the first Methodist preaching in Guilford began about seventy years ago. We have this statement from an exhorter in the church. Between the years 1820 and 1830 this sect exhibited the greatest activity and seems to have attained its widest influence.

MR. AMHERST LAMB,

The preacher now is the REV. A. G. BOWKER,

and service is held by him in succession at the East Village, at Guilford Centre and at Green River. The attendance at all three places numbers considerably less than 100 persons.—Mr. Bowker was preceded in the minority by the Rev. Hubbard Eastman.

UNIVERSALISM IN GUILFORD.

In 1829, MATTHEW HALE SMITH, who has since distinguished himself as a clever newspaper writer and as the author of several works, among which is "Sunshine and Shadow in New York," came to Guilford to preach Universalism, then, comparatively, a new doctrine in that part of the country. He was a young man of talent, about 18 years of age, and, he soon became very popular with his hearers.—He preached in the old Congregational church at Guilford Centre; but does not appear to have remained long since in 1832, he returned to Hartford. Services were held from that period at intervals until about 1860, since which they have entirely ceased.

CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH.

In 1855, a small church for Congregational service was erected in the East Village, the

REV. MOSES G. GROSVENOR

became the preacher and continued in that office with intermissions, laboring with zeal and fervor until 1865, when he removed to the West.

Since the departure of Mr. Grosvenor, there has been only occasional preaching at this church, and generally by the Methodists. The Young Men's Christian Association of Brattleboro have recently held prayer-meetings there on Sunday afternoons.

The attendants on services there was never considerable. Its erection does not seem to have been occasioned by any growth of religious interest, or the want of additional church accommodation; for there was already a sufficient number of such edifices in town to seat nearly, if not all the inhabitants.—From the most reliable statements we have been able to procure, not more than one person in six, or five at farthest, attends church of any denomination. The religious spirit of the people as evinced by church-going, when compared with what it was forty years ago, exhibits a marked contrast and decline.

EDUCATION.

But though the maintainance of religious worship has undergone a change the educational interest of the town appears to have been kept up with unabated care and attention.

There are 14 districts in town and though the number of pupils in each is less than half what it used to be though the expense is doubled and we are not so many to bear it as formerly. Summer and winter schools are still held in each district. The winter school now, is often kept by young ladies, where the services of a male teacher used to be considered necessary.

A general progress in these schools during the last generation is noticeable particularly in this, that it is not unfrequently the case that the more advanced scholars in arithmetic are taught algebra.

A general social improvement among the people is also remarked in the greater number of musical instruments of the higher order that are met with in the houses of the inhabitants. Young ladies may be heard playing the piano or melodeon where twenty years ago such instruments were hardly known.

During the present decade the currency of the country and prices of every thing have been inflated by the war of the Rebellion, and the wages of teachers have correspondingly risen with those of other classes of employés. The average pay of male teachers 20 years ago was about $14 a month; of female teachers five or six dollars per month. The average at this time is about $30 for male teachers and from $12 to $16 for female; but when females teach winter schools their wages are about the same as those of males.

Select schools have occasionally been established in town; but they have never been maintained for any considerable length of time.

COLLEGIATES.

The following are the names of men who as far as we can learn, have entered college from Guilford:

Dana Hyde, Jr. -U. V. M.- Doctor:

Timothy Phelps, ,, ,, ,, Lawyer:

Henry Denison, do, Lawyer & Ed.:

Erastus Root, ,, Doctor:

Timothy Root, Amherst, Cong. Cl.:

Isaac Bucklin, Baptist Clergyman:

William Bullock, William's College:

Ebenezer Boyden, Yale, Epis. Cl.:

Justin Carpenter, Union, Lawyer:

Mark Carpenter, ,, Bap. Cl.:

Ira Carpenter, Middlebury, Teacher:

Samuel Gregory, Teacher:

Amos W. Hart, Middlebury, ,, :

Henry W. Allen, Hobart, Epis. Cl.:

Alex. V. G. Allen, Gambia, ,, :

Besides these, Gen. J. W. Phelps graduated at the West Point Military Academy in 1836, and entered the army.

James M. Tyler graduated at the Albany Law School in 1860 and became a lawyer.

John Phelps received an honorary degree of A. B. from the University of Vermont in 1811.

Amos W. Hart, mentioned, spent but one year in Middlebury; he then pursued his studies in Germany.

Samuel Gregory is President of the College of Female Physicians, Boston. Mass.

Hosea Ballou, President of Tufts College, Mass. is a native of Guilford Alex. V. G. Allen is Professor in the Theological Seminary, Cambridge, Mass.

The Rev. Wilbur Fisk has been previously mentioned as a native of the town. On window No. 14 in the Metropolitan Memorial Methodist Episcopal Church, Washington, D. C. is the following inscription:

"Wilbur Fiske, D. D., John Dempster, D. D. Founders of Methodist Theological Schools in America."

James and Daniel Packer, natives of the town, became Baptist clergymen.

LAWYERS AND PHYSICIANS.

Royal Tyler Elisha Bigelow and John Phelps have been the principal practicing lawyers of the town. There has been no resident lawyer in Guilford since 1835.

Drs. Dana Hyde, Sr. and Benjamin Stevens were the earliest settled physicians of whom there is any record. Both resided on the hill near the old Congregational church, and both reared each a son to the medical profession: Drs. Dana Hyde, Jr. and Benjamin W. Stevens, the latter of whom is still living in town at the age of 80 years.

Drs. Edwin and Elisha Cross, and Frank Burdick have practised medicine in town for short periods of time and Dr. N. Webster is now in practice.

MILITARY.

At what time military trainings began in Guilford we have no precise information; but as early as 1775, an organized band is mentioned as being present from there at the disturbances of Westminster. Those disturbances sprang from the general spirit of liberty, independence and disaffection then prevailing against the mother country which was greatly aggravated still by a belief on the part of the settlers that the royal court then about to set at Westminster would give descisions averse to their land claims and titles. The sitting of the court was resisted by the "liberty men," who were in turn attacked by the court party, or tories, and several of their number wounded, two of them mortally.—The band from Guilford marched to the support of the "liberty men."

In 1782, seven years after this event, we have the record of three companies in town, the names of whose officers are given. And even earlier still in February 1776, a company belonging to Guilford is mentioned in a report of Col. Benjamin Carpenter to the New York Provincial Congress. From this time the militia organization of the town appears to have been kept up with great spirit for more than half a century. About the year 1830, this spirit began to decline and by the close of 1840, had nearly expired, the last June training having taken place, it is said, in 1846.

Perhaps at no time did the military spirit run higher than during the decade between 1820—1830. At one time of this period, there were three large foot companies in town besides a cavalry company which was made up in part from Brattleboro. The cavalry and one company of infantry were called volunteer companies, while the other two companies were usually termed "flood-wood"; so called from being made up from all kinds of men; every one between the ages of 18 and 45; with certain exceptions, being obliged to train and furnish his own musket, equipments and uniform. No companies in regular service ever made a better appearance than the two volunteer companies; their uniforms were exceedingly martial in appearance, and their arms and equipments were complete; as were, indeed, also, those of the flood-wood.

The infantry volunteer company uniforms consisted of a blue coat trimmed with yellow, large eagle buttons, white drill pants, gaiters or boots, white vest, leather stock, and leather helmet with high tin crest from which flowed long, red horse-hair, while from a cockade on the left rose a tall, red feather plume with white top.

This cavalry had for its Captain between the years 1823 and 1829, Philip Martin, a soldier of the war of 1812, a man of great military spirit and character and of devoted patriotism. His father had served in the Revolutionary war, and he, himself, had a son, who served in the department of the Gulf during the War of the Rebellion.

The cavalry uniform consisted of red coats, blue pantaloons and helmets like the infantry, but trimmed with bearskin, as also, were their holsters. Their arms consisted of a long sabre, a brace of brass mounted pistols, and they usually rode fine horses.

When the first Tuesday of June arrived, all these troops swarmed from the hills and vallies to training at the "middle of the town." The thunder of the bass drum, the rattle of the snare drum, the fife, bugle and clarionet awakened the slumbering echoes; bright armor and showy uniforms gleamed amidst the green foliage then all in its prime, and the town was all astir, gingerbread, lemons and oranges and apples scarcely less valued than they at that season, cider, pop-beer, etc were offered for sale from waggons at every turn; rum, punch of the most delicious kind was mixed in unstinted quantities at the store and tavern; the troops marched and countermarched, maneuvered and fired blank cartridges;

the rolls were called and unlike the practice in Shakespear's time, all who were absent, not those present, were pricked, and never was there a more enjoyable time for all both old and young than June training day.

In the fall of the year when the stress of the summer work was over, a more extensive military parade was made and the companies of several neighboring towns joined together for "general muster." At musters were held, where the manoeuvres appropriate to real battles were performed, and at times a band of men representing Indians in dress and warfare style, formed a part of the contending scores, making some piece of woods on the field ring with the medley of their yells and the crack of their rifles.

At one of these musters held at Brattleboro, Sept. 11, 1816, the Guilford Light Infantry Company was on the ground by daylight in the morning but its ardor was somewhat damped by being ordered to take the left of the regimental line instead of the right, a position which its commander, Captain Martin claimed by virtue of commission, if not by the excellence of his company. The order being reiterated he marched off his company and mustered, inspected and drilled it by itself; as the men were proud of their old warrior captain, they would sustain him in anything that he might do. He was court martialed, but finally acquitted. Gen. Jonathan Hunt, then a candidate for Congress, acted as his attorney; and doubtless political considerations had much to do in occasioning as well as settling the discord.

Since that period, the population has rapidly declined, the young and enterprising going to the West. Of all the military activity that once existed in Guilford—of all the paraphernalia in which it once exhibited itself, by the year 1850, hardly a vestige remained. It would probably have been impossible then to have found half a dozen muskets or parts of uniform in town, and such was actually the case on the break out of the Rebellion in 1861.

Since that war an effort has been made by the State to revive the militia, and Guilford has been associated with Vernon in raising one company as part of the 12th regiment of the State.

THE WAR OF 1812.

We have no means of ascertaining fully the names or number of men who went from Guilford to the War of 1812, since no record of them was kept as there ought to have been on the town book.

The following names have been furnished to us, taken chiefly from the muster roll of the 2d Company of the 31st United State's Infantry which was in the Battle of Plattsburg, and may be relied on as correct, viz:

Sergt. Philip Martin:

Private Samuel Roberts:

" Asa Bullock:

" Joel Bolster, Jr:

" Benjamin Dennis:

" Rodolphus Eddy:

" Theophilus Wadleigh:

" John K. Chase:

" George Carpenter:

" Joshua Culver, Jr.:

Besides these it is known that Ephraim Gale, Jr. and Jonathan Chase served in the cavalry, and that Joseph Jacobs died in the service.

The war of 1812 was not very popular in New England, and it had not a few opponents in Vermont; but immediately on its declaration by our Government, June 18, 1812, a company of old men called the "Silver Grays" was organized and drilled, many of whom had been Revolutionary soldiers. They called themselves "minute men", and with their silver locks rendered impressive by Revolutionary memories, they made an imposing appearance, forcibly to the rising generation to sustain the country in her hour of need.

The names of some of this company of the Silver Grays as handed down by tradition:

Gen. Aaron Barney:
 Isaac Noyes:
 James Noyes:
 John Phelps:
 Cyrus Carpenter:
 Samuel Shepherdson:
 Joseph Boyden:
 Nathan Hatch:
 James Packer:
 James Slaughter:
 Aaron Franklin:
 Elihu Field, Sen.:
 David Baker:
 Jonah Cutting:
 Joel Bolster, Sen.:
 Paul Chase:
 Cyrus Martin:
 William Marsh:
 Ephraim Gale, Sen.:
 Andrew Wilkins:
 Thomas Lynde:
 Jason Makepeace:
 William Hines:
 Fred Ashcraft:

The officers known to have gone from Guilford to the War of 1812 were:

Jeremiah Greenleaf, 2d Lieut. 31st Infantry:

Benj. W. Stevens. Surgeon:

Jonathan K. Chase, Captain of Cavalry:

Isaac Noyes, Captain of Infantry:

After the war, Benjamin W. Stevens returned to the practice of medicine in Guilford, where he still remains at an advanced age.

THE WAR OF 1861.

The number of men furnished by Guilford for the War of the Rebellion as credited in the reports of the Adjutant General of the State is 124 men. Not all of these were inhabitants of the town: some of them were procured elsewhere. Several were negroes, who had joined our regiments in the South. The sum total of bounties paid to these men amounts to $3,656.29. The highest bounty paid to any one man being $1050. It will be seen that the town furnished one man for about every ten of its inhabitants, and at a direct cost of $27 for every man, woman and child. The names of all these men cannot now be given; we here record such as we consider authentic.

WOUNDED.

Herbert E. Taylor:
 Edward K. Keplinger:
 Lewis H. Lynde:
 Patrick Moore:
 Emery L. Tubbs.

Of the wounded, one case is of such peculiar interest that we will append an account of it:

HERBERT E. TAYLOR,

Sergt. Co. F 4th Vermont Infantry enlisted, Aug. 31, 1861; wounded in the Battle of the Wilderness: First wound in the small of the back, right side of the spine, by a piece of shell, weighing 3'12 oz., from bore of our own guns. It passed through to the left side of the spine where it remained four months and was then removed by Dr. Geo. F. Gale of Brattleboro: also at the same time, he received a gunshot wound in the left foot; the ball of which remained in the wound four weeks. A piece of the heel-bone was afterwards removed by Dr. Gale. He recovered.

OFFICERS OF THE WAR OF 1861.

General J. W. Phelps and General Charles E. Phelps, sons of John Phelps, are both natives of Guilford. The first entered the service as Colonel of the First Regiment of Vermont Volunteers and the Second as Lieut. Colonel of the Maryland Seventh.

Colonel Halbert S. Greenleaf, son of Jeremiah Greenleaf, was also born in Guilford. He commanded the 52d. Massachusetts Volunteers in the Department of the Gulf.

Besides there were :

Henry R. Chase, Major, of the 11th Vermont Vols.

Roger Tubbs, Lieut.. of the 11th Vermont Vols.

Thomson Burdick, Lieut. of a Colored regiment

Frank E. Burdick, Surgeon of an Illinois regiment.

William W. Lynde, Capt., 8th Vermont Vols.

Henry H. Pierce, Lieut., of 7th Connecticut Vols.

Frank H. Houghton, 2d Lieut. 17th Ohio Battery.

William W. Lynde, Captain, 8th Vermont Volunteers.

MANUFACTURES.

The various branches of manufacture which have sprung up in the town since its first settlement have generally flourished only for a short time. Numerous efforts have been made to render them stable, but they have not thus far met with much success. We give a list of such as have been pursued at different periods, viz:

Agricultural implements ;

Barrels, bedsteads, chairs,—cabinet furniture; boots and shoes; brick, brooms, buttons;

Carriages, carts, sleighs and sleds; cider-brandy, combs, cotton-yarn;

Harmonicons, harness-trimmings,—hats of all kinds;

Inkstands; leather; linseed-oil; malt; ox-yokes, ox-bows; plows; whiskey.

Some of the first cast iron plows ever made in Vermont, were made in Guilford.

Fulling, cloth-dressing, wool-carding were formerly carried on at three or four establishments, but these branches of industry, as large factories arose, went gradually into disuse. They are still occasionally met with, though not in Guilford, the last in town, having disappeared some 15 years since.

Yet a family of the old style is seen now and then where the woman raises ten or a dozen children, does all her own work and spins and weaves enough to clothe them all, herself and husband included.

The domestic linens manufactured in town some forty to fifty years ago, might compare favorably with those produced in any other quarter of the globe.

Elegant furniture was manufactured at that period by Elihu Field, a son of one of the original proprietors of the town. His side-boards which it was common to see in all the principal residences of those days were noted for their beauty of design, convenience of use and excellence of workmanship.—though no longer in fashion they are frequently seen in Guilford and the adjoining towns at this day.

The manufactures now existing may be represented by four principal slate quarries, one brick-yard, three black-smith shops, one paper-mill, four perambulator shops, one shop for chair-stuff and bed-steeds, one grist-mill and seven saw-mills.

The slate quarries and brick-yard have been in operation for more than half a century. The quarries gave employment at one time, between 1850 and 1860, to over a 100 men; some 50 or 60 are now employed upon them.—The slate is of the best possible quality, of a dark blue color, hard, firm, with a metallic ring, and apparently of unending durability. The quarries extend along a line of some six miles in the eastern part of the town, and occur at points amidst the prevailing formation of rough, gnarled mica slate.

MEDICAL SPRING.

In 1868, the Medical Spring at the Centre Village, after having remained unnoticed for many years, was again brought into use. In that year, Mr. James Dalton, formerly from Boston, Mass., but more lately from Calcutta, Hindostan, and who was spending a time at Brattleboro for his health, and turning his attention to the traditions concerning it, and being convinced of its value, Mr. H. purchased, together with several other gentlemen, the old Houghton farm on which it is situated and commenced bottling the water for market. Before the close of the year, many cases of bottles had been sent to Boston. An excellent dissertation on the qualities of the water had been published in pamphlet form by Doct. Root of Guilford, 51 years previous. The qualities then ascribed to it were confirmed by a recent analysis made by Dr. Charles T. Jackson, State assayer to the commonwealth of Massachusetts and analytic and consulting chemist. Its ingredients are:

Carbonate of lime per gal.	15.80	grs.
„ „ soda „ „	2.40	„
„ „ iron „ „	2.99	„
„ „ magnesia „ „	0.60	„
Chloride of sodium „ „	2.41	„
Insoluble silica	0.60	„
Organic vegetable matter with traces of intrate of potash and traces of sulphate of soda	0.40	„
Solid matter per gal.	30.80	„
Carbonic acid gas 30 cubic inches, or 13.74 grs. per gal.

The water is tonic and ante acid in its effects.

NAVIGATION OF THE CONNECTICUT.

The town of Guilford does not border upon the Connecticut River, but it approaches it to within about a mile at its nearest point,—near enough to feel the warming effect of its waters, and thus to enjoy in its eastern borders a growth of the sunny chestnut above its usual latitude.

To a town from which so large an amount of produce went annually to market as from Guilford in former years, the navigation of the river was a matter of great importance. It was hoped that steam might be introduced upon it to advantage. Its waters maintained a greater average depth in those days, before so much of the pristine forests were cut away, than it does now, and its current was already a channel of considerable commerce with Hartford and the towns on its banks by means of long pole-boats. These boats while ascending the river and when the south wind was fresh, would often hoist large, square, lug sails, and when the canvass bellied out full, nothing could be more beautifully picturesque than their stately march as they steadily stemmed the current among the fields and villages along its course.

In anticipation of a successful issue to schemes of improvement by the navigation of the river, the town constructed a road to the last village down Broad Brook to the Connecticut, which had never been accomplished till towards the close of the decade following the year 1820. But the ascent of a small steam-wheel steamer, as far as Barnet, effected by much pushing and hauling, was all the result accomplished at this time. and, though other partial attempts were made, the subsequent introduction of railroads and the reduction of the number of inhabitants by emigration, rendered farther efforts unnecessary.

The following is the record of town action:

REQUEST FOR TOWN MEETING.

Aaron Barney served many years as High Bailiff.

Col. Russell Hyde was Deputy Sheriff for a period of several years.

During the corn harvest in October, the old style was very common; sometimes, in barns; out of doors, if the weather was fine. The weather during that season is often very pleasant, and the moon with her quiet light and benignant expression gave an additional exhilaration to the feelings, besides that naturally awakened by the abundance of the golden corn fields. The huskers, generally a score or so, were seated in front of a large pile of ears; some in chairs, and others on large pumpkins. Maudlin songs and stories were invariably the accompaniment of this kind of sport, which was usually followed at the house by a treat of pie and cheese, with an occasional drink of rum from the farmer's wife and daughters.

QUILTINGS.

The young girl was taught industry, economy, exercise of taste, forecast, etc. She was taught to sew sometimes when four years old. The odd bits and ends of calico dresses were cut and basted for bed-quilt blocks by the mother and given to Miss to sew. The cover to her quilt she was expected to finish by the time she became marriageable and it was to be a part of her marriage outfit. When the girl had attained somewhere near her majority, eighteen, or somewhere near, a quilting was given. All the young ladies of the neighborhood assembled at her house to complete the bed-quilt. Stories and pleasant chat enlivened the busy afternoon, followed by tea, after which the beaux were expected.

PORCUS.

It is told of Dr. Dana Hyde, Sen. that it became a custom with him when called up late at night to attend a patient at some distance, as was not unfrequently the case, he would inquire on entering the sick-room: "Well! are you going to die?" And, the Patient: Oh! I do not know, Doctor, but, I am very sick!

The Doctor, after feeling the pulse of the patient, examining his tongue, and finding, perhaps, a case of indigestion from over-eating, or something of the kind, "Well, do you know what porcus means?"

Patient: No, Doctor, I do not know what it means.

The Doctor: Well, porcus is the Latin for hog!"

On inquiring into the truth of this story, we learn that the case as given, certainly occurred once.

OUR ARCHITECT.

The Master Carpenter of the old Congregational Church was William Shepherdson, or as he was usually called, "Uncle Bill Shepherdson." The frame-work being ready, was put up, according to the custom of the times, by a "raising-bee,"—a large number of men who voluntarily came together for the purpose. The frame was thus put up, from ground-sill to ridge-pole, in a very short time. When the raising of the church had thus been completed, it is a well-attested fact that "Uncle Bill" put one foot over his neck, and on the other hopped the full length of the ridge-pole, from end to end!

OUR STRONG MEN.

Mr. Thomas Hines, who at the age of 89 is still living (1869) with his son in Brattleboro, came to Guilford with his father from Rhode Island when 9 years old. It was from his father that the village of Hinesburg was named. As he grew up he became a mill-wright and was employed in putting up the machinery of many of the finest mills that were built in the surrounding country. He was six feet one inch in height, weighed 209 pounds and could lift nearly four times his own weight. He speaks of using an ash-log on one occasion, 20 ft. long and 14 in. through the butt, one end of which was an over weight for two ordinary men, but the whole of which he lifted with ease.

But there was another man in town, Nathan Cutler, taller than he by several inches, who has taken him up with one arm and carried him off the ground in spite of himself.

This Mr. Cutler was noted for his extraordinary power. It is said at the raising of a barn where it took 18 men to put up one of its sides, he and John Phelps together alone put up another. I heard a man say that he saw him once place himself under a horse, weighing 900 pounds and lift him upon his back and shoulders from the ground.

WRESTLING WITH BRATTLEBORIANS.

It was formerly customary to form "wrestling rings" and challenges were given out for the championship of these rings. The victor was called the "Bully of the Ring," and was looked upon by the young men as an object of envy. The raising bees alluded to were favorite occasions for forming these rings. At the raising of the old church or meeting house as it was called, in West Brattleboro, the Guilford boys were challenged by the Brattleborians for the usual wrestling match. Twelve were chosen on each side. Dr. Hyde, Sr. a very powerful man, was the first to enter the ring from Guilford. He alone, threw nine of the Brattleborians in succession, and a man by the name of Jacob Barnaby, threw the other three.

THE FIRST WAGGON.

The first waggon that ever came into town was brought in by John Phelps in 1810. It was of a light blue color with wooden springs and cost $65. Previous to that time, people when they rode to meeting or to parties, used to go in large lumber waggons, on horseback; the women often mounted on pillows behind their fathers, brothers, husbands or lovers.

A case of

occurred in the early days of the town which occasioned much merriment.—A maiden lady by the name of Anna Goodenough received an offer of marriage from Deacon Jonathan Allen, who, however, subsequently changed his mind. On coming to inform her of the change in his intentions, she expressed regret; said if it must be so, it must; but it was a disappointment to her. The Deacon replied that he was willing to make good the damages, if she would let him know what they were. She said that she thought that they ought to be as much as a dollar, or four and sixpence at least; and the affair was amicably settled on that basis; but the Deacon became unenviably famous by it.

THE GUILFORD SORRELS.

The early settlers were fond of good horses. Jonathan Aldrich raised a pair of sorrels about the year 1806, of the Wild Air or Deer breed, one of which would trot a mile in less than three minutes with Aldrich who weighed upwards of 200 on his back. This horse was sold for $300, which considering the time was a large sum to be paid for one horse.

NAHUM CUTLER.

The Village of Algiers owes its origin largely to the enterprise of Nahum Cutler, a native of the town of Guilford who was in many respects a remarkable man. This Village was being, built up during the first 30 years of this century, the city of Algiers in Africa became particularly noticeable in America. * * * The idea of Algiers and its Dey as its head officer was called, became impressed upon the public mind; and as Mr. Cutler was a prominent character, standing in a similar relation to the village which he was building up that the Dey did to the city of Algiers, he was called the Dey of Algiers, and the village thus got its name; though its proper name is East Guilford

Mr. Cutler was born in 1776. He was a man of gigantic stature, being 6 feet six inches in height, and his muscular strength was in every way proportionate to his size. He had a strong intellect, was an original thinker, possessed an intuitive knowledge of men and was generally able to control them.

On attaining his majority, he went to Connecticut and there took advantageous contracts for supplying Hartford and other places with water: which he did by means of pine logs bored out for the purpose. While thus employed he became acquainted with a Miss Adams of Hartford, an heiress, who was as diminutive in size as he was large, whom he married. It was doubtless through her influence that he became attached to the Episcopal form of worship, which he subsequently aided to introduce into his native town.

Returning to Guilford in 1802, he devoted his future to building up manufactures and business generally. A company comprising himself, Elihue Field, Artemas Gale and others set in operation a carriage-maker's shop, cabinet-maker's shop, blacksmith's shop, a cotton-factory, distillery etc.

They erected a building for stores, and shops called the Tontine, in which there was at one time a drug-store. The national flag was often seen flying from it and the people, animated by an intense activity were much given to the consumption of gun-powder which they often exploded from the old-fashioned 56 pound weights at other times than on holydays. Besides shops and a new tavern there was a church, a school-house, and a number of dwellings erected. Previous to this time the village consisted chiefly of the residence and grist and saw mills of Mr. Levi Boyden, a tavern, school-house and a few scattered houses. It prospered till about 1820, when on the close of the war with Great Britain and the restoration of commercial relations with that country, its manufacturing interests began to decline, and Mr. Cutler and some others of its business men went to Western New York. The impulse thus given to manufacturing, however, continued to be felt for many years afterwards; but it could not compete against the low priced labor of Europe,—the low tariff imposed by the dominant political party of the country and the greater attractions that were offered by the virgin soil and new life of the West. Mr. Cutler removed from Cayuga

County New York in 1836 to the State of Pennsylvania, where he died in 1840. His widow still survives.(1869)

We have alluded elsewhere to Mr. Cutler's great strength. It is told of him while someone was boasting of the power of a horse which he had purchased. Mr. Cutler offered to draw against the horse, the load to be on a stone-boat, up hill, each to carry the same weight. Three men, whose united weight was nearly 600 pounds were piled upon Mr. Cutler's head and shoulders, and the boat for the horse was weighted with 11 bushels of corn. Mr. C. drew the boat by falling forward upon his hands and then rising-repeating the operation; the weight of the men on his shoulders, actually helping to propel the load forward; while the load of corn was as much as the horse could well bear, to say nothing of dragging the boat. He could not budge an inch.

It is said that he afterwards ran a race of four rods weighted with the same men against another man unweighted, who was to run eight rods, and won it.

RETIRING FROM OFFICE.

Instances have occurred, where persons have been selected to office through a long series of years. John Lynde acted as town clerk for 15 years, concluding his period of service in 1854. His immediate predecessor, Ward Bullock, served from 1825 to 1839. And in concluding this imperfect sketch of the Town of Guilford, we cannot do better than to repeat the words which this last named clerk entered upon the records at the close of his official career as follows:

"Here close the arduous duties of fourteen years service as Town Clerk.

I now bid adieu to the cares and troubles of office with pleasure, and with pleasing anticipation of enjoying in quiet the sweets and pleasures of private life the few remaining days of my earthly pilgrimage and with a devout and fervent prayer to the Father of the spirit of all flesh that the richest and choicest blessings of heaven may rest on my immediate successor in officer that he be endowed with wisdom from on high to guide and direct him in all the duties of his official station, as well as in the more pleasing ones of private life; and may he be so fortunate in the discharge of those duties as to receive the approbation of an approving conscience, an approving people and the approbation of his God. And may God save the people!"—And with a hearty response to this sentiment, we thus close this historical sketch of the Town of Guilford.

April 1, 1869.

J. W. P.

GEN. JOHN WOLCOTT PHELPS

BY CECIL HAMPDEN CUTTS HOWARD.

It has been truly said "The world knows nothing of its greatest men."—Of the late General Phelps, who as a soldier and author, gained but a partial recognition of his merits before his death, it is perhaps the most appropriate thing that could be uttered.

He died in his native town, Guilford, of heart disease, Feb, 1 1885 at the age of 71 years and 3 months.

Of his early life, prior to his entering of the West Point Military Academy at twenty, we have but little record. Spent in the company of his parents and many who have since become distinguished, it is not to be wondered at that he was always so much interested in literature and physical pursuits, to that degree that it showed itself all through his later life. His great-grandfather, Charles Phelps, of Northampton, Mass. was the first lawyer who ever came to live within the limits of the State of Vermont.—His grandfather, Timothy Phelps, was also a lawyer and held many positions of trust.

His father, John Phelps practised law in Guilford, and the substantial mansion of ye olden time and the law office which he used are still standing.

General Phelps' father was married twice, and of eight children, the subject of our sketch was the sole survivor.

The second wife of his father was Mrs. Almira Lincoln, the celebrated teacher and author by whom he had two children, descendants of whom are now living in Baltimore.

In 1836, General Phelps graduated from West Point into the army a short time before the out-break of the war with the Creek Indians. As early as 1838, his gallant conduct was conspicuous in the action of Locha Hutehee, in January of that year.

After the war, he was put in charge of the emigration to the West of the Cherokee Indians. To quote his own words in connection with this subject he has said:

"I had always believed the Indians more sinned against than sinning and later in my life, I finally came to use my pen in their behalf."

Many skirmishes and other duties in the South and in Canada occupied his time until the out-break of the Mexican war, in which for two years he lead a company and was prominent in the battles of Vera Cruz, Contreras, and Cherubusco. For gallant conduct he was breveted, but declined to accept the promotion. In 1850, he received a regular promotion. For some years afterward he was away from civilization and had the hardest kind of border experiences. In a diary written later, while in Brattleboro, he says:

"In the spring of 1852, I was obliged to leave Brownsville, Texas, because the government would not sustain me in my efforts to execute their orders for the suppression of filibustering attacks from our territory on Mexico. It left me in the lurch among savages whose cunning was exhausted in quiet, yet constant efforts to destroy the government under which they lived. I went then to Europe, simply because I was not prepared to resign, having devoted my whole life singly to the service, and remained abroad one year.

While in Europe he visited many places of note, and on his return wrote and published his first volume, entitled "Sybilline Leaves." This is connected with his journal and very original.

In 1859, he resigned his commission after having served awhile under General Johnson in the Utah expedition, and then returned to Brattleboro, having completed nearly 23 years of military services.

Much of the intervening space between his leaving the army and the out-break of the war of rebellion was spent in writing articles against the aggression of the slave power. In a sketch of the war he pens the following account of his services:

"At the out-break of the Rebellion I volunteered my services to lead the first company of Vermont volunteers which together with one regiment from Massachusetts, and one from New York under my command, took possession of the mouth of the James River, thus securing that strategic point for subsequent reduction of the Rebel Capital.

From the mouth of the James River I was ordered to the South West, where I occupied Ship Island with a brigade of New England volunteers, and subsequently took part in the reduction of New Orleans.

I garrisoned the Fort near the mouth of the Mississippi, and was the first to enter the Custom house as the citadel of New Orleans.

I then took possession of the Rebel works north of the City. The gun-carriages of these works were still burning, having been set on fire previous to their falling into the hands of the government troops. The guns had been spiked, but New England ingenuity soon restored them to fighting order. At Carrolton, named by me, Fort Parapet, our camp was swarming with negroes which the government commands was ordering to be returned to their masters. I began organizing slaves as soldiers. The reasons for this movement were these :

First, men were wanted for holding the strategic points which had fallen into the possession of the Government, at Vicksburg, Red River, Port Hudson, etc. Second every slave when made a soldier, not only could help hold a strategic point, but could help throw bullets at his old masters, instead of supporting them in the rebellion with his labor. In short, there was every military reason in favor of the measure and none against it.

I was ordered however by the Government commander to cease organizing negroes as troops, and to set them at work instead cutting wood for market, and other labor. In reply to this I decidedly refused to become a slave-driver, and resigned my commission and came to Vermont."

The given words coming as they do from his own pen tell the world much more forcibly than could be done in the language of another.

In a short time after his resignation, the plan at first presented by him was adopted, and before the war ended colored troops were plentiful.

In December 1862, General Phelps was waited upon by a number of prominent people who asked him to return to his post. He accompanied some of them to Washington and held an interview with President Lincoln. The result was his immediate return to Brattleboro, as President Lincoln would not accede to some things which General Phelps deemed important. President Lincoln offered him a commission as Major General of Volunteers, or in other words as chief officer in command of black troops. General Phelps' love of army life, his long service in the same, and every surrounding circumstance combined to make him resent the proposition. It gave him no credit for previous service, and he could not honorably consent to losing any part of the credit due to him for the long time spent in active service. In addition to this, the fact that his idea of increasing the army by organizing and arming the freedmen should have been taken later, though so violently opposed at first, and acted upon through President Lincoln's proclamation of emancipation embittered the rest of his life. He was ever after severe and bitter in his estimation of President Lincoln's character, regarding him a weak man and a "time-server." He had a deep sense of justice and his faith once shaken, was not easily restored.

Returning to Brattleboro, he realized that henceforth his life must be in a great measure spent among books, for his tastes were such that he could not mingle to any great degree with his fellow men. His friends were few, but true, and the best of them were so unfortunate as to misunderstand his motives. He wrote much and made use of his linguistic talents to translate a work from the French on Secret Societies. His study was his earthly paradise. He lived in a giant, old house on Asylum street in Brattleboro. It was at some distance from the street and overhanging trees shaded the winding walks by which the house was reached. On the front and one side a broad piazza surrounded the house, and at the end of the piazza was a bay-window. The house was a two-story frame structure of simple design.

As you entered by the front door, you found before you on the right a flight of stairs leading to the second story. On the left of the hall were two doors, the one leading into the drawing-room, and the other into the parlor. These were furnished very simply and connected by folding-doors. They were like a soldier's quarters. In every room the long windows came down to the ground and opened out on the piazza beyond.

Opening out from the parlor was his study. In the wide bay-window he wrote day after day, and in fancy we can see him now, sitting at his table writing, around him on every side the collection of books which he had gathered from time to time in his travels. Before him through the vine-covered bay-window he could see the village street and beyond where Mount Wanstiquet arose. In front of the window was his garden. In summer and fall it was his delight to treat the children to pears and apples which grew on his fruit trees.

It was before he left this home that he wrote the book, called "Good Behavior." The work was intended as a text book for schools, and was adopted later in St. Louis and other cities. The chief aim he had in writing it was his idea that children should be taught good manners in school, as well as at home, thereby ensuring to all a knowledge of many of the rules of good breeding, so often unwittingly broken; obviating many of the difficulties which arise in the later life of many public school pupils. We quote from the book, as partial illustrations of its character:

"Conversation is a reflex of character, let us therefore cultivate a tone of mind and a habit of life the betrayal of which need not put us to shame in the company of the pure and the rest will be easy."

"True politeness has been defined, benevolence in little things. We are not to be polite, because we wish to please, but, because we wish to consider the feelings of others; because in a word, we desire to carry into every act of our daily life the spirit and practice of that religion which commends us to do unto others as we would they should do unto us."

The first lessons taught young sovereigns should be the respect and kindly regard which they owe each other."

General Phelps was greatly interested in educational matters and for many years was President of "The Vermont Teachers Association." He was, also, a leading officer of The Vermont Historical Society. Besides the works mentioned, he wrote as his last published work, a small volume on Madagascar. He contributed largely to various periodicals throughout the country: among them "The Century," "The Christian Union," and "The Independent," as well as many scientific periodicals.

Believing that "the Masonic Lodge was the cause of much of our country's evils, he was always opposed to secret societies of every kind. His prominence in the matter, led to his becoming the nominee for President of "The American Party in the presidential election of 1880.

Perhaps upon no other subject was he so thoroughly misunderstood. except by the few. His temperament was such, however, that he could not stand idly by when anything arose to claim his attention, as being wrong or unjust. He never disguised his sentiments, but was always open and frank in regard to his convictions. His friends honored him for being so true to his conscience.

In 1883, he married Mrs. Anna B Davis, and soon after went to reside in his native town. Previous to this he sold his Brattleboro residence and traveled a short time.

During his life in Guilford, after his marriage, he was very active in the affairs of the community and also kept up his literary activity.

He was an earnest advocate of the Metric System, and the week before his death delivered a lecture upon that subject which was highly instructive and interesting.

And, not the least among his literary abilities may be counted his art of letter-writing, in which his love of poetry was plainly portrayed, and whether he expressed his thoughts in poetry or prose, he was always at ease.

He had studied law and been admitted to the bar, thus adding another to his long list of accomplishments. He never practiced the profession, although he would doubtless have succeeded admirably in it.

In person, he was a man of commanding presence, nearly six feet in height, with a well developed, powerful frame and dignified bearing.

He was a man of deep religious feeling and strongly attached to his church. Fond of young people, his face framed in snowy beard and hair. with the light of a genial countenance radiating therefrom, will never be effaced from the memory of his friends. He passed away peacefully during the night of February 1st. leaving a wife and infant son to survive him.

The following original lines, written in a friend's album by him apply to his own life.

"Let us reflect though sorely tried,
'Neath cold, intemperate skies,
Yet on drear winter's farther side,
A pleasant summer lies.

A more truthful and eloquent tribute to his memory was never given than that by Col. Hawkin's in the New York Times soon after his death which we give as follows:

"General John W. Phelps whose death was announced in your paper this morning, was one of the most notable officers of the army. He was an accomplished soldier of the highest and best type, a patriotic citizen with an unblemished reputation, a scholar, well versed in mathematics, science, history, several of the dead and four or five of the living languages.

As a soldier, he was all that the best authorities demand, and even more, for it might be said of him that he possessed an inner sense of duty which no written formula could prescribe. It was his faithful care, intelligence and attention to his whole duty as a commanding officer, and above all, his example of indefatigable industry which made his command one of the best disciplined, best drilled and most efficient in the whole army. He was not much of a believer in the extra, unofficial, off-duty dress parade business. Neither was he a martinet. He had the rare, good sense to accept the volunteer army for exactly what it was. He weighed its defects and measured its virtues and governed the performance of his duties accordingly. He knew he could trust its patriotic sense of duty and intelligence to imitate a good example, and its willingness to follow where it could not be driven: and there never was a commanding officer more implicitly obeyed, or more confidently trusted.

It was my good fortune to have been ordered to his command at Newport News, Va. soon after the outbreak of the Rebellion in 1761. When I reported to him with my regiment, I was given to understand that we were engaged in a most serious undertaking, involving as it did the national life, and that we could only hope to overcome our foes by taking advantage of all our resources, (he was the first to urge the organization of negro troops) and moulding our raw material into a well disciplined army; that the accomplishment of the latter was the immediate work in hand; and work he made of it, such as many of us never dreamed of before; but we soon saw the necessity for labor, and the good sense involved in his orders and criticisms, and all worked with a will, officers and men to reward the great industry of a commander who had won our affection and deep respect. We went to him as children go to a school and left him after three months tuition, a thoroughly well disciplined regiment, of whose after record he was justly proud.

To that kind hearted, quaint old man with his perfect sense of justice, the officers and men of my regiment owe a debt of gratitude, which can only be effaced from their memories when the last survivor of that command shall have passed away. This little statement, inadequate as it is, is the tribute I bring to the grave of an honored friend of a quarter of a century: I could not do less; I wish I could do more.—Take him for all in all, I have never known a man so free from the hypocrisies, sins and vices which make humanity despicable, as was John W. Phelps.

RUSH C. HAWKINS.

New York, Feb. 3, 1885.

As indicative of the high order of his poetic genius, we append the two following, "Day" and "Night:—"

DAY.

On such a day as this, so fair and bright,
 All redolent with the breath of violets;
 While the gay, summer cloud revives in the deep,
 Serenity above, and gleefully the wavelet
 Laughs responsive from below;
 While songs of birds and city murmurs
 Blend with music of playful fountains
 And bright sunbeams flash their threads of gold
 Amidst leaves and flowers, and throw o'er all
 A magic gauze, through which nature glances
 Like beauty through her veil—
 On such a day, O God!
 The gladdened soul, like the cloud in ether,
 Swims in the joyous spirit of thy works
 And thanks thee that it lives.

NIGHT.

And now again 'tis night' and such a night!
With her stars all bright,
Like jewelled princess, o'er whose dusky brow

The electric light doth catch and play,
As of emotions deep and tremulous;

Whilst the full rose sips at her dewy breath
And opes the sweets of a swelling heart;
Whilst the moist earth doth teem with quiet joy,

With all the promise of a fruitful year—
Sweet with the perfume of myriad flowers,
Gay with the fairy lanterns fireflies light—
And plaintive with the song of whip-poor will,

When loving hearts for the first time feel
The strange communion of this human life
With the deep-hid mysteries of the stars.

MOONBEAM.

BY JOHN PHELPS, ESQ.

Moonbeam soft from heaven descending
With silver light;

Radiant o'er yon mountain bending
Through shades of night,—
Now rising from the gates of heaven,
By light wing'd zephyrs gently driven,
Floating high o'er silent eve'n,
Clear and bright.

Amidst cerulean stars you glitter,
High in air.

In shades where wanton wood-nymphs titter
You repair:

And in yon glen Narcissa ramble;
On hills of shepherdesses gambol,
Or in her car bright Venus amble,
You sport there.

Fring'd round the curling clouds high riding
With lucid glare,

Swift on aerial pinions gliding,
Soft and fair;

Now over yon proud banners streaming,
Bright on the waves of ocean gleaming,
Through mist and vapor dimly beaming,
You float there.

"A FAREWELL TO VERMONT.

BY MRS. LINCOLN PHELPS.

Land of the Mountains Green, and rugged soil;—

Of cascades wild, of swiftly gliding streams;—
Of darkly waving pines and stately firs;—
Of gloomy ravines and romantic dells;—
Of haunted glens and sweetly smiling dales!
Land of my beauteous, mountain home, farewell!

Yet still I linger;—for, to me, thou art
A land of beauty, picturesque and rich
In native charms;—a land for poets' dreams,
For patriot's visions, and for angel's thought.
Methinks there's inspiration in the breeze
Reflected from yon mountain's pine-clad side,
Breathing aerial music to my soul—
Then dying 'mid the groves with cadence sweet.

* * * * *

There is poetry in science when it leads
To gaze upon the rainbow's glorious arch,
To follow echo to her grottoes wild,
To trace the circling planets in their course,
And watch the bud first bursting into bloom.
Nature, I owe thee much;—if I have felt Aught of the firm resolve, or wish sublime,
'Tis that I drank from thee the heavenly draught,

And gave thy moral image to the world.
And, O, ye venerable oaks! whose shade
Embosoms the dear spot I now must leave, Adieu, ye ancient friends! and may, sometimes,

Thy feathered songsters thrill in pensive notes

Their sorrow for me, gone! for dear to me
Their matin song and vesper-hymn hath been,
Sweet home, adieu! flowers that I've loved to
To tend, watching with care maternal for your bloom;

Others may cull your sweets, enjoy your charms,

May twine my woodbine o'er the trellis neat,
May guide the Lonicera's spiral way,
Or train the pensile Lyclum's graceful stalk.

O, ye have been my pride, ye twining race,
Who have so beautified and cheered my bowers;

And I have fancied as I've seen you climb,
'Twas gratitude that urged your upward way,
And gave luxuriant blossoms for my care.
E'en on the very verge of winter's frost,
Your bloom still lingers, as if fain ye would Cheer nature's gloom, and soothe this parting hour.

My grateful flower, methinks I hear thee ask
Why thus I leave thee to a stranger's care;
Perchance, uncared for, trampled under foot
By the rude hind as valueless and nought,
My honeysuckle sweet, list to my words.
Thou 'rt a dear, docile plant, and pleasant 'tis
To train thee in the way that thou shouldst go
But I must tell thee, there are flowers on earth Created for far purer skies than these.
They are allied to thee in outward form,
Being made of earth and beautified by God
With shape and color, lovely to the eye.
But God to these sweet flowers has given Immortal spirits to survive decay.
In yon fair sylvan land a garden blooms
Of those immortal plants and fitting 'tis That skillful, patient hands should lend their aid

To train them for the ends which God ordains.
As step by step thy upward way I've trained,
So must I guide them in their onward course
Up learning's height, and virtue's rugged way.—

Such labor calls me hence, but yet methinks,
When frost of time shall settle on my brow,
And age ask respite from the cares of life,
Like Noah's wandering dove, my flowers, my birds,

My ancient trees, again I'll come to you.

Here stands my home, above the busy town, Peeping through clustering oaks with columns white

And fair proportions. Quick the eye of taste, Beholding from the bustling street below,
Panses to mark its beauty, and admire
A scene so fair. Ionian portico and verdant lawn,

Piazza, graveled walks, and garden, fair,
All, all, adieu! No stranger shall intrude
Within these halls sacred to studious thought.

Here, the fragment of the poem we have, breaks or ends.]

WILBUR FISK, D. D.

BY REV. ALONZO G. HOUGH*

To the eastern branch of the Methodist Episcopal church the name of Wilbur Fisk will ever be an inspiration and his memory a perpetual benediction. He was born in Guilford, Aug. 31, 1792, of old Puritan stock and joined the church in his eleventh year. In 1809, he went to the Grammar School at Peacham, and in 1814, graduated with honor at the Brown University, Providence, R. I. Being the first Methodist minister of the Eastern states who had the advantages of a collegiate education. From the time of his entering the ministry in 1818, he took a deep interest in ministerial culture. Craftsbury, this state, was his first field of labor. In 1819 and 1820, he was stationed at Charlestown, Mass. and then took charge of the Vermont District as presiding elder. In the third year of his presiding eldership, he was elected as principal of the Wesleyan Academy, Wilbraham, Mass. and in 1830, was called to the presidency of Wesleyans University, Middletown, Ct. of which he was one of the founders. This position made him more than ever a leader in the cause of education in the church. Fisk led the whole Methodism of the East in educational enterprise. Young men from every part of the nation were attracted to the institution by the fame of its president, and under the influence of his character they were moulded for positions of usefulness in the colleges and seminaries which rapidly sprang into being throughout the United States under the patronage of the church.

In 1829, Wilbur Fisk was honored with the degree of D. D. by Brown University, and in the same year he declined the presidency of La Grange College and a professorship in the University of Alabama. He was twice elected to the episcopacy, but declined the office saying "If my health would allow me, to perform the work, I dare not accept, for I believe I can do more for the cause of Christ where I am than I could do as a bishop."

Without great brilliancy of genius, remarkable literary acquisitions, or the very highest order of intellect, but endowed with vigorous and evenly balanced faculties, good sense, quick sagacity, and a thorough devotion to the mission he found himself called to accomplish, Wilbur Fisk was instrumental in giving to Eastern Methodism, through her educational institutions, a position of respect and power, and he rescued the church from the imputation of ignorance which had been cast upon her by the educated clergy of other denominations. When Mr. Fisk entered the ministry there was not a literary institution of any importance under the patronage of the church. His life work marked a new epoch in her history, and his saintly character exemplified the doctrine of perfection which has ever been prominent in her teaching and the right hand of her power, she distinguishing qualities of men like Fenelon, Channing, Edwards and Fletcher of Madeley, not in his nature, giving peculiar grace and charm to his features, which were harmonious, and to his voice which was softly flexible and deep. His manner in the pulpit was marked by dignity, and his eloquence was of the highest order. Dr. Stevens writes its effect: "No imaginative excitement prevailed in the audience as under Max——'s eloquence, no tumultuous wonder as under Bascomb's, none of Cookman's impetuous passion or Olin's overwhelming power; but a subduing, almost tranquil spell, of genial feeling, expressed often by tears or half suppressed ejaculations; something of the deep, but gentle effect of Summerfield combined with a higher intellectual impression.

For many years his life was an incessant struggle with pulmonary disease. He died at Middletown, Feb. 22, 1838.

Among his writings are "The Calvinist Controversy," "Travels in Europe," "Sermons and Lectures on Universalism," "Reply to Pierpoint on the Atonement," and other tracts and sermons.

FAMILY OF ABIJAH PRINCE.

(COLORED.)

Abijah Prince, born in Wallingford, Ct. 1706, a servant of the Rev. Benjamin Doolittle, the first minister of Northfield, Mass. settled in 1718.—After the death of Mr. Doolittle, he was the "servant of Captain Ebenezer Wells of Deerfield. In 1851, he was allotted a share in the undivided lands in Northfield, which from running the state line was in Vernon, Vt. which he sold in 1783. On his marriage he settled on a little stream south of the cemetery and near where the R. R. depot now stands in Deerfield, which still bears his name, "Bijah's Brook." In 1764, he removed to Guilford, Vt. and took possession of a lot, given him by Col. David Field, but soon after returned to Deerfield where he remained several years. He was an original grantee, named in the charter of Sunderland, Vt. and the only one who settled there. He returned to Guilford in his old age where he died, January 19, 1794, Æ 88. The place where he lived and died is still called the "Bijah Lot."

He was familiarly known as "Bijah" and Caesar, his oldest son was baptised by the Rev. Jonathan Ashley as son of "Bijah, negro, and Lucy, his wife."—He was married, May 17, 1756, by Major Elijah Williams to Lucy Terry, "servant to Ebenezer Wells." She was brought from Rhode Island to Enfield, Ct. when 5 years old (date unknown) and said to have been of pure African blood. She was baptised "on her masters' account," June 15, 1735.

Lucy was a noted character and her house was a great place of resort for the young people, attracted thither by her wit and wisdom, often shown in her rhyme and stories. The best cotemporary account of the Bars fight, August 25, 1845, is her poetic one in Holland's History of Massachusetts—Deerfield.

After settling upon the Sutherland grant, the title to the property was contested by Col. Eli Bronson, and the matter finally got into the United States Court. Colonel Bronson employed two leading Vermont lawyers: Gen. Stephen R. Bradley, and Royal Tyler, the wit and poet and afterward Chief Justice of Vermont. Isaac Tichenor, afterward Governor of Vermont, managed the case for Bijah. He drew the pleadings, and Lucy argued the case before the court. Hon Samuel Chase of Maryland, the presiding judge, said Lucy made a better argument than he had ever heard from a lawyer in Vermont. Desiring a liberal education for one of her sons, probably, Festus, she applied at Williams College. He was rejected on account of his race; the indignant mother argued the case in a '3-hours speech' before the trustees, quoting abundantly text after text from the scriptures in support of her claims for his reception. She died in Sunderland at a very advanced age.—Children:

Caesar, b Jan. 14, 1756; came to Guilford in 1776; was admitted to full communion in the Congregational chh. in Guilford; was one of the covenanters in the settlement of the Rev. Henry Williams, January 1779. He removed to Sunderland where he died.

Duruxa, b. June 1, 1758, died insane in Sunderland. Drusella, b Aug. 1860, the 7th, —a poetess, d Nov. 21, 1854.

Festus, b Dec. 12, 1763, a natural musician, could play upon any instrument, he went to New York; d in Dorset, Vt. in 1818.

Tatnai, b Sept. 2, 1765, lived with Capt. E. Hunt, Northfield, Mass.

Abijah, b June 12, 1769, settled near Ballstown, N.Y.

Lucy came every year to visit Abijah's grave as long as long she lived. I regret the date of her death cannot be ascertained; from what I have heard my mother say, Lucy must have been alive in 1809 or 10.

baptism of all the children is found in the Records of the Rev. Jonathan Ash-ey of Deerfield.

LUCY [TENNY] PRINCE'S POETICAL ACCOUNT OF THE FIGHT AT THE BARS IN DEERFIELD.

August 'twas the twenty-fifth,
Seventeen hundred and forty-five,
The Indians did in ambush lay,
Some very valient men to slay;
The names of whom I'll not leave out;
Samuel Allen like a hero foute;
And though he was so brave and bold;
His face no more shall we behold.
Eleazer Hawks was killed outright
Before he had time to fight;
Before he did the Indians see
Was shot! and died immediately.
Oliver Amsden, he was slain,
Which caused his friends much grief and pain.
Simeon Amsden they found dead,
Not many rods from Oliver's head.
Adonijah Gillett we do hear,
Did lose his life that was so dear;
John Sadler fled across the water,
And so escaped this dreadful slaughter.
Eunice Allen see the Indians coming,
Did hope to save herself by running;
And had not her petty-coats stop'd her,
The awful creatures had not catched her.
Nor tommy hawked her on the head
And left her on the field for dead.

Eunice Allen died, March 1828, I recollect having seen her when a boy. She was not scalped as all the old accounts say; was b 1738; was 90 yrs. old.

ELIZABETH PECK,

born in 1780, removed here with her father's family while yet young. They had for neighbors and friends the families of Judge Tyler and the other literary persons of the town. The society of these friends stimulated her native talent; she wrote considerably for her own amusement; but was so diffident about it, it was not known to her friends generally till after her marriage when Judge Tyler seeing a poem of hers, entitled "What is it to be Happy?" had it inserted in a newspaper published at Newfane. It was received so favorably her friends proposed she should collate her pieces, add to them and have a volume published; but surrounded by a large family of children, and her health delicate the project was abandoned. She m. Bethuel Ranger of Colrairie Mass. Apr. 3, 1804; died at 44. yrs.

THE VIOLET.

Sweet Violet, earliest of fair Flora's train,
Why dost thou shun the cultivated plain,
And hide thy beauties in this lonely dell?

Say, why

Thy modest beauties shun the public eye,
And in such solitude delight to dwell?

Sweet harbinger of Spring's delightful reign,
I sought thee in my rambles through the fields,

But ne'er thy béauteous form could find Till lately, in this mossy glen,
I found thee, half concealed;
And midst the leaves confined.

Methinks, I have the modest flower's reply:

It is security, I court,

And therefore from the gay resort;
Of pride and fashion, noise and strife,
And all that can embitter life,

With early speed I fly.

While here from care and danger free,
The friends of Nature visit me;
Delighted with my simple charms,
While with my various sweets,
I deck their green retreats;

Secure from all alarms.

ELIZABETH PECK.

CAPT. JOHN BARNEY, one of the first settlers, came here, 1764, with his wife, Rebekah Martin, from Rrehobath, Ms. They raised 12 children, six sons and six daughters who m. lived in Vermont; the sons, mostly, went; West the youngest, AARON, Brig. Gen. Vt. Militia, Town Cl. justice of the peace, had two sons, Zenas, who went West, and Aaron Chase, who mar. Charlotte, dau. of Lovell Bullock, had 3 sons, 3 daughters; the eldest, Wm. LONDONDERRY.

By MISS NANCY COCHRAN.

LONDONDERRY.

This township is situated in the N. W. corner of Windham county, bounded N. by Landgrove and Weston; E. by Windham; S. by Jamaica, and W. by Winhall and Landgrove.

CHARTERS.

It is the western division of a township granted by New York, Feb. 13, 1770, to Col. James Rogers of Londonderry, N. H., and by him named Kent. The grant was bestowed upon Rogers for services in the French war, and through his influence it was first settled, just before the Revolutionary war. In 1778, Colonel Rogers, who was a torry, fled into Canada and his lands were confiscated. The town was again chartered by the government of Vermont, April 20, 1780, Edward Aiken, Samuel Fletcher and Jonathan Tyler, a committee appointed by the legislature to carry out a resolve passed March 16, 1780, re-granting the town. In this charter the township is called Londonderry, after Londonderry, N. H., from which the first settlers came. The first settlers who came, in 1773, were Col. James Rogers, James Patterson, Samuel Thompson, Edward Aiken, James McCormick and John Woodburn. The last three in the division of the town by the legislature in 1795, fell to the part cut off for Windham, to which history we will leave the history of these three.

—Mrs. L. B. Wood's Windham.

THE FIRST TOWN MEETING.

In March, 1777, we have a record of a regularly organized town meeting:

“Colonel Rogers, moderator.

Deacon Edward Aiken, town clerk.

Town committee: Dea. Edward Aiken, James McCormick, Robert Mack, Capt. Edward Aiken, John Woodburn.

Constables: Hugh Montgomery, Nathaniel Aiken.

Selectmen: James Miller, John Woodburn, Edward Aiken.

Listers: Robert McCormick, Robert Miller.

Committee to fix on a suitable location for a meeting-house: Edward Aiken, David Cochran, Robert Mack.”

The ancestors of our first settlers were Scotch Presbyterians from the North of Ireland, who emigrated to America, 19 families together with their pastor, Rev. James McGregor at their head, in 1738.

A hardy, industrious race, they were thrifty farmers in New Hampshire; their removal to Vermont did not change their habits.

They introduced the culture of the potato and of raising flax. The fresh soil was fertile, producing 30 bushels of wheat, and 40 of rye to the acre; potatoes and corn yielded bountifully; flax flourished on the new burned field; pillow-cases, table-cloths, towels, and all the summer clothing of men and women were made from flax. Almost every family manufactured fine linen for the market.

The homespun woollens comfortably clothed these farmers and their families for winter; and the farmer's daughters ambitious for a nice dress selected out the fleece of long, fine wool which they combed for worsted and spun on the little-wheel, dyed different bright colors and wove in a neat plaid.

SOME ANNOYANCES.

Bears and wolves made havoc among their flocks. Shortly after Dea. Aiken settled at Kent, his wife going out to assist in pulling a field of flax, placed her little children under a tree near the spot where she was at work. Soon a little dog that followed them out, looking up to the tree barked furiously. There was a bear in the tree right over the children. The Deacon's rifle brought bruin down, wounded, not killed; throwing out his great paw, the old forester caught the dog up for the death-grip; but the Deacon, thrusting the muzzle of his gun through the distended jaws of the bear, strangled him off from his dog, when himself and the dog soon dispatched their enemy.

At another time, the Deacon observing tracks in a corn-field before the house, watched at his door in the evening. Soon as dark, there was a drop from the fence, a moment after, the snap of an ear of corn. The Deacon took a line in the direction of the sound, proceeding till two eyes flashed on him. He fired, there was a heavy fall. When the place was examined by light, a large black bear laid dead on the ground.

But wolves were far more destructive; they came out in droves, as if resolved on being paid in mutton for every deer that was picked off by the rifles of the new comers.

Early in the summer of 1777, a band of tories and Indians scoured the eastern shore of Lake Champlain. Some of the inhabitants were scalped in their dwellings; others fled in consternation to older settlements, leaving their cattle to be driven off and houses fired; the battle of Hubbardton followed on the 15th of July.

Shortly after the battle, a rumor reached Kent that a body of 200 tories and Indians were upon the Green mountains and would probably pay them a visit.

What was to be done? There was no fort within reach where they could place their families in safety. They resolved to remain at their homes and trusting in the protection of an Almighty arm, defend as best they might their own firesides or perish in the attempt; and the event proved the wisdom of the decision, for no hostile foe visited this infant settlement.

The next news was, Burgoyne had concentrated his forces at Skenesboro; the whole country was in alarm. The Council of Safety sent dispatches to Massachusetts and New Hampshire for aid, and proceeded forthwith to sell all property belonging to tories, applying the means thus raised to raising a regiment and supplying them with provisions.

Settler James Rogers, a colonel in the Continental army during the French and Indian war, who was known to favor the British, at this crisis visited Canada and his estate was confiscated.

Early in August, General Stark arrived from New Hampshire with 800 men, and all the men who could be spared from Kent joined his regiment, and were in the battle of Bennington.

KENT.

In 1780, the town of Kent was chartered to Edward Aiken, Samuel Fletcher and Joseph Tyler, and at the request of the town was called Londonderry.

At a town-meeting March 21, 1782, the inhabitants voted to raise two men for the ensuing campaign.

"Voted to excuse Sam'l Bayrs, John McCormick and John Mack from paying any part of the bounty in consideration of their having been out themselves in the three years service."

"Voted to hire Jonathan Aiken and James Mack to go into service, to give each of them £7, 10s. bounty and give them for wages 2 pounds per month, to be paid in clearing land for 2 pounds per acre, the land to be made fit for seed by the first of Sept. 1783."

The Continental currency was the money in circulation and a stagnation of business followed injurious to our settlement; but notwithstanding it continued to grow slowly and steadily during the war in population and wealth.

The first saw-mill was at the head of Pond Brook, built by Deacon Edward and Captain Edward Aiken in 1774, and was held many years by Geo. McMurphy and called McMurphy's mill; the first mill, also on West river, was built by Capt. Edward Aiken and owned many years by his son, Jonathan. It stood where Osborne's mill stands.

Col. Rogers built a large, two-story framed house as early as 1776.

DIVISION OF THE TOWNSHIP.

The census of 1790 gives Londonderry 362 inhabitants. Five years later it was divided by line from the north line of Jamaica, running due north along the summit of Glebe Mountain till it strikes the middle branch of Williams river; thence due north to the south line of Andover, giving to the western division, retaining the name of Londonderry, an area of 18,332 square acres.

In the division of the township the largest portion of the settlers fell on the Windham side of the line. Those who remained were, William Cox, Capt. Edward Aiken, David Cochran, James Patterson, Samuel Thompson, Hugh Montgomery, Joseph Oughterson and John Cox.

In 1795, James Rogers petitioned the Legislature for one-half the confiscated lands formerly belonging to his father, which remained unsold. This was granted, and in 1797 he petitioned for the other half, which was granted.

The first settlers of Londonderry, up to the division of the town, appear to have lived in utmost harmony. A law suit was a thing unknown.

SCHOOLS.

Dr. Lazel taught the first school at the houses of David Cochran, Joseph Oughterson and Hugh Montgomery.

Previous to 1810, the town was divided into 5 districts. In 1820, there were 9 districts, 8 school-houses and 450 scholars between 4 and 18 years of age. In 1868, it had 13 districts in which schools were taught 4 to 7 months in a year, and each village, [North Londonderry and South Londonderry] has a large school building or an academy, where a select school is usually taught a part of the year.

A NEW LONDONDERRY.

In a few years after the war new settlers came in from Massachusetts and Rhode Island. The financial state of the country was very much embarrassed. Many were in debt; property could not be sold even on execution, for no one had money to buy. Writs multiplied, the unfortunate was consigned to jail for the crime of being unable to pay his debts.

Some rather than lie in jail mortgaged their farms for a few dollars, and afterwards unable to pay the mortgage were turned out of their homes by creditors.

1800: The habits of the people had undergone a considerable change. A new generation had arisen, some of whom looked upon the rigid Presbyterian regulations as quite puritanical, and change of opinion soon produced change of character.

In 1806 the first settlement was commenced in what is now

SOUTH LONDONDERRY.

Benjamin Baldwin and Levi Richardson from Andover, purchased a mill-site with a few acres of land adjoining; put up a log house with two rooms for their families and commenced building a saw and grist-mill. In a short time both mills were doing a good business.

Five years later Mr. Danforth put in a carding-machine under the same roof. Soon a blacksmith by the name of Knowlton opened a shop, and these buildings formed the nucleus around which the village has grown up.

It has a daily mail, a postoffice, two church edifices, three parsonages, a town house, a large school house, two insurance offices, two dry goods stores, one jeweler's shop, one hotel and about 40 dwelling houses; most of them neat and commodious.

THE VILLAGE OF LONDONDERRY.

Previous to the division of the town in 1795, a saw and grist mill had been built, and Major Jonathan Aiken who built the mill, kept also a tavern. But whether it was because the place lacked that important preliminary, a blacksmith's shop, or from some other cause, it did not flourish much for several years. But since the turnpike was built across the Green Mountains and a line of stages established from Manchester to Chester, it has increased annually in population and in wealth, and is now a flourishing village containing about 40 dwelling houses, a Congregational meeting house, a parsonage, a town hall, a large school-house, a woolen factory, two dry goods stores, a tin and hardware shop, two marble shops, and has four physicians, one lawyer, one minister, a postoffice and daily mail.

Londonderry, like all mountain towns, is hilly; but less so than the surrounding towns. The forests afforded the first settlers a large quantity of pine which they used so lavishly, but little now remains. Hemlock and spruce are still abundant, but the sugar maple is the pride of our forests; affording an ample supply of sugar and syrup of the very best quality.

The soil richly repays the labors of the husbandman.

Almost every farm is watered by springs of running water.

West river which passes through the town from north to south, affords, with the help of its tributaries, many excellent mill-sites.

THE FIRST CHURCH IN TOWN.

Nearly all the first settlers were members of the Presbyterian church of Londonderry, N. H., who looked upon them as a colony and occasionally supplied them with preaching. There was no other church in town for thirty years.

We regret the records of this church are lost. The members have all passed away. All we can say is gathered from the memories of their descendants and the early town records.

On the record of the first regularly organized town meeting, less than four years after the first family arrived, we find a vote to erect a house for public worship. They chose a building committee; selected a building spot and prepared materials; but the Revolutionary war was at its height, and all their available means was called for to help support the army; and before the close of the war the depreciation of the currency, and consequent financial embarrassment put an end to building.

By the time they were able to build, the division of the town began to be agitated, and this again put a stop to the building of a meeting house.

But every passing year records a vote to raise money to pay for preaching, and designates a private house where meetings shall be held.

About 1805, a school house was built at the middle of the town, and some of the church members contributed towards the building that they might have the privilege of holding meetings there on the Sabbath.

About 1809, the church finding it extremely difficult to procure Presbyterian preaching, concluded to adopt the Congregational form of government. Aug. 25, 1809, was organized by Rev. Rufus Cushman of Fairhaven, assisted by Rev. Wm. Hall of Grafton, consisting of 10 members: David Cochran, Mary Corhran, John Cox, Mary Cox, Arrington Gibson, John Cochran, David Cochran, Jr., Betsy Cochran and Lois Hunting.

A CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH

Londonderry being considered missionary ground was supplied from time to time by home missionaries.

and several others labored here; some of them being supported in part by missionary societies, others wholly by the church.

A MEETING HOUSE

was built in 1813, at the middle of the town. They had some preaching every year; and when none, met on the Sabbath; had a sermon read.

David Cochran was chosen deacon soon after the organization and held the office until he moved to Dorset a short time before his death.

Jesse Hunting, Edmund Ingalls and Luther Stowel were chosen deacons in 1819.

REV. PHILETUS CLARK

commenced his labors in this place in 1824 and was installed in 1827.

During his pastorate the church attained its greatest prosperity. It had about 100 communicants. He was dismissed in 1833, and the church remained without a pastor till 1838, when was installed. He was dismissed in 1844.

About this time the church began to decline. The Methodist and Baptist societies erected churches in both villages, and the youth of the congregation preferred going to the village churches. By the advice of Rev. Justin Parsons the church united with the Methodists of South Londonderry and built a union house, each society supplying the pulpit half of the time.

THE SECOND CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH

of Londonderry was organized Aug. 19, 1868, by a council composed of the ministers of ten Congregational churches and nine delegates, Rev. Alfred Stevens of Westminster West, moderator.

The church started with 12 members and during the year 12 more were received.

During the first year the church and society purchased and repaired the meeting house they now occupy and built a parsonage.

THE BAPTIST CHURCH.

BY REV. RICHARD NOTT.

The history of the Baptist church in Londonderry commenced with the organization of the Baptist church in Peru, Oct. 27, 1809, when an ecclesiastical council met at the house of Asahel Graves; after examining certain brethren concerning their views of doctrine, church discipline and practical godliness:

"Voted to answer their request and constitute them a church of Christ."

And Asahel and Lucy Graves, William and Anna Cooledge, Rufus and Isabel Butler, Cyrus and Orpha Staples were constituted members.

The first person received by baptism was Fanny Howard, Dec. 21, 1809. Within a year from that time 31 were received by baptism. The first minister was Elder Gershom Lane, received by letter, Nov. 11, 1810.

In view of the location of the members of this church and a part of the members of the Windham church, a council was called Feb. 20, 1811, at Londonderry, "for the purpose of uniting a part of Windham church and establishing the same to be the first Baptist church in Londonderry. The council unanimously agreed so to do.

The first mentioned clerk was Levi Baldwin, March 9, 1811. At the same time Jesse Baldwin and Abial Richardson were elected deacons.

March 24, 1811, it was voted that: "The church and society give Elder Gershom Lane $52 for preaching with us three-fourths of the time from the first of January last till the first of January next, to be paid in produce or wearing apparel." The records state Elder Lane agreed to accept the above compensation.

Dec. 12, 1812, a subscription of $27 was made by 20 individuals to be paid in produce in one year from date to Elder Thomas Baker for preaching one-fourth of the time.

Nov. 28, 1815, the Weston church was formed, to which Elder Gershom Lane and five others were dismissed from this church.

March 20, 1817, the Centre school house was fixed upon as the stated place for holding meetings. Subsequent to the beginning of 1830, according to vote, meetings were divided between the school house South Londonderry, a part of the time the school house in North Londonderry, and Thompsonburg, until the erection of the brick meeting house in South Londonderry, which was dedicated in June, 1834.

Previous to the year 1845, the following periods were marked by considerable accessions to the church: the falls of 1810 and 1811, the spring of 1813, the fall of 1817, the winter of 1827 and 1828, the summer and fall of 1828, the year of 1832, the winter of 1836 and 1837 and the month of December, 1839.

The following, baptized into the church, have been licensed to preach by this church or other churches:

Rev. Levi Baldwin,
Rev. Bradley S. Thompson,
Rev. Luke Sherwin,
Rev. Russell Wheeler,
Rev. Isaiah C. Carpenter,
Rev. Jacob P. Huntington,
Rev. Charles Coon,
Rev. John S. Goodall,

All except the first and last four were ordained by the church.

Immediately after the reunion in the summer of 1855, a revival followed which resulted in the addition of 22 by baptism.

During 60 years the church, according to its records, has received 351 persons by baptism, of whom 125 have been received within 15 years since the reunion.

October, 1845, as the result of difficulties, the church separated into two bodies, which maintained preaching by themselves most of the time until the early part of 1855. During the separation, few accessions were made to either body. Since the reunion of the two parties in 1855, the history of the church has been one of growth and prosperity and furnishes an impressive commentary upon the words of inspiration: "Behold how good and pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity."

MARTIN H. GODDARD,

was born in Londonderry, February 26, 1844. His education was received at the academy in his native town, and at the Black River academy in Ludlow. In his twenty-third year he entered the office of William H. Walker as a law student, and at the May term of 1869 he was admitted to the bar. Two months later he entered into partnership with Mr. Walker, and the relationship then assumed was continued until 1884, when Mr. Walker was called to the bench.

From that time to the day of his death, Mr. Goddard continued to practice law alone. His professional life has been successful. An untiring worker and an earnest and successful pleader, he had the faculty of seeing everything that in any way might promote the cause of a client, and with intense conviction for the time being, he usually begat in the jury that same conviction.

A life long democrat, he was the nominee of his party in the congressional fight of 1884, and four years later he was a delegate to the democratic national convention at St. Louis. He has also been the party nominee for county senator and State's attorney.

In town affairs he has held many offices. He has been superintendent of schools, lister, grand juror, agent to prosecute and defend suits, and was a justice of the peace at the time of his death.

He was a director of the National Black River bank at Proctorsville and of the Vermont Mutual Fire Insurance company. He was also a trustee of the Black River academy.

Perhaps in no circle will he be more missed than in the Congregational church, of which he was an active member. For many years he has freely given of his time, money and strength to promote its interests.

He was a member of Altimont Lodge, I. O. O. F. Mr. Goddard was twice married. His first wife was the daughter of Ransel Wilder of Ludlow. She died several years ago. Of this marriage one child survives, Henry M. Goddard, a graduate of Middlebury, class of '90, and now a divinity student at Yale. His second wife was Agnes Alinda Henderson, daughter of H. D. Henderson of Salisbury. She, with three small children survive him.

Mr. Goddard will be missed in the town in which he lived so long, as much as any man who could have been called from it by death.

JAMES PATTERSON

was the oldest of the early settlers. He came to Kent about 1774, and brought with him a family, some of whom were young men at the time. He was married in 1739. He settled on the farm now owned by Joseph Stewart, near Glebe Mountain.

He was noted for decision of character and industry; was a prosperous farmer; died in 1787, alone in his field while at work.

He left a widow and children:

Eben, who moved West.

Rachel, who married James Magas of Jamaica.

John, who married Betridge Morrison, and lived and died on the old homestead, leaving a widow and children: Samuel, Mary and John.

SAMUEL TOMPSON came into town about the same time with Mr. Patterson, settled in the same neighborhood and lived there with his numerous family till his death.

CAPT. EDWARD AIKEN

came about 1774 and purchased a tract of land a little north of Derry pond. He was always among the foremost in public improvements.

He left a widow and five children:

Jonathan, who married Nancy McCormick of Windham, who died in a few years, leaving him two sons. He afterwards married Margaret Jamieson of Manchester.

Daniel married Mary Jamieson; had seven children, who were made orphans by the epidemic of 1813, which carried off both parents in a little over a week.

William married Nancy Wither- spoon and had five or six children.

DAVID COCHRAN

was born in Londonderry, N. H., 1751, and came to this place in 1774; married Mary, eldest daughter of Dea. Edward Aiken, and settled on the farm now owned by Thomas Faulkner, where he lived till 1787, when he exchanged land with Nehemiah Howe and came into possession of the farm where Ezra Pierce now lives, where he resided until within a short time of his death. In early life he was active in public business, but at the age of 45 his health failed and he ever after lived a very retired life. He raised a family of six sons and four daughters. The sons, except the youngest, settled on farms given them by their father near the old homestead. But ere many years had passed most of them had emigrated to the West. Deacon Cochran was a man of sound judgment, and great perseverance. He trained up his family with strict regard to religious obligations.

The oldest daughter, Mary, married Arrington Gibson.

Susan married David Richardson.

Betsey married Dr. John Gibson.

Deacon Cochran died at the house of his oldest son in Dorset, in 1831, in his 80th year.

WILLIAM COX

came into town with Colonel Rogers in 1774, and assisted him in clearing his farm, and took land for pay at 2s an acre. He married Sarah McCollop. They are believed to be the first couple married in town.

Mr. Cox was a prudent, industrious man, accumulated a good property, and lived to a ripe old age. He had five sons and three daughters.

JOHN COX,

brother of William, came to town at a very early period. He married Mary, widow of Robert McCormick. They had two sons and two daughters.

Jane, the oldest daughter, died in the insane asylum at Brattleboro. Both sons were subject to fits of insanity.

Nancy married William Stevens and spent her life at the paternal homestead.

JAMES HOPKINS,

from Londonderry, N. H., came here about 1775. His wife was a daughter of Rev. James McGregor, and sister of Mrs. Col. Rogers, a woman of superior mind and cultivated manners. They had six children. They all removed to western New York, except Mary, the wife of Dr. Charles Chandler of Andover, who was much respected and loved by a large circle of friends.

COLLEGE GRADUATES.

Rev. Isaac Cochran, son of Dea. David Cochran, born July 3, 1798, entered Middlebury in 1817. At the end of the term his health failed and he went to North Carolina for a more genial climate. In a year he entered Hamden Sidney college in 1820, and graduated in 1822; studied theology and was licensed by Hanover Presbytery; ordained and installed pastor of the church of Old Concord, Campbell county. He remained there till 1830 or 1831, when he received a call from the church of Buffalo, Pr. Edwards county, where he now is, and but few pastors have lived so harmoniously with the people of their charge for so long a period.

REV. DAVID A. RICHARDSON, son of Dea. David Richardson, born in 1809, early in life united with the Baptists; graduated at Waterville college, Maine, studied theology; was licensed to preach; soon attacked with bronchitis, had to resign preaching; was principal of a classical school at Alton, Ill. several terms; traveled extensively, but consumption conquered.

HON. WILLIAM H. WALKER, son of Ephriam Walker of Londonderry, graduated at Middlebury in 1858; studied law, was admitted to the bar; has been State senator and judge of Probate. He settled in Ludlow.

REV. NEHEMIAH PIERCE, son of Rev. Sem Pierce, graduated at Burlington in 1865. He had been licensed to preach by the Baptist church in Londonderry, and is now pastor of the Baptist church in Coldwater, Mich.

REV. LEROY M. PIERCE

graduated at Middlebury about 1866. He is now a home missionary in the West.

NATHAN BUXTON,

son of Jonathan and Salome (Esten) Buxton, was born in Smithfield, R. I., March 12, 1796. He died January 28, 1891. When about two years old his parents removed to this town, making the journey in January, over the snow on a sled drawn by two yoke of steers. The family were seven days on their journey and had with them besides Nathan, a younger child in its mother's arms. Jonathan Buxton had been here before and selected a home, such as it was, in Thompsonburg, and to that spot he was now bringing his little family.

Across the road from Mr. John Ramsdell's may be seen an old cellar where at that time stood the house of Samuel Thompson. He was the first settler in that region and his house was the only one in that vicinity. It was at this house the Buxtons drove up on a winter's night and rested for a few hours and then proceeded to the spot near by where they were to make their home. At that time the road passed eastward at about right angles from the present road, just in the rear of Mr. Ramsdell's house and bore round by Mr. Stewart's, out by Mr. Huntley's over the hill. On this road, back of what is now Mr. Ramsdell's, was a log hut, old and deserted, with half the roof gone, and to this inhospitable spot the Buxtons wended their way, tied their oxen to a sheltering tree, and made themselves as comfortable as they could for their first night in Londonderry. On the next day Jonathan's brother, who had come with him, started with the team back to Rhode Island. They lived in this house several years, and three children were added to the family, Jason, Philena and Hannah.

The family afterwards moved a short distance to the eastward where Mr. Buxton had bought a house of a Mr. Miller. This house stood on the George James farm, up back toward the mountain from the house now occupied by Mr. James.

Jonathan Buxton lived in this town about 39 years, and then with his wife and two youngest children returned to the old farm in Smithfield. He died 100 years old and his wife at 88. He had nine children who arrived at maturity, five of whom are supposed to be living, viz: John, who lives in Chesterfield, N. H., 82 years old; Daniel, who lives in this town, born May 1, 1811. Cyrus, who lives in Michigan, born March 12, 1816; Selah, who lives in Princeton, Mass., born March 13, 1819, and Philena Thompson of this town, who was born Nov. 1, 1801.

When Nathan was about 18 years old he went to Westmoreland, N. H., where he worked some five years in a tannery. He married Miss Elizabeth Griswold. They soon moved to this town and united with the Baptist church. They had seven children who arrived at maturity and one died young. Their names were Stephen, Charles, Albert, Horace, Mary, Martha and Adeline. Five died in 1863-1865: Horace, aged 18, at Fort Slocum, Washington, D. C., in 1863; Capt. Albert B., killed at the battle of the Wilderness, May 6, 1864; Major Charles B., killed at the battle of Winchester, Sept. 19, 1864. Two daughters died of diphtheria in the winter of 1864. One only is living, Stephen, who a few years ago moved West.

Solon Thompson, father of Walter and Henry, brought up his family in Londonderry. His father's name was Samuel, and his grandfather also named Samuel lived in a house that stood over the old cellar nearly opposite John Ramsdell's house. He was probably the earliest permanent settler of Thompsonburg.

The old cellar on the Glebe side now owned by Collins Griswold was covered by a log house in which Artemus Pierce originally lived. He afterwards built a frame house near it and subsequently moved this down to the site now occupied by Mr. Griswold's house. The old part was burned a few years ago. In this house Mrs. Emery Melendy, a daughter of Artemus Pierce and mother of E. W. and J. W. Melendy, was born. Artemus Pierce was born July 10, 1779, and his wife Hannah Goodrich Oct. 2, 1782. They had nine children. Two of the earliest of the settlers of this town bore the name of McMurphy and Montgomery. The former erected the first log house in town upon lands now owned and occupied by E. A. Brooks; the latter on the farm now owned and occupied by H. H. Collins. But little can now be learned of McMurphy; he began his work in 1769, but how long he remained or to whom his farm descended is not known. It came into the hands of Ebenezer Smith who in the course of time built a frame house in place of the log hut. This frame house stood on the present site of Mr. Brooks' stable. There was a basement story in which the first school in town was kept.

Ebenezer Smith came from Reading, Mass., where he had been a member of the Baptist church, and this circumstance many account for the fact that Rev. Gershom Lane, who was pastor of the Baptist church in this place, lived in this house for a season and Mr. Smith boarded with him. Mr. Lane's family consisted of himself, wife and an adopted daughter.

When Mr. Smith died Avery Stowell was appointed administrator of the estate, and he sold the property to Washington Brooks who had come from Hancock, N. H. Washington Brooks' father had nineteen children. There is one sister still living in Michigan, one brother living in Hancock, N. H., and one, the oldest, John Brooks, living near Hudson, Mich., who will be 105 years old on the 18th of June, 1891. When he was 100 years old the children of the town where he lived made a great celebration at which the venerable man made a little speech in which he said that he "had never used tobacco, drank intoxicating liquors or taken the name of God in vain." Washington Brooks died Jan. 23, 1887, aged 82 years, respected and beloved by all who knew him.

JOHN P. MARTIN

graduated at the Medical College at Burlington in 1866, and is now practicing at Danby.

THE ARNOLD FAMILY.

SAMUEL ARNOLD

from Norton, Mass., came into town about 1779. He had married Nancy Wheeler whose fine social abilities made her home the centre of attraction in the town. Soon after the division of the town, he was representative, which office he held many years. He was town clerk, select-man, and justice of the peace up to the time of his death.

Londonderry is much indebted to him for roads and bridges, for the turnpike across the Green Mountains, and for the fine road from Londonderry to Chester.

He was ever ready to sympathize with and assist the afflicted; his kindness to the widows and orphans, made such by the epidemic of 1813, was remembered with tears of gratitude long after his death.

He died suddenly, May 23, 1839, aged 73. He left a widow, 3 sons and 8 daughters.

SAMUEL ARNOLD, JR.,

the oldest son of Samuel Arnold, Sr., after living some years and engaging in public business in his native town, removed to Western New York and died in 1868.

DR. JEREMIAH ARNOLD

lives in the North Village and is a botanic physician; he has a considerable family, and a very pleasant home, the old homestead.

HON. DAVID ARNOLD,

the third son of Samuel, Sr., lives in the same village. He is a lawyer and is largely engaged in mercantile business.

DR. GEORGE J. ARNOLD,

the oldest son of David and Lydia Arnold, graduated from the Medical College of Cambridge University in 1858. Gentlemanly deportment and medical skill have already given him a high standing with the physicians of Boston.

Lucy C. m. J. Washburn Melendy Nov. 26, 1868. C. Emery Arnold b. June 7, 1874.

Mary E. m. Geo. C. Robinson May 29, 1870. C. Curtis G. b. July 26, 1873. Mary E. b. Sept. 23, 1878.

Judge Arnold and his wife are dead. Mrs. Melendy and Mrs. Robinson are the only members of the family now living in town.

Mrs. Nancy Arnold, the widow of Samuel, Sr., died in 1867 at the age of 95 years, much respected and beloved.

[We remember this nice, old lady. In 185- the winter before Judge Arnold moved to the Village we taught the winter school in his district and boarded with the Judge's family, teaching Latin and French in the evening to the two oldest boys and the oldest daughter, a girl of fine scholastic brain that in her studies then almost rivaled her oldest brothers.]

Mrs. Lydia Arnold was a Dudley, one of the large family of sisters, all brilliantly social, daughters of Peter Dudley of Peru. Mrs. Nancy Arnold was mother of the Judge, and we remember her knowledge and love of Greek mythology. She delighted to converse on this subject and could give the genealogy of the gods from Jupiter to wood-nymph and maid. The schools, 5½ days a week, 5 night sessions, growth not retarded. George and Charles Arnold read the first book of Virgil's Iliad, declaimed at examination a Latin oration from Cicero. We taught at the village the next summer, academy building, 73 pupils; these schools have cast for us a soft halo over Londonderry. Over 100 of its youth were once our pupils.

MISS NANCY COCHRAN,

author of this early history, died at Londonderry, not long since. She was a daughter of Deacon David Cochran, a most worthy person. Of all the daughters of Londonderry, none have left her a better benefaction.

REV. WILLIAM H. RUGG, A. M.,

oldest son of Dea. Wm. W. and Rachel D. Rugg, born in South Londonderry, April 9, 1838, united with the Baptist church in South Londonderry, Aug. 19, 1855, during the pastorate of Rev. I. C. Carpenter; commenced teaching mathematics in West River academy at sixteen; from the fall term of 1857 to 1864 assistant nine terms in Leland & Gray Seminary; fall terms of 1859 and '69 in Brandon Seminary as assistant; principal of Leland & Gray Seminary spring term of '65; was solicited to continue as principal; declined for the purpose of entering the ministry; graduated from the collegiate department of Madison University, August, 1862; from its Theological department in 1865; commenced preaching in the Baptist church in Shaftsbury, September, 1865; ordained pastor, May 30, 1866. At present, summer of '69, is town superintendent of common schools, corresponding secretary of Bennington County Sunday School Union, clerk of the Vermont and Shaftsbury Association and assistant clerk and member of the board of trustees of the Vermont Baptist State convention.

POST OFFICE.

The first post-office in town was located on Arnold hill, about one mile west of the village, and was established in March 25, 1823, with Samuel P. Arnold, postmaster.

Since that time the following persons have held the office, the date of their commissions being given:

Luther Stowell, Aug. 10, 1825.
 David C. Stowell, Dec. 11, 1828.
 Sylvester W. Sheldon, May 14, '33.
 Alexander Leland, April 20, '36.
 Peter Dudley, May 10, '42.
 Orrin Curtis, Dec. 7, '48.
 Luther Stowell, Sept. 4, '49.
 Jonathan R. Wyman, May 23, '50.
 Nathaniel Curtis, Sept. 26, '51.
 Josiah Stowell, Mar. 1, '52.
 Niles Aldrich, Dec. 17, '52.
 Barnet S. Wait, Oct. 11, '53.
 Henry A. Howe, Sept. 27, '54.
 Isaac W. Gibson, May 19, '55.
 Chas. F. Newell, Dec. 18, '55.
 Thomas Lyman, Dec. 24, '56.
 Albert S. Hayward, Dec. 31, '59.
 David Arnold, Oct. 18, '61.
 Fred M. Leonard, Mar. 8, '81.
 Alonzo A. Curtis, June 2, '83.
 Will A. Childs, Sept. 11, '89.

The postoffice at the south village was established Sept. 20, 1852, with Hiram Porter as postmaster. Since that time the following have held the office:

Frederick W. Marsh, Aug. 30, '53.
 John L. Pierce, Aug. 31, '61.
 Seth L. Randall, Mar. 23, '68.
 Geo. G. Smith, Dec. 14, '69.
 Frank M. Wood, Aug. 27, '85.
 Henry W. Goddard, Jan. 9, '86.
 Henry P. Chase, May 16, '89.

Mr. Porter, who now resides in Hinsdale, N. H., kept the office in the room now occupied by the town clerk. Mr. Porter only held the office about one year. Mr. Marsh, now of Chester, removed the office to the store of Pierce & Marsh on the site of the present office. Mr. Pierce, now of Fitchburg, and who succeeded Mr. Marsh, continued the office in this store till about the close of the war when he removed it to his residence, the brick house, where it remained till he resigned. Mr. Randall removed the office to the store again. When Mr. Smith succeeded to the office, he removed it to his present store where he kept it for 16 years. Mr. Wood was appointed and continued the office in this location till Mr. Goddard removed it to the Chase store, where it remains to-day under Mr. Chase.

BEAR STORY.

Some 68 years ago a man by the name of David Hazen, had a fearful encounter with a bear which resulted in the loss of one arm, and must have been the cause of a terrible death to Mr. Hazen, but for the timely assistance of his son David, a lad of but twelve years. The bear had Mr. Hazen on his back, with one hand and a portion of the arm in his mouth, when the father's cry of "come quick David" brought the son to his assistance just in time to save his life. Nahum Goddard, grandfather of the late M. H. Goddard of Ludlow, soon appeared on the scene, but the bear had received his death wound from young David. This incident occurred in what is now the sugar orchard owned by Harry Pierce, near the foot of the mountain in the east part of the town.

THE HISTORY
OF Windham of Windham County.
BY MRS. LUCY B. WOOD.

WINDHAM.

WINDHAM IN LONDONDERRY.

The town of Londonderry which then embraced Windham was chartered by the State of New York, Feb. 13, 1770, and to this town belongs the history of Windham while included in said town.

The first settlers came to Londonderry in 1773, James Rogers, James Patterson, Samuel Thompson, Edward Aiken, James McCormick, and John Woodburn. The three last named were the first settlers of Windham. They purchased their lands for three or four English shillings per acre.

In the north part of the town, 1773, Edward Aiken commenced clearing his farm with the help of a hired man. In August, he was taken sick in his shanty; nine miles from his nearest neighbor. "He found the means of informing his wife at Loudonderry, N. H. She getting upon her horse with her youngest child in her arms sought and found her husband's sick-bed;—through an almost trackless wilderness of a hundred miles; the last eight of which were followed by marked trees.

She brought with her health and strength, and after a few weeks, her husband regained his health, and she returned to her family in the same way that she came." In the character of Mrs. Aiken we discover all the traits which so conspicuously shine in a noble hearted, firm-minded woman; courage and perseverance to surmount the difficult obstacles in the way of duty, prompted by conjugal affection and maternal love.

Mr. Aiken remained on his farm to clear of the chopping, sow the grain and drag it in. On the first of November, this was all accomplished, except the dragging in which they purposed to do the next day; but the next morning, eight inches of snow covered the ground. The hired man was dismissed, the oxen were taken to their winter quarters, the pack strapped to the Deacon's shoulders, and he returned through slush and snow, once more to his old home in New Hampshire.

Early, the next spring, he returned to Vermont accompanied by his son, Peter, and his daughter, Naomi, they arrived at his settlement the day that Peter was ten years old. His sister was nearly twelve. They found the shanty safe; the unharrowed grain, growing finely; and having hired a man to work alternate weeks through the season (the other half of the time the man worked for Mr. Utley, ten or twelve miles distant,) he left these two children in this vast wilderness to be gone six weeks to Londonderry, N. H. At the expiration of this time, he returned with his own and several other families; and Windham, then Londonderry, was permanently settled. Mr. Aiken built a log house a little north of where the house now owned by Widow Aiken stands, and afterwards a framed one on the same premises. Soon after they came here, Mr. Aiken and a relative of the same name, built a saw-mill near Derry pond. They sawed the lumber for two houses; one for each. A fire broke out near by and destroyed the mill and the lumber, and the erection of their houses was retarded.

Col. James Rogers and Edward Aiken were members of that memorable Convention which met at Dorset Sep. 25, 1776:—The birthday of Vermont.

Edward Aiken was the first representative from this town, and a member of the first legislature, which assembled, Mar. 12, 1778. He represented the town from this year to 1795, except one year when John Burnap was representative.

In 1795, James Rogers, Jr. petitioned to the legislature to grant him one half the land in the town, which remained unsold. His petition was granted. The next year, he petitioned for the other half alledging, that if it was right for him to have one half, it was right that he should have the whole. This petition, also, was granted.

In this year, a petition was presented to the legislature to divide the town of Londonderry. Oct. 22, 1795, an act passed the legislature incorporating the east part of Londonderry and Mack's Leg into a new town called

WINDHAM.

It took its name from Windham, N. H. which was taken from Londonderry N. H. 1742. And the name of Windham, N. H. was taken from one of that name similarly situated in relation to Londonderry in Ireland. The inhabitants were called Scotch Irish and claimed they were possessors of the better qualities of both the Scotch and the Irish.

The records of the town from its first settlement to 1793, are nearly all lost. It is recorded that Robert McCormick was town clerk, Rufus Thayer, constable, Peter Aiken, James Mack and Abial Whitmen were selectmen. Mr. Deming says in his Appendix of Vermont Officers, "It is not supposed that these were the first officers appointed, but that the early records have gone a journey and have forgotten to return."

Windham is bounded N. by Andover, E. by Grafton, S. E. by Townshend, S. and S. W. by Jamaica and W. by Londonderry.

The town is uneven; the water is pure and the soil is better adapted to grazing than to raising grain. When the land was first cleared, wheat and rye were raised in abundance; but neither has been profitable for many years.

The trees of the forest are much the same as in neighboring towns; pine timber not plenty, but the spruce abundant. The sugar maple so much prized for making sugar is more used for shade than any other tree.

The inhabitants are very industrious and frugal. There are very few who are wealthy, and not many who are very poor: They have, generally, enough to be comfortable, and something to spare for the support of public institutions. There are a few mechanics, but we live mostly by farming.

The people of this town have always given much attention to the means of education.

COMMON SCHOOLS

were established very early in every neighborhood. Before the inhabitants were able to build good school-houses, their summer schools were kept in barns. When the haying season commenced, they either had a vacation a few weeks, or moved the school into the empty stable, which they converted into a school-room. They fitted up for the winter school some old log-house, or spared a room in some dwelling-house.

The first school in the Centre District was kept by MISS PATTY ELLINGWOOD.

It was a summer school and it was kept in a log-house.

The first schoolmaster of Windham was

AMOS EMORY,

who kept the first winter school in town. (date unknown.)

The most of our teachers, who have not completed their education at the common school have preferred high schools or academies to a boarding school. We have very few who have received regular instruction and taken diplomas.

RELIGIOUS INSTRUCTION.

Before coming to this wilderness, the first settlers had been a church-going people and felt the importance of religious instruction. Having no stated preaching, or house to meet in, they occasionally hired a minister a few sabbaths and held their meetings in Judge Aiken's barn, which was near the centre of the town. I distinctly remember of hearing Rev. Mr. Carlton preach, when I was a child, and seeing women with heavy silk dresses and long trains such as were worn in the last century come in over the rough barn floor making a sound like distant rain.

In the south part of the town and corner of Jamaica, Elder Combs, a Baptist minister, preached occasionally, and, I have heard my father speak of having heard Elder Stoddard, a Baptist Elder, preach after he came to Vermont.

Those who lived too far from meeting to walk, used to ride on horse-back. It has been facetiously said that a man on a horse with a grandchild in his arms and his son or daughter on the horse behind him, imposed the burden of three generations upon one horse.

Thomas Jefferson married a rich widow; after the ceremony, his wife mounted the horse behind him and rode to his residence. It was the general and fashionable way of riding then. Pillions, fastened to the back part of the saddle were much used and very easy to ride upon.

With the hope of obtaining such a division of this town and other towns, adjoining as to bring the north part of Windham the centre of one town and the south part, the centre of another town, the inhabitants at the north part raised a subscription in 1799, to build a meeting-house. It was raised in the summer of 1801, in the north part of the town, between the settlements of Mr. E. Aiken and Mr. J. Woodburn.

The house was 54 ft. by 22; posts, height, 25 ft. It was inclosed, but never finished.

It is said that workmen were hired for 4 s. per day. I suppose it meant carpenters. Not succeeding in the anticipated division of the town, the next year, 1802, the meeting-house was erected at the Middle of the Town.

In this house there were, originally, 25 proprietors. One poor man, who could hardly support his family, subscribed $15. He made salts in the woods and carried them to Townshend (we had no trader in town then) to pay his subscription.

Within a year from this time, meetings were held in this house. A carpenter's bench was used for a stand, and rough boards for seats.

The first sermon delivered here was by Rev. William Hall of Grafton. In 1825, the house was finished at an expense of $1000, and the next year was painted white, cost $228.

Rev. Philetus Clark preached the dedication sermon. The pews were sold at auction, and Major Aiken and Captain Stearns bid off the two highest pews at $50, each.

To show the price then of produce and labor, I will here copy the

"DIRECTIONS TO THE COMMITTEE at a school-meeting, 1798: To hire a Mistress at 3 s. per week and pay her in salts at 20 s. per hundred, or butter at 9 d. per pound, or wheat at 3 s. 3 d. per bushel, or rye at 4 s. per bushel, or corn at 3 s. per bushel."

From this time the circumstances and manner of doing business changed very rapidly. In 1807, the writer of this sketch commenced teaching school.

One dollar a week was the common price, and nothing said about any other pay but money. Previous, it was so difficult to turn country produce into money that in almost all matters of trade of any amount where notes were given they were to be paid in neat stock. For small articles at the store, butter, flax and tow cloth were received in exchange. For many years wool has been a great article of trade.

THE TRADERS

in the South part of the town, as near as I can remember, have been: Ware Aldrich, Francis, Sawyer, Cobb, Huntington, Jones, Phillips, Burton, Pierce and J. E. Whipple, who is the present trader. (1868)

Some years since, Thomas Evans had a store by the grist-mill, about a mile south from the Middle of the Town. In the West part of the Town, Ebenezer Stowell had a store.

The store-keepers, I recollect in the North part of the Town were: Wilkins, Cheney, Fitch, Goodrich, and Barrett in the Middle of the Town.

William Harris, and William Harris, Jun. are the present, [1868] firm of traders at the Middle of the Town.

THE BAPTIST CHURCH

was organized, Jan. 12, 1807. October 20th the same year, Thomas Baker was ordained their pastor and remained with them about 10 years. Their meeting-house, of brick, in the South part of the Town, was built in 1825.

This church has since Mr. Baker, been served by the following pastors

METHODISTS.

The Methodists have never had a house of public worship in town; but have held their meetings in private dwellings and in school-houses. I can find no records of their church.

CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH.

In a town-meeting holden, April 12, 1797, the town voted to lease out the ministerial land by a desirable lease "while wood grows and water runs." Also to raise four cents a pound on the polls and ratable estate, to hire preaching the ensuing year, to be assessed on the invoice of 1797.

"Voted that Dea. John Woodburn, Nehemiah Pierce and John Burnap be a committee to procure a candidate.

We find no church record from this time until 1805, when the Congregational church was organized. After its organization, before Mr. Lawton was settled, Mr. Field, a licentiate, who afterwards became a lawyer, preached in the Congregational house.

Mr. Gaius Conant was another, and Rev. Phineas Randall, neither of whom was willing to settle over so small a congregation.

JOHN LAWTON

of Barnard was ordained over this church, Oct. 4, 1809, The ordination sermon was preached by the Rev. Mr. Preston of Rupert.

When the church was organized, Edward Aiken, John Burnap, Jonathan Brintnall, John Aiken, Anna Aiken, and Nabby Burnap were the first members.

Candace Burnap was soon after admitted by letter from the church in Royalston, Mass. Under the preaching of Mr. Randall there were a number that obtained a hope and united with the church.

Mr. Randall was dismissed, November 1819. He remained with us ten years which entitled him to the parsonage.

[REV.] SELAH R. ARMS was ordained, January 1825; was dismissed in June 1834; returned in January 1836; dismissed, lastly, in 1849.

[REV.] NATHANIEL PINE

commenced his ministerial labors here and occupied the year between the two ministrations of Rev. Mr. Arms.

[REV.] REUBEN HATCH commenced preaching in Windham in May 1849; ordained, January 1850; dismissed, September 1851.

[REV.] ROYAL PARKINSON began to preach in Windham, March 1852; remained the pastor 2 years.

[REV.] GEORGES. KEMP

was ordained, February 1856; dismissed, April 1860.

[REV.] STEPHEN HARRIS,

ordained in October 1861, remained 8 years.

OUR REPRESENTATIVES.THE AIKENS.

In 1797, James Aiken was appointed justice of the peace; and the next year, John Aiken, town clerk and justice of the peace, which offices he held for 20 years.

James Aiken was appointed County Judge, 1808. The next year his brother, John succeeded him and held the office 5 years.

John and James Aiken were sons of Deacon Edward Aiken. the former married Miss Gregg of Londonderry, a very worthy woman and a fine singer. They lived at the Centre of the Town. The several families of Aikens, Woodburns, Macks and Persons with their descendants and others where there were only one or two in the family who could sing, made our social meetings much more interesting than they otherwise would have been.

John Aiken was our first representative and represented the town 8 years. He removed with his family more than twenty years since to Pennsylvania where he died.

James Aiken married a girl in Putney and moved to Boston; is now dead.

LUTHER STOWELL

represented the town in 1814, and '15. He came from Guilford to Windham in 1800.

AMOS EMORY

next represented the town the three following years: 1815, '16, '17 and was appointed justice of the peace. He came from Dublin, N. H. about the first of the century. Mr. E. again represented the town in 1826, '27.

BENJAMIN PIERCE

represented the town the next 6 years, and was appointed justice of the peace. He settled in this town in 1782, from Westmoreland, N. H. His settlement was in the southeast part of the town. Abial Whitman came about the same time and settled near him. Mr. Pierce also represented the town three years after the next representative.

DANIEL COBB

represented the town in 1828, '29, '30. He lived in the south part of the town. He was the son of Col. Dan'l Cobb, who came to this town from Westmorland, N. H. about 1790. He and his brother, David, settled on a rise of ground in the west part of the town which was familiarly known as Cobb Hill. He had many poor men settled around him. He had a plenty and used to assist them. His wife, also, was benevolent and helped those who were needy.—The Colonel was noted for agility and muscular strength.

TIMOTHY SHERWIN

from Chelmsford, Mass. had a large and respectable family. He located N. E. from the Middle of the Town. The most of his children died in early life with consumption. He represented the town two years and died soon afterwards.

HARVEY BURNAP

lived in the west part of the town, the son of Thomas Burnap who moved from Brookfield, Mass. the first of the century, and lived near his brother, John, about 2 miles south of the Centre. He represented the town one year and afterwards removed to Townshend.

LEVI KIMBALL

represented the town two or three years. He lived in the East part of the town.

His father, Capt M. Kimball, originated from Massachusetts and was an early settler. The family are celebrated for their musical talent. The representative who was known as Colonel Kimball, was several years chorister in the choir. Several years since, he moved to Westminster where he and his wife both died.

JASON D. JONES, who represented the town 5 years. He was a kinsman of Richard Kelley, who moved from Dummerston to the Centre in 1801. In 1805, he was chose a justice of the peace and held the office 29 years, until he became blind. In 1818, he was chosen town clerk and served till 1829. He was a natural poet and used to amuse himself after he was blind by writing acrostics and rhymes. He wrote the history of his life in verse after he was blind. He died in February 1849.

LYMAN COBB,

brother of Daniel Cobb, was representative one year.

SIMEON PIERCE,

brother of Benjamin Pierce, was representative two years.

Of those that have represented the town since 1830, I have no record, I remember them all, but may not get them probably in close order.

DAVID P. ROBBINS

who lives in the south part of Windham representd the town 2 years. His father came from Guilford, here, in 1800.

CLARK STEARNS

represented the town 2 years. His father, Capt. James Stearns, lived in the East part of the town; came from Warwick, Mass. and was one of the first selectmen.

STEPHEN HARRIS.

Rev. Stephen Harris, the Congregational minister represented the town two years.

ASAHEL UPHAM,

in 1868, represented the town, one year. He is the son of Jonathan Upham who lives in the West part of the town. His father was one of the first settlers.

WILLIAM HARRIS,

born in Brattleboro, Nov. 8, 1797; moved to Windham in 1823; and was town clerk and treasurer 23 years; justice of the peace 40 years; assistant-judge of the County court 5 years, represented the town 6 years; was member of the State senate two years and is now, [1868,] president of the West River National Bank.

WILLIAM HARRIS, Jr.

son of Judge William Harris, has represented the town 5 years, and been State senator 4 years; and for nearly 20 years, has been first selectman, and overseer of the poor.

HOLLIS STOWELL

who lives a little south of the Centre, was representative 2 years.

POSTMASTERS:

JOHN AIKEN was the first postmaster in town, and the second was

DAVID WOODBURN, son of John Woodburn, the first settler in town. David Woodburn removed to Underhill in the north part of the State, and died there.

LEMUEL ABBOTT,
the third postmaster, was the son of Lemuel Abbott, Sen. one of the first settlers, and came from Lyndsboro, N. H. in 1796.

WILLIAM HARRIS.
succeeded Mr. Abbott as postmaster at Windham, and

NORMAN W. WOOD succeeded Postmaster Harris in the postoffice.

HENRY JONES,
son of Jason D. Jones, was our next postmaster and next to the last,

GEORGE SPAFFORD,
who is the present postmaster at the Centre of the town.

David Woodburn and Lemuel Abbott lived so far from the Centre of the town they were obliged to have an assistant. Joseph Wood was their assistant several years. Afterwards, Zenas H. Upham was assistant postmaster.

In 1852, N. W. Wood was appointed and kept the office with the exception of a few months, until he moved to Chester in 1862. Dr. Dutton accepted the office for a few months, and after his death it was returned to N. W. Wood.

George Davis is the postmaster in North Windham, and Asa Smith in South Windham, at the present time.

THE JUSTICES OF THE PEACE not before mentioned are Samuel Goddard, who came from Orange, Massachusetts in the early part of the present century.

John Woodburn, son of John Woodburn, Sen.

DR. GEORGE SPAFFORD

was born in Weathersfield. He studied in Albany, N. Y. commenced practice in Windham in 1860; received a commission as surgeon of the 16th Reg. Vt. Vols. in the fall of 1862; discharged at Brattleboro in the fall of 1863.

TIMOTHY BURTON, M. D.

son of Timothy Burton and grandson of Benjamin Pierce, is now a practicing physician in New York, Iowa.

WARREN FAY, M. D.

son of Reuben, an early settler in the North part of the town, is now, (1868] a practicing physician in Pavillion, N. Y.

LAWYERS: We have never had a resident lawyer in town.

Clark H. Chapman, a native of this town— [See paper after this record of Windham, from Mr. Chapman.]

Eliza Chapman, his sister, a native of Windham, is the wife of Frederick C. Robbins, Atty. at law, Ludlow.

AZRO EMORY

of Missouri, a son of Amos Emory, and Jerome Pierce, educated at Antioch, Ohio is attorney at law in Springfield, this State.

WELLS A. BEMIS, educated at Oberlin, O. son of Aaron Bemis of this town; his location is not known.

EDUCATIONAL

Of those who have received a collegiate education, Samuel C. Aiken son of Nathaniel and grandson of the first settler, Edward. His mother was Betsy Clark of Londonderry, N. H. She had one brother and three sisters in Boston with whom she spent most of her time. Her son furnished me with the following Revolutionary anecdote:

When the British took possession of the town of Boston none of the inhabitants were allowed to leave the town. By some means, however, his mother escaped and went directly to the American army, stationed in Cambridge, under General Washington. The General inquired of her about the state of things in Boston, and then asked her where she was going. She told him to Londonderry. He told her she was young and it was dangerous for her to go alone and unprotected and he gave her an escort. He said he mentioned this to show Washington was not only a great general, but a real gentleman, and would condescend to provide for an unprotected woman in the midst of urgent business.

SAMUEL CLARK AIKEN

graduated at Middlebury College in 1814 and immediately went to Andover Theological Seminary for 3 years. He was settled in Utica, N. Y. and remained about 20 years, and then went to Cleavland, Ohio, where he has now lived 30 years; but his health has failed so that he has not preached for several years. He is considered an eminently pious man. His personal appearance is august and venerable, and disposition mild and aimable. In the prime of life, he had a brilliant imagination, and a well-cultivated mind. His voice was musical and his gestures were impressive. His younger brother, graduated the next year after him, at Middlebury. I can not better describe him than by an obituary notice of his death:

EDWARD AIKEN,

"Died at Tallehasse, Florida, Bro. Edward Aiken, aged 35. At the age of 19, he graduated * * * * while at college he made a profession of religion. After residing a few years in Virginia and the State of New York, and suitable preparation, he entered upon the practice of his profession in Utica, N. Y. * * A pulmonary attack compelled him to resort to a milder climate. He visited the Island of Cuba and after some months there, returned to his native land with health much improved, but fearing to encounter the vigor of a Northern winter, he removed to Tallehasse, Fl. where he married and a year after died in the sweet consolations of the gospel.

Possessed of a disposition uncommonly even and aimable; and from a child, he seldom failed to secure the confidence and love of all who knew him. He was a little reserved, at the same time affectionate and affable. As a physician he was kind, attentive, judicious; as a Christian, he was exemplary and uniform.

LUKE BOWEN

of Putney; but had been a resident of Windham several years before he entered college. While at Middlebury, where he graduated in 1816, he made a profession of religion and prepared for the ministry. After he was licensed to preach, he left this region, and nothing more is known of him.

HENRY L. AIKEN

graduated at Middlebury in 1821. His father, Peter Aiken, lived with his parents until their death. In 1796, he married Betsy Goodhue only daughter of Rev. Josiah Goodhue of Putney: as a mother and a Christian, she had few equals, and still less superiors. She had 6 children, all believing in Christ.

Her oldest daughter married Silas Barrett. She had 5 children; two are now living in Louisiana. Her son,

HENRY LOCKE AIKEN,

in 1840, married Emily L. Robins of Jamaica: children, Edward, Henry, Ellen K. They reside in Saratoga, N. Y. Her son, married Caroline Bliss. He owned the old Aiken farm and occupied it till his death, and left it after his wife's death to be equally divided to the A. B. C. F. M. and the Home Missionary Society.

EDWARD RODNEY AIKEN,

Her daughter,

MARGARET LAURA AIKEN,

joined the Choctaw Mission in 1853, and spent the rest of her life there. She gave the most of her property to that mission, and her remains rest in Choctaw soil.

Her daughter, Mary Ann, married William Arms and has lived in various places in Wisconsin and Illinois. She has had 4 children. Josiah, the youngest, married Emma Parker of Putney. They had 6 children. After living some time in Putney, Mr. Arms removed to Wisconsin where he died.—I am indebted to H. L. Aiken for the history of the Aiken family, and many facts relating to the first settlement of the town.

Mary Gibson and Margaret Aiken, daughters of Nathaniel, died in 1853. They were members of the Congregational church many years, of whom it may be said "Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord."

Calvin Aiken died in 1841.

Jesse " " " 1860.

Jesse had one daughter married to Darius Williams of Chester.

David Aiken, the only survivor in this family, has one son, William L. who lives in Grafton, and 4 daughters, Mrs. Hines, Mrs. Heald, Mrs. Sawyer, Mrs. Edson,—very interesting women; the worthy descendants of the pioneer George. A younger brother, died in Blakely, Ga. in 1853, where he had practiced medicine awhile, though when he left home it was more for his health than any other object.

GEORGE C. AIKEN,

THE AUTUMN DAYS.

BY G. C. AIKEN.

They are coming, they are coming, the sweet autumn days,
And around me October's pure, mellow light plays,
And I feel as I walk in these still twilight hours,
How they sleep in their graves, summer's gentle, young flowers.
The birch tree is donning its modest tint veil,
And the elm tree stands stately with aspect so pale,

And the white maple glimmers the wood-thicket through.

In its deep dyes of crimson and rich purple hue.

The dry husk is shrunk on the bright, yellow corn,

And the bee winds but faintly her soft mellow horn;

And I know by the haze light that over me-plays,

They are coming, they are coming, pale autumn days.

THE BURNAP FAMILY.

In 1788 or 9, John and Uriah Burnap, natives of Sutton, Mass. purchased a farm in the corner of Jamaica that joins Windham, and built a log-house upon it. In 1790, John married Candace Bliss of Royalston, Mass and in 1792, moved upon a farm which is now about two miles south of the Centre of Windham, and was the first one buried in the burying-ground near the Centre of the town. Of 12 children of John Burnap, eight lived to mature years.

[REV.] JOHN BURNAP.

John, the oldest son of John Burnap, graduated at Middlebury College in 1819, studied theology at Andover 3 years, was licenced to preach; took an agency to collect funds for the Foreign Missionary Society; visited a portion of the Southern States and so overtaxed his mental and physical powers that it brought on fever and derangement from which he never fully recovered

[REV.] UZZIAH C. BURNAP, second son of John Burnap, Sr. graduated at Middlebury in 1821; studied theology with Rev. Joshua Bates President of Middlebury College; was ordained pastor over the Congregational church in Chester in 1824, and continued there until 1837; was pastor of the Appleton church in Lowell, Mass. from 1837 to 1852. He died in Lowell in 1854, aged 56.

He was very much devoted to his work and attached to his people. I have heard him say he would rather write two sermons than one and make an exchange with another minister. He was naturally a poet, but seldom wrote more than to sum up the contents of a sermon in rhyme.

He was born, July 11, 1798; married Mary Towne of Charlotte in 1824; after her death, Arvilla Gould of Chester in 1832.

He had a daughter and a son by his first wife, who live in Massachusetts.

He had two sons by his last wife, who live in Brooklyn, N. Y.

LITTLE THINGS.

By REV. UZZIAH C. BURNAP.

In human life there is a time
When little things become sublime;
When what is least in estimation
Sustains an infinite relation.

A moment has the weight of years,
A wish, the soul forever bears.

A word in consequence outweighs
The language of ten thousand days.

As when the virgins were too late,
A moment lost, decreed their fate;
As when the Saviour does pass by,
A moment lost, the soul must die.

A wish to know the path to Heaven,
A wish to have a sin forgiven,
May raise a soul from death and woe
And let salvation richly flow.

A word of prayer, a warning voice,
A word expressive of a choice,
May fix the current of the soul
While everlasting ages roll.

Have moments thus the weight of years?
Are words so full of hopes and fears?
Do wishes thus my doom control?
Then let me guard my precious soul.

Asa Burnap, Deacon Burnap's 3d son, was about 16 years old when his father died and he remained on the farm about 7 years.

After Mr. Lawton had sold the parsonage to Mr. Harris, Asa became very anxious to have the Society purchase another as soon as a suitable place was to be sold, and when Judge Aiken sold his farm, he bought it for that purpose. He gave $700 for it and let the Society have it for a parsonage, for $300.

In 1816, the first Sabbath School was established by Lucy Burnap, his sister, of which he was by the church and Society chosen the superintendent.

In 1833, he married Ellen Carter of Newfane and settled there. After her death, he married Mary Hazen, 1845, and now resides in Somerset.

GAIUS C. BURNAP,

the youngest son, went to New York City and became a merchant. The firm was Eliot, Burnap & Babcock. He retired from business in early life, and now lives in Poughkeepsie, N. Y.

Sophia, the second daughter of John Burnap, married David Elliot, son of Amos Emory and moved to New York where she remained 13 years and then removed to Wisconsin.

Achsa, 3d daughter of John, married James Stearns and remained in town.

Anna H., the youngest, married Nathan, son of Benjamin Pierce, and resides in Townshend.

MRS. EMMA WOOD SMITH.

EMMA WOOD, daughter of Joseph Wood, and grand-daughter of John Burnap was at the age of sixteen, engaged as a teacher of the French language in Yorkers, N. Y. She was afterwards a preceptress in the Academy at Chester. In 1846, she went to Friendship, Md. and spent one year. In 1847, she engaged as a teacher in the Patapsco Institute in Maryland. She remained there until she married. She married David P. Smith in 1850, and went to Florida where she died in 1853.

The Principal of Patapsco Institute wrote her obituary, from which I will give an extract:

"Died of yellow fever, Oct, 18th Mrs. Emma Wood, wife of David P. Smith, aged 31 years. A bright, lovely and loving spirit has gone from us. We shall see her no more, but we trust her pleasant smile may greet us on our entrance to the world of spirits. Mrs. Smith was for some years an esteemed teacher in the Patapsco Institute, where her literary attainments gave her a distinguished position. Apparently unconscious of the gifts of genius with which she was endowed, she seemed to set a light value on the brilliant effusions of her pen which cost her little labor. She toiled most faithfully as a teacher of mathematics or of the dry rules of rhetoric or logic. When we see mediocrity seeking to inflate itself beyond its natural dimensions, we do not feel surprised for this is common, but we do wonder to see a rich mind unconscious of its wealth.

In offering this tribute to the memory of an associate dearly loved and highly esteemed, we must express our hope that the many productions in prose and verse from the pen of Mrs. Smith which have adorned, for years the pages of various periodicals in different parts of our country, may be collected and published in a volume."

Catharine, her sister, younger, entered the Patapsco Institute the year after Emma. Both reviewed their studies and both took diplomas. Catharine remained there as a teacher about 14 years, until the war of the Rebellion broke up the school when she returned to Vermont. About six years since [1862] she married Charles Hawkins, architect, and now resides in Chester.

[Mrs. Hawkins died at her home in Chester, May 5, 1888.

THE DYING STUDENT.

By EMMA WOOD.

The soft breeze is on my brow,

I know 'tis the morning's breath,
But, alas! though its whispers are sweet,
'Tis the lonely wind of death.

I must lay down the aims of life,
And the dreams of my glorious youth,
For the pictures of joy and hope grow dim,
And I never can see their truth.

My life, I have poured it out
Like the wave of a crystal urn;
But the vase lies low on the sands of earth
And its contents can never return;

I must bury my earthly loves
In the heart that will beat no more;
They shall silent rest as a sacred trust
Till the conflict of life is o'er.

'T were a blessed thing to rest
From the trials and cares of earth,
For the weary soul to fold its wings
In the land of its radiant birth.

'Twere a glorious flight to soar
Through the pathless fields of air,
To reach the realms of light,
And revel in beauty there.

And yet it were hard to die
With the labor of life undone,
With the fields of science before my view
And its laurels well nigh won.

I have grasped at the godlike power
That is won by the scholar's night;
But of what avail is the garnered store,
I must die with the goal in sight.

I must bid farewell to earth
Whilst the blossoms are bright and fair,
And the sweet perfumes of the orange groves
Is borne on the sighing air.

And yet I would rather far,
To the house of my childhood move

To perish when gorgeous autumn leaves
Are falling in every grove.

And hear as my requiem low,
The voice of the murmuring wind
Like the plaintive song of the dying flowers
To the blossoms they leave behind.

There's a gentle stranger's hand
And and it rests on my burning head;
'T will soothe the anguish of heart and brow
Till the spirit's night has fled.

Yet I would that my sister's voice
Might ring on the silent air:
I see the form of my early love
And the curls of her clustering hair.

I would that they still were nigh!
If I felt but their balmy breath,
And the gentle touch of my mother's hand,
I could welcome the stroke of death.

Yet afar in this distant land,
I dream that they still are nigh,
I hear the gush of each kindly voice
And look on each loving eye.

They are present with me in dreams
And brighter as life grows dim,
The cherished friends of my early years,
And the loves of my boyhood seem.

As I yield my parting breath,
My name from the world has gone,
For there dwells no record of fame.
To tell of the spirit flown

I have done no lofty deed
To twine for my brow a wreath,
Nor carved a name in the realms of mind
To defy the march of death.

But my memory shall ever dwell
In the love of a faithful heart,
And if treasured up in that holy shrine
It will never through life depart.

Once more farewell to earth,
I can lay its glories down;
I will grasp no longer its fading gems,
But look up to my heavenly crown.

I will rest on His boundless love
Who has crowned my life with bliss,
Who calls me away to a brighter world
From the toils and sins of this.

JAMES H. UPHAM,

a graduate of Oberlin, Ohio, was the son of Gardner Upham, an early settler from Guilford, and his mother was the daughter of Amos Emory. His theological course was pursued at Bangor, Me. and he preached in that vicinity until sickness prevented. He died July 17, 1856.

[REV.] HENRY HASTINGS, son of Nathan Hastings, who emigrating from Orange or Warwick, Mass. settled in the west part of the town, about the first of the century: Henry graduated at Amherst in 1858. His theological course was at Union Seminary. He graduated in 1861; was ordained Evangelist at St. Stephens, in New Brunswick, June 11, 1862. He preached in his native town, in Pennsylvania and East Machias, Me. where his health failed, and he left for his home in Windham, and died on the way, at his sister's in Townshend, in 1863, at the age of 30,

LORIN W. BRINTNALL,

now [1868] a settled minister at Winthrop Station, graduated at Oberlin, O. His grandfather emigrated from Chelsea, Mass. to Windham late in the last century. His father formerly lived in Windham.

THE METHODIST MINISTERS who have had a residence here and were natives of the place were Justin and Lorenzo Barrows and Elijah Gale.

Ebenezer, Asa and Jacob Gale with their families came from Chesterfield, N. H. in 1800 and settled in the west part of the town. I believe Elijah Gale the minister, was the son of Ebenezer.

UNIVERSALIST MINISTER, a native of the town, Rev. Samuel Willis, late of Charlestown, S. C.

MISSIONARIES.

MARIA ARMS, daughter of Rev. Selah Arms, a native of Windham, went on a mission to the Choctaw nation in 1852, and her health failing, returned in 1855 and resides with her brother in Springfield.

IDA CHAPIN, daughter of Dr. Wm. A. Chapin who now lives in Belcher-town, Mass. is a native of this town. She married Rev. Mr. Hazen and went on a mission to India.

THE WINDHAM SINGERS.

MARTIN STEVENS and his family in the south part of the town from Warwick, Mass. possessed great musical talent. His sons, Martin, Asa Abraham, moved to the west part of New York and Pennsylvania. Three of his daughters: Mrs. Jones, Mrs. Cole and Mrs. Aiken moved there, also. Mrs. Melendy, the oldest, lived in Londonderry. Her oldest daughter as before said, is the wife of Judge Harris. Lucy Stevens was the wife of Daniel Cobb and settled in this town.

Harriet, his youngest daughter, is the wife of Judge Stoddard of Townshend.

The family of Mr Cobb were very good singers. Hannah Cobb married Aurelis Howard and lives in Townshend.

Ada Cobb was preceptress of Chester Academy several terms [and also at the old Black River Seminary at Ludlow.*] She married Gen. Frank Davis of Cavendish.

Angeline Cobb married the late Mr. Dean, attorney at law in Grafton.

Mary Cobb is the wife of the Hon William Harris of this town.

*Our first preceptress,—a lovely preceptress, we leave farther remark till we may reach the old Black River Seminary.

And there are many other families who deserve to be noticed for having been so useful and interesting in our social meetings on the Sabbath, and on other occasions, among whom: The daughters of Ira Farr, Mason Pierce, Barnabas Giles family, and the Harris family. I have mentioned as fine singers the Persons, Woodburns, Aikens [and Kimbals] And near the close of the last century, a Wilkins family, also, who were good singers, moved into town. Lucy one of the daughters married Samuel Woodburn and remained in town until her death. Mr. Woodburn was the son of John W. the pioneer, and a kinsman of Horace Greeley, Editor of the New York Tribune.

There has been a

BRASS BAND

in town for several years called "The Windham Brass Band which has had good repute in the County and State.

The first funeral in town with Masonic honors was James Mack's who died in December in 1860. The next in 1864, that of Horace Jones, son of Jason D. Jones.

Antimasonry had its day in town but it was a short one. As long as so many religious and honorable men sustain the institution, let charity remain.

Mr. David Aiken and Mrs. Tenney, widow of Luther Tenney are the oldest inhabitants in the town.

Mrs. Tenney's family and Mr. John Gould's are united in marriage, and they with their descendants are many, or all of them singers.

When the Great Architect with power and might Made sun and moon to rule the day and night
And from his hand the massive planets flung
To roll in circles round the glorious sun,

Twass then the morning stars with heavenly lays,
Commenced in song their great Creator's praise.

With voice and song, we therefore celebrate
All great events in either church or state.
And thus express in kind and first degree,
All that is noble, eloquent and free.

When Moses fled from Pharaoh's sanguine host,

With liquid walls, dry stood the sea they crossed,

When safe on shore their anthems loud and long.

With harps and timbrels chant the grateful song

The beauteous temple made by Solomon

When consecrated to the Holy One,

With instruments of every kind they raise

Their voice in songs of universal praise.

Pleased with their worship, God in answer sends

A glorious cloud which through the house extends.

O'er Bethlehem's plains when Jesus Christ was born

Angels proclaimed the news in most angelic song.—

At the last Supper Jesus sung a hymn:

He's our example, let us follow Him.

LUCY B. WOOD.

HONORARY MEMBERS OF BENEVOLENT SOCIETIES.

I have endeavored to find the names of all those in this town who have been honorary members of the different benevolent societies of the present day:

Enoch Goddard and wife who came from Orange and Royalston, Mass. in 1806, were life members of the Foreign Missionary Society, and their daughter Lamira, wife of George Dutton is also, a member of the same society. And Mr. Goddard's sons, Bliss and Timothy, were members of the Home Missionary Society.

Asa Burnap and G. C. Burnap were constituted honorary members of the American Board by their mother before her death, Dec. 1856.

Daniel Cobb and wife were members of the American Union.

Sineon Barrett and wife were members of the Home Missionary Society.

Hon. William Harris, Sr. is a life member of the Vermont Bible Society.

Lucy Burnap, now, Mrs. Joseph Wood, is a life member of the Vermont Bible Society.

Stephen Dutton who has died since I commenced this history, was another of our aged men. He was the father of Doctor Dutton, named among physicians, came from Dummerston, 1803.

EMORY JONES, son of J. D. Jones, has just entered college at Dartmouth. His mother, who is a daughter of Amos Emory Esq. has kindly furnished me with the manuscript of James Upham, her nephew, who wrote a partial history of the town in 1853, and read it before a literary society, to which, I am indebted for many events.

ONE HUNDRED YEARS OLD.

I know of only two instances in this town of remarkable longevity.

The widow ——— Bennet lived to be over a hundred years old.

Her daughter, the widow of Reuben Stowell, says that when she was over eighty, she rode on horseback to Brattleboro, 30 miles.

The widow of Abraham Farr lived to be over a hundred years old.

REVOLUTIONARY SOLDIERS.

The following early settlers were Revolutionary soldiers:

Jonathan Britnall, Samuel Ayers,
John Burnap, Stephen Fitch,
John Gould, Archibald Mack,
John Mack, Archibald McCormic.
Daniel Putnam, Nehemiah Pierce,

Benjamin Pierce, James Smith.

Smith was a deserter from Burgoyne's army. He was an artificer in the American army.

[We omit a list of the names of the soldiers of the last war here, as this list is without detail, and we have a list furnished with detail.]

MRS. LUCY BURNAP WOOD, the kindly and faithful historian of her native town, died at the home of her son in West Townshend, Mar. 23, 1888, aged 97 years.— The sheaf fully ripe.

Lucy Burnap was married to Joseph Wood, August 12, 1820. Mr. Wood died at South Reading, Dec. 1, 1873.

They had two daughters, Emma and Catherine [pp. 16 and 17] and one son, Norman Williams Wood.

Mrs. Wood had five grandchildren, at the time of her death; two sons of Mrs. Hawkins and two sons and a daughter of Norman Williams Wood.

In her long life this strong and good woman was a noble example of Christian faith and hope. She taught in the Sunday School until her hearing was dull by reason of age, and her eyes dim. She enjoyed reading till within two months of her death, and kept up with the events of the day remarkably, noting the advance in almost every thing with pleasure. She realized that she had lived a good long life.

At her funeral, Rev. Mr. Mackie, then preaching here, read the XLVI ps. and made remarks: Psalm; all the people invited to praise God— for so long and precious a life.*

*For the information in this memorial note and for reading the proof of this history, we are indebted to the daughter-in-law of our historian, Mrs. Norman W. Wood, who has known the town for 57 years.

HON. CLARK H. CHAPMAN.

[Biographical paper, furnished by Mr. Chapman, Oct. 6, 1884.]

My ancestors were from England, and settled in Say-Brook, Ct. and my grandfather was born in Hebron, that state in 1760. His father, Ezekiel, son of David was born in 1734 and married Abigail Niles of Colchester, Mass. in 1735, by whom he had ten children. He moved to Vermont about 1775.

My grandfather Silas, the 4th child, settled in Athens, where my father, James Chapman was born, October 1790, and died when my father was 3 years old at his wife's father's in Chesterfield, N. H. on his way back from a business trip to his native town. His wife was Sarah Dunham.

My mother, Amitta, the daughter of Ezekiel Perham was born in Athens, March 3, 1801, and was married to my father at Athens and they moved, May 1, 1818, to Windham, to a farm $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile from the Centre of the town. Here my mother died, October 7, 1838.

The next year, my father married a sister of the late Judge Wm. Harris at Windham and resided there till 1858, when he removed to Ludlow where my step-mother died in 1871 and my father March 29, 1873.

I caused their remains to be carried to and buried at Windham, where all my immediate family now dead are at rest.

My grandfather Perham was a Revolutionary soldier and used to tell me what he saw of General Washington. My mother's mother was a Jewett from Pepperill, Mass. She died in 1817, and is buried in Athens. The Dunham genealogy, I understand goes back to the Welch history.

I was born in Windham, Sept. 10, 1822, and had the usual advantages of a common school education there. In the fall of '36, I attended the Academy at Townshend. The next winter after my mother died, I, at 16 years of age, taught the district school adjoining my native district for $13 a month and the next winter the same school for $15 a month.

In the falls of 1838, 9, 40, I attended the Academy at Chester and taught in Athens the winters of '39, 40; in the fall of '41 attended the Black River Seminary at Ludlow; but having an opportunity to teach in Maryland instead of following up the academic course and entering college, I went to Calvert Co. about 30 miles below Annapolis and taught a neighborhood school for two years; returning to Vermont taught the Windham district school two winters, and in the fall of 1845, went into the office of the late Judge Dutton of Cavendish to complete my legal studies which I had begun under Judge Wilkins in Calvert Co. Maryland. In the meantime was preceptor of Black River Seminary the spring term of 1845; and kept while in Judge Dutton's office, the Probate Records for Windsor District; was admitted as attorney to the Windsor Bar in 184-; went into business as a lawyer in 1859 with my brother-in-law, Hon. F. C. Robbins, at Ludlow, under the firm name of Robbins & Chapman.

In 1853, I was elected assistant Secretary of the State Senate; held the office 2 years and was elected Secretary to succeed the Hon. Joseph Barrett, who was at Washington Commissioner of pensions under appointment of President Lincoln, 8 years. Middlebury College gave me the degree of A. M. in—

I was a member from Windsor Co. of the last Constitutional Convention; one of the 9 delegates and was assistant Secretary of the Convention.

Dec. 1, 1849 till May 1850 was Register of the Probate Court under Judge Dutton's appointment, and again from July 1856 to December 1862.

1856, I removed from Ludlow back to Cavendish and settled in Proctorsville as an attorney and resided there until 1882 when I removed with my family to Detroit, Michigan, where we now reside.

I married Ellen M. Sherwin, oldest daughter of the late Captain Charles Sherwin of Weathersfield, a farmer residing about $\frac{3}{4}$ ths of a mile below Perkinsville on Black River, July 7, 1878.

We have had four children: the oldest and youngest, girls, both died in infancy. The second and third, sons, are living at Detroit and industriously employed, having received a business education, rather than a literary course of training.

My oldest son, Charles Sherwin, Chapman, was born at Cavendish, Aug. 21, 1864.

My youngest son, Wm. Clark Chapman, was born at Cavendish, March 1, 1866.

I have only one full sister, living Mrs. F. C. Robbins, and two half sisters, Emma L. and Mary V.

My mother, at seventeen, united with the Baptist Ch. at Saxtons River and remained a faithful member until her death. My father when the Methodists came into Vermont affiliated with them, though I do not know as he ever was a communicant. The Episcopalian worship most meets my preference.

THE
OF

Wilmington,

1751—1870.

BY REV. VOLNEY FORBES.

WILMINGTON.

This township is in the west part of Windham County, on the east side of the Green Mountains in the valley of Deerfield River; the east and west branches of which unite in this town and run south through Whitingham into Massachusetts and empty into the Connecticut River at Deerfield. The township is 6 miles square, bounded, N. by Dover, E. by Marlboro, S. by Whitingham and W. by Readsboro and Searsburg, is 22 miles east of Bennington, 20 miles west of Brattleboro.

Its surface is somewhat hilly, interspersed with vallies and intervalles formed by the Deerfield and its tributaries. The soil is a rich sandy loam, and there is very little waste land, the hills being arable to their summits, furnishing excellent pasturage for stock. The soil is productive, yielding good crops of grass, oats, corn, potatoes and vegetables. The land is well-timbered with maple, birch, beech, ash, spruce, hemlock, firs; the sugar-maple being very abundant; from which, often a hundred tons of sugar is made in a season and is quite an income to the community. The mountains and hillsides give good, pure water. The Deerfield

River, Beaver Brook and other smaller branches of the Deerfield, furnish an abundance of water-power, and in the east part of the town is a fine pond, or lake:

RAY POND.

about 2 miles long and half a mile in width, well-stocked with pickerel and other fish. This pond empties into the east branch of the Deerfield River by a stream called Bill Brook, which furnishes several good sites for lumber mills.

Lumber is extensively manufactured for the market on most of the streams, spruce, hemlock, birch, maple and beech lumber finding a ready sale, and if we only had the much coveted railroad to transport it to market, it would cause wealth to flow in upon us and make our hearts glad.

In the N. W. corner of the township is Haystack Mountain, more familiarly called one of the highest peaks of the Green Mountains, rising about 3000 feet, towerering considerably above the surrounding hills. About 1000 feet from the summit lies a beautiful pond of 75 acres of clear, cold, deep water, containing no fish of any kind. It is fed by springs entirely. Its outlet is by a brook which tumbles over the rocks into Cold Brook, thence into the Deerfield.

"OLD HAYSTACK,"

This mountain is a great resort for the lovers of nature both wild and cultivated, the view being very beautiful and extensive. After climbing the almost perpendicular sides, the weary traveler finds himself upon the rocky summit where a scene of grandeur and sublimity bursts upon his view. Almost at his feet lies the little lake a thousand feet below, encircled by evergreens, its transparent surface glistening in the rays of the sun and reflecting the surrounding trees and rocks like a polished mirror.

Towards the east, the first object that attracts the eye is the neat, white village of Wilmington which is about 4 miles off though you seem to be looking down into it as if it were almost underneath you. The whole town lies curiously mapped out; every man's domain by itself, his nice residence and out-buildings, shade-trees, orchards, meadows and woodland with the "cattle on a thousand hills."

Farther in the distance the view embraces the whole of Windham County and part of Windsor in Vermont with Cheshire County New Hampshire with Franklin County Massachusetts in the southeast and their various mountains rivers and villages. The north and west is a continual series of mountains, hills, vallies and forests, making in the whole, one of the most splendid panoramas in the country, which will compensate the admirer of nature for all the toil and fatigue which it costs to reach it.

THE GEOLOGICAL

formation of Wilmington is of a primitive azoic order, consisting of gneiss, mica slate and hornblend with detached masses of quartz and feldspar. In the west part of the town are quarries of limestone which are rather too sandy to make the best of lime, but is used for agricultural purposes; also, some iron ore is found.

In the west part there, is serpentine and some stelelite. Deposites of clay are numerous and tertiary moraines are plenty along the streams. There is not any valuable minerals, although a thorough geological survey has never been made.

EARLY HISTORY.

The Town was chartered by Governor Wentworth of New Hampshire, April 29, 1751 to

GRANTEES:

Phineas Lyman, Samuel Kent, Jr., Abraham Burbank, Medad Pomeroy, Noah Pomeroy, Aaron Rising, Paul Kent, Joel Kent, Jonathan Underwood, Samuel Granger, Joshua Austin, Samuel Hathaway, Benjamin Kent, Jonathan Knight, Shem Burbank, Elihue Kent, Timothy Marther, John Leavitt, Samuel Harman, Joshua Kendall, Aaron Hitchcock, Lemuel Granger, Simeon Granger, Elijah Easton, Phineas Sheldon, Reuben Harman, Silas Kent, John Granger, Aseph Leavit, John Rowe, Jr., John Old, Isaac Hall, Joseph Forward, Pelatiah Adams, Samuel Dwight, Seth Dwight, Daniel Austin, Joseph Kent, Daniel Smith, Simeon Hathaway, Daniel Gilbert, Elijah Sheldon, Elijah Kent, Zephaniah Taylor, Asher Sheldon, Benning

Wentworth, Esq., Theodore Atkinson, Esq., Ellis Husk, Esq., Richard Vibbard, Esq., John Downing, Esq. Sampson Shea, Esq.,—most of whom were supposed to belong to Connecticut. They surveyed the town into lots and divided the lots among themselves.

But few of the original proprietors ever settled in the town, Daniel Austin and Elijah Easton are the only ones known to have done so.

DRAPER CHARTER.

A subsequent charter was granted, June 17, 1764, to other parties under the name of Draper. The town was never organized under that charter, but the conflicting claims of the two charters greatly retarded its settlement. The Wilmington charter finally prevailed, the settlers voting that they were not willing that anybody should settle under the Draper charter.

Settlers came in rather slowly; there were no roads and they had to find the way by marked trees and foot-paths, and many of the pioneers had to transport their provisions on their backs from Deerfield, Mass., Hoosic, N. Y. and other places.

A census of the town of Wilmington, Cumberland County, N. Y. was taken by order of Lord Dunmore, the Governor of New York in 1771, by Thomas Cutler, Deputy Sheriff. The names of heads of families were:

Leonard Mayo, Micha Griffin,
Samuel Derby, Elijah Alvord,
Ebenezer Davis, John Davis,
Asa Davis, Joseph Marsh,
John Davis, 2d, Thomas Crowfort,
Jonathan Rodgers, Nathan Davis,
David Davis, Zephaniah Swift.
The number of inhabitants was 71.

The first child born in town, January 20, 1771, Zephaniah, son of Chipman Swift.

Very many of the early settlers were from Massachusetts and Connecticut and were men of patriotism, nerve and enterprise. Those who are known to have been

REVOLUTIONARY SOLDIERS:

COL. WM. WILLIAMS, who had the command of a detachment of Windham County troops at the Battle of Bennington, and is mentioned in General Stark's official report as being with him.

Capt. Judah Moore:
Capt. Jonas Haynes:

James Smith:
Israel Lawson:
Samuel Buel:
Jedediah Bassett:
John Marks:
Jonathan Witt:
Samuel Thompson:
Joseph Nye.

Jan. 12, 1778, an order was issued by the Council of Safety to Captain

Samuel Robinson, Overseer of Tories to detach ten effective men under his command with proper officers to take charge of and march them in two distinct files from Bennington through the Green Mountains to Colonel William Williams' dwelling house in Draper, alias, Wilmington, within this State, who are to march and tread the snow in sd. road a suitable width for a sleigh or sleighs with a span of horses on each sleigh; and order them to return marching in the same manner with all convenient speed, ordered to take three days provision to each of such men, the same to be cooked this day, and to march at six o'clock to-morrow morning. Signed by Jonas Fay, Vice President."

"Oct. 24th, 1778, a resolve was passed by the General Assembly to make a road from Wilmington to Bennington.

The first town-meeting on record, was held at the house of Elijah Alvord.

Jan. 19, 1778, Caleb Alvord was the first town clerk.

The first vote taken was "to continue Mr. Chapin to preach with us,"—This vote was characteristic of the people, from that time to the present, they having all the time supported one to four ministers.

"March 2d, 1778, Chose Capt John Gibbs, Phineas Smith, Samuel Muddock Elihue Bascom, and Lieut. Eleazer Bridgeman. Committee of Safety."

At a meeting held, Sept. 1, 1768, "Voted to send for a minister to preach with us on probation. Chose Capt. Josiah Locke, Capt. Chipman Swift and Edward Foster, Committee to look out for a minister."

Feb. 8, 1779, "Voted to dissolve the union between this State and sixteen towns on the east side of the Connecticut River," which they had formerly voted to accept.

The first freeman's meeting on record was held July 7, 1778, "Chose Wm. Miller to attend the election at Guilford as delegate.

"Sept. 1st 1778, Chose Elijah Alvord, representative to attend the General Assembly.

March 30, 1780, the town "Voted that John Rugg shall pay into the treasury the money and deliver the note he took of Capt. Josiah Lock for Phineas Fairbanks' place, when the committee of the court of confiscation calls for it."

"Voted that we will raise our soldiers for the future by a rate on the town The quota of the town of provisions as ordered by the General Assembly to be provided for the troops employed in the service of this State for the year 1780 was 2338 lbs. of flour, 779 lbs. of beef, 389 lbs. of salt pork, 48 bushels of Indian corn, and 24 bushels of rye."

Nov. 29, 1780, the town "Voted to raise two hundred and fifty hard dollars to procure our part of a magazine of provisions for this State."—They also voted the same year to raise £3000 for the highways, to be paid at £9 lbs. per day for work; which shows the value of paper currency at that time.

It was voted this year to build a log-meeting-house in the centre of the town, which was done and occupied until the completion of a frame edifice near the same spot in 1786.

Aug. 31, 1780, they voted to give Mr. Packard a call to the work of the Gospel ministry. Then voted to give him £100 for a settlement among us to be paid if in time of war with beef at £1 4s. per hundred, or wheat at 5 s. per bushel, or rye at 3 s. and sixpence; Indian corn at 3 s. per bushel. If in time of peace, Beef at one pound per hundred, wheat at four shillings and sixpence per bushel, rye at three shillings per bushel, Indian corn two shillings and sixpence per bushel—to be paid, one half at his ordination and the other half one year afterwards."

Then "Voted to give Mr. Packard for his salary, £30 for the first year, and to raise £5 a year until it comes to £65 a year, and to give him this salary so long as he remains our regular minister, which offer Mr. Packard accepted as will be seen hereafter.

OTHER PROMINENT SETTLERS.

Among the early settlers also whose names appear often on the records as town officers and were prominent citizens, were:

Gad Alvord, Andrew Haskell:

Adnah Bangs, Josiah Flagg:

Silas Axtell, John Rugg:

Rodger Burchard.

Mr Burchard was the first merchant in town:

John Marks, the first surveyor:

Capt. Dickenson, tavern-keeper:

Jesse Marks, who was at last frozen to death by guiding a man by marked trees through the woods one cold winter day:

And, Oliver Wilder: His wife, Mary Marks Wilder, who was a very competent woman, lived to the great age of and died in 1857. She often described the men of this vicinity, hearing the firing at Bennington, hurrying past her house with old swords, pitch-forks and pikes, while she laughed at them, saying, "It would take better arms to fight with British regulars!"

The men of those times were hardy, resolute and persevering; and the women were fully their equals, helping to till the soil and tend the stock whenever necessary. The wives of Ephraim Titus and Joseph Nye who were neighbors, are said to have carried on their farms while their husbands were away fighting for independence.

An anecdote is told of Mrs. Titus, which shows the spirit of those days: Mr. Nye at the house of Mrs. Titus was boasting that no man in town could throw him. She sat weaving at her loom till tired of hearing him bragg, she left her seat and seizing him by the collar threw him upon the floor, telling him that if there was no man in town could throw him, there was one woman who had done it."

Mar. 15, 1790 the town "Voted that Matthew Long, Amos Fox and Morris Doty receive on the town rates, salts of lye at two pence per lb. sheep at one penny and a farthing per lb. butter and flax at sixpence a lb. thus showing what articles were used for currency then.

IN THE WAR OF 1812, men were called for by detachments, volunteers and drafts to go north to defend the Canada lines. The town voted to pay the selectmen for providing provisions, camp-utensils, baggage wagon, &c. for the detached militia, Sept. 12, 1820, which is all the vote on record in regard to that war. The men known to have gone to that war :

James Smith, Goodwin Lincoln :

William Wilder, Ethan Smith :

Oliver Wilder Abijah Petree.

Barney Hastings, James Harwood :

Gates Doty, Seth Hubbard :

Julius Alvord. Moses Cummings :

Samuel Fox, Chester Packard :

Lewis Haskell, John Hill :

Benjamin Parmelee, Robert Farrill :

Daniel Snow, Joseph Snow.

They generally had an easy time ; saw but little of the hardship of war and all returned safely to their homes.

A THUNDER STORM IN WILMINGTON.

(From "The Brattleboro Reporter.")

On the 15th Inst. (Oct. 27, 1818.) we had a terrible storm of wind and rain attended with flashes of lightning and peals of thunder that might appal the stoutest heart. Several buildings were struck by lightning, but with little damage except a large barn of Lemuel Ball, filled with the products of his industry the past season which was consumed to ashes. Two lads were milking in the barn: his son and a relative who lived with him.—about 16 years of age, who with the cow he was milking was struck dead. Mr. Ball's son, though struck down was not so stunned but that he effected his escape before the flames seized upon him and carried the awful news of the fate of his companion to his father. Ball flew to the barn, but the flames enveloped it, so fierce, he could not approach. The body was not rescued until almost destroyed. The charred remains were interred on the 17th when an affecting discourse was delivered to a large audience by Rev. Hollis Sampson from Job V. 6 to 9 inclusive.

In July 1822, a tornado, commencing in the south-west, passing towards the north-east, struck first the earth where the village now is, unroofing the house of old Mr. Allis, then proceeding about half a mile up the river took the roof from the dwelling-house of Jonah Lincoln and completely demolishing two of his barns, destroyed his orchard and crops ; struck a piece of woods a quarter of a mile beyond, prostrating the trees on several acres like grass before the scythe, passing off over the hills levelling trees, fences and crops for several miles, leaving a path of destruction even now visible.

ANNEXATION.

In the fall of 1858, a part of the town of Somerset was annexed to this town four miles long and two miles wide containing about 100 inhabitants. The same territory was set off and annexed to Dover in the fall of 1869, caused a decrease in the census from 1860 to 1870.

At the breaking out of

THE GREAT REBELLION,

our citizens were very much aroused and swiftly arose to arms in defense of the nation. Meetings were called, speeches were made, and many of the best young men volunteered and went to the war; others who could not well leave their homes furnished substitutes, and the town voted and paid generous bounties to encourage enlistments. The whole community, men and women exerted themselves to sustain the government and help our soldiers to bear the fatigues and hardships of war, and very many barrels and boxes of clothing, bedding and hospital stores were sent to the Sanitary Commission by the ladies who devoted much time and money to the cause.

The following are the names of all the volunteers who went from this town and substitutes as far as known, as reported by the Adj. & Ins. Gen'l. They were generally men of sterling worth, who went from principle, not as hirelings. Some died in camps and hospitals, some were taken prisoners; but the majority of them returned to their homes to receive the well-earned praise of their friends, and the gratitude of the whole community.

Thus endeth the record of the soldiers of the Rebellion. They have resumed their various pursuits and are among our best citizens.

AGRICULTURE.

The farmers of Wilmington have for the last thirty years given much attention to the improvement of neat cattle; importing and purchasing the best breed of Durham short-horns. Their motto has been to get the best that could be found without regard to price: till the town has become well-known and quite famous for large and beautiful oxen, cows and other cattle; so that buyers of nice stock come here to purchase.

WILMINGTON AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY was formed about 1858. They hold annual fairs and cattle shows and have been very successful, a great pecuniary advantage and pleasant, social, autumnal festival which is thought much of.

Among the men who have greatly improved the stock are:

David Rugg, Alanson Parmelee:

Russell Fitch, Israel Lauton:

B. L. Barnard, Daniel Cushman:

C. T. Alvord, E. T. Butterfield:

Ruel Smith, D. J. Parmeter.

Chauncey Smith, Chas. W. Bissell.

Horses and sheep are only ordinary. Every farmer has his good, strong horse to take his family out to church. The ladies bring to the fairs their nice, white flannel and frocking, fine woolen stockings and beautiful stocking-yarn, which they have manufactured from their own sheep.

Indeed, the farmers are celebrated for every thing that goes to make up a pleasant home. There are beautiful residences all over town. White houses with green blinds prevail, surrounded with green lawns, dotted with roses, vines and flowers; while the men have their mowing-machine, horse-rake, fancy potatoes, Norway oats, Alsike clover and swarms of bees.

WILMINGTON VILLAGE.

The present village is built upon each side of the east branch of the Deerfield River at the confluence of Beaver Brook, about half a mile west of the centre of the town. It has a good water-power which was first occupied by David Winslow for a grist and saw-mill, about 1795. In 1831, the stage road from Brattleboro to Bennington was completed through this valley.—The town-house, hotel and two stores were built the same year, and most of the town was removed from the old Centre, which as the custom of the first settlers was built on the top of a high hill. Since that time the Village has grown quite rapidly. It was incorporated in 1855. It now contains four neat and commodious churches,—a Congregationalist, Baptist, Universalist and Methodist, a town-hall, a large school-house; about 80 dwelling-houses with about 400 inhabitants; has quite an extensive grist and flouring-mill, and a large lumber-mill; a good sized hotel, 4 stores, one clothing-store; a market, a victualing-house; marble-works, a carriage-shop, harness-shop, 2 blacksmithshops with several other business places; 3 lawyers offices, and a savings-bank.

The place is easy of access from the adjoining towns by good roads, and has daily mails east and west; has become a business centre for the south-west part of the County. It is fresh and neatly built and presents an attractive appearance, surrounded by green hills and shaded by beautiful maples.

A rail-road was chartered from Brattleboro to Bennington, Nov. 1869;

PHYSICIANS.

The first physician who settled in town was

DR. BENJAMIN MORGAN

who practiced here for several years, and then, about 1810, removed West.

DR. URIEL BESTOR came next after Dr. Morgan and settled here to practice. He died here in 1820.

DR. DANA HYDE

succeeded Dr. Bestor and remained a few years and left.

DR. JOHN PULSIFER

came here next to reside and had a successful practice until 1838, when he removed to Illinois.

DR. ORSON FLAGG, an enterprising young man, studied with Dr. Pulsifer and afterwards opened an office in town and won a good reputation, but died in 1827.

DR. G. B. ARMINGTON

took the place of Dr. Flagg for a few years and then removed to Pittsford.

DR. ABNER ALLARD

practiced several years and died in 1839.

DR. HORACE SMITH

then came, doing a fine business for about 15 years. when he removed to Bennington where he now resides.

DR. A. L. PETTEE was his successor and is now practicing here.

DR. EDWIN HAYNES

practiced medicine and dentistry in town about 10 years; died in 1866.

DR. J. H. TALBOT

came here in 1857; gained quite a reputation and removed to Cambridge, Mass. in 1866.

DR. F. J. SWIFT.

a studious young man has recently opened an office here and is doing a good business.

LAWYERS.

The first lawyer in town was Levi Field, who died in 1820.

CHARLES K. FIELD

came here about 1829. He was an active business man and assisted much in building up the Village, and promoted the prosperity of the town. He left in 1838 and now resides in Brattleboro.

OSCAR L. SHAFTER

commenced the practice of law here in 1837; gained an extensive reputation and removed to California in 1854, where he has arisen to Judge of the Supreme Court. [For Shafter see history of Athens.]

S. P. FLAGG

commenced the practice of law here in 1843, and continued in the profession until his death in 1868.

F. M. CROSBY

was Mr. Flagg's partner a few years, and then removed to Minnesota.

J. M. TYLER

was afterwards Mr. Flagg's partner until he moved to Brattleboro, 1864, and is now [1870] in company with C. K. Field in that town.

E. I. WATERMAN was the next partner of Mr. Flagg, who came here in 1866, and left in 1870.

C. N. DAVENPORT

studied law with O. L. Shafter, and when he left for California, Mr. Davenport took his office and practiced very successfully about ten years when he removed to Brattleboro, where he is now doing business.

The present lawyers are:

O. E. Butterfield, Esq.

S. T. Davenport, Esq.

G. W. Davenport, Esq.

Quite a large number of young lawyers have studied in this place and become well known all over the country.

ECCLESIASTICAL.

The first vote recorded in town was to hire Mr. Chapin, a Congregationist minister, to preach to them. The Congregational was the only mode of worship in town for quite a number of years.

Their first meeting-house was a log one; their next was a large square framed one on the top of a high hill near the centre of the town; unpainted, without a steeple; but with great, family-pews and a curious sounding-board over the pulpit. There were no carpets, no cushions, no place for a fire, and yet from Sabbath to Sabbath, people came flocking here from all parts of the town. They never thought of being cold, though the mercury was below zero; they never complained; of the heat, the sun poured its scorching rays all day long into the unblinded windows; rain or wind never disturbed the even tenor of their souls, while they listened to the preached word and treasured it up in good and honest hearts.

THE CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH

was first formed here, Aug. 16, 1780, by Rev Henry Williams and Rev. Gershom Lyman, the minister of Marlboro. The church consisted of seven members.

May 31, 1780 they gave Rev. Winslow Packard an invitation to become their minister which he accepted and was soon after ordained. Being the first settled minister, he was given the minister right of land; part of it was in the centre and part of it in the N. E. part of the town. He was much loved and confided in and the church increased under his ministry; but it was of short duration; he died, October 12, 1867.

Since that time they have had many different pastors settled over them; mostly good and true men who commanded respect and exerted not only an excellent influence in the church, but in the community.

In 1837, the Society erected a neat modern church in the Village which they have since occupied. They have no settled minister now, Rev. E. E. Herrick, a very worthy, intelligent gentleman, the last, removed to Randolph, June 1870.

Rev. Mr. Emerson here previous, removed to Lynn, Mass.

Rev. Mr. Perry next before Mr. E. who removed to Cambridge, Mass. and so on. The church is now in a prosperous condition, 82 members, 15, having been added during the revival the past season.

BAPTIST CHURCH.

BY MRS. A. W. GOODNOW.

The Baptist Church in Wilmington, was organized, Sept. 1, 1806; the constituted members having previously united with the Baptist Church in Somerset.

The same day, Nathan Flagg and Jeremiah Parmelee were ordained as deacons.

REV. MR. SNOW, was the first pastor; but he remained only a few months.

LINUS AUSTIN
was licenced to preach by the church in June 1807, and preached as stated supply 3 years. He also supplied the pulpit in 1815, 16.

REV. ELI BALL was ordained and settled as pastor in September 1811. He left after two years service.

REV. MANSFIELD BRUCE, who had occasionally preached as supply in 1819, was settled as pastor, remaining as such until his death, February 1843.

REV. M. D. MILLER became pastor in March 1843 and was dismissed in July 1848.

REV. A. CASE was settled in February 1849, and remained 2 years.

REV. M. BALL was called to the pastorate in September 1851, and was dismissed in August 1853.

REV. W. TILLINGHAST was settled in March 1854, and remained 3 years.

REV. C. SMITH commenced his pastorate in the autumn of 1857, and terminated it in July 1859.

REV. A. W. GOODNOW, present pastor [1870], was settled in April 1860.

The Church has had nine pastors; ordained two of its members as ministers. and licenced four to preach; and two after removing to other places became preachers. It has had in all about 450 members of whom nearly 300 united by baptism. It has had 16 deacons, and built two houses of worship. Its present number of members is 120, 32 of whom have recently united with the church,

THE METHODIST CHURCH.

BY REV. J. H. GAYLORD,

The first class was formed in this place in 1814, being connected with Leyden circuit. Wilmington with several of the adjoining towns was organized into a circuit in 1833.

The present number of members is 76, and in addition 25 on probation or six months trial, the fruit of the revival, this season.

THE UNIVERSALIST SOCIETY

was first formed here by

REV. HOLLIS SAMPSON, who was formerly pastor of the Congregational church in this town, at the time he renounced the orthodox creed; about 1818. Nearly half of his congregation embraced his views and formed the nucleus of the present society, organized in 1820, about which time, Mr. Sampson left town, and was employed to preach and was ordained here; and after him,

REV. HUBBARD WINCHESTER

REV. J. C. NEWEL

preached here for a year or two; and then

REV. S. P. SKINNER

was employed for several years; next after whom was

REV. WM. S. BALLOU, who preached with the society until 1833, when

REV. HOSEA F. BALLOU,

a son of Hosea Ballou, the founder of Universalism in this country, preached; commenced his labors, preaching one half of the time here and one half at Whitingham where he resided for 7 years.

In 1835, the present church was erected.

REV. J. W. BAILEY

was settled here as pastor in 1843 and hired to preach the whole time, and a church of some 30 members was organized. Mr. Bailey labored with zeal and good success for 7 years when he removed to Western New York, and succeeded to him, who preached for 3 years; and after him,

REV. ORIN PERKINS

REV. J. CLIFFORD was settled here as, pastor until 1857, when the present pastor,

REV. H. F. BALLOU, removed his family here and took the charge of the parish which he has held for the last 13 years.

The number of the church is between 40 and 50, about half the size of the society,—12 new members.

Each society has a modern church-edifice in good condition, nicely carpeted and cushioned, with interesting Sabbath schools and Bible-classes and good libraries; a nice melodeon and fine choir.

BIOGRAPHICAL.

REV. WINSLOW PACKARD was born in Bridgewater, Mass. 1750; graduated at Amherst College in 1775; married Abigail, daughter of Judah Moore, one of the first settlers of this town, and sister of Pres. Zephaniah S. Moore of Amherst College.

Mr. Packard received a call to settle as minister of the Gospel, by a vote of the town, Aug. 31, 1780, which he accepted and was soon after ordained as the first settled minister of Wilmington.

MR. PACKARD'S LETTER OF ACCEPTANCE.

(As on the town records)

"Wilmington May ye 31st 1781

Kind and beloved Friends

The invitation which you was pleased to give me last August to settle with you in the work of ye Gospel ministry, and the discouraging as well as encouraging circumstances with which it has been and is yet attended has all from time to time been with wait upon my mind and sometimes almost distracted my thoughts. My duty for a long time has hung in doubt, and I have been perplexed to know what to do. I have I trust sincerely desired that my duty in this important affair might be made plain, and that I might be cheerfully disposed to do the same: and for this end I have endeavored sincerely to spread my case before God: and look to him for light and direction. I have endeavored carefully to observe all providences that appeared both in favor and against it. I have counselled both ministers and friends in order to obtain their best advice, and from all the light I can obtain I cannot see it my duty wholly to deny you, , neither can I see as it is my duty to accept of your invitation without any exceptions. I have concluded therefore to accept of your call on condition a ministerial right shall be laid out by the proprietors at their next meeting and upon condition the right is as good as any impartial men shall think it ought to be, and upon conditions there shall (previous to my ordination) be procured a settling lot which shall be agreeable to my mind, and likewise upon condition I fully understand our proposals for my support among you, which are I understand them as follows. (viz) That you agree to give me one hundred Pounds lawful money for a settlement. One half of to be paid at my ordination, the other half in one year after. That you agree to give me for a salary thirty pounds lawful money for the first year,—forty for ye second year—fifty for ye third—sixty for ye fourth year, and sixty five for every year after that I shall continue your gospel minister. And these sums for my salary you agree to give (I suppose from what I can learn from your votes and those that were present when they were passed) upon condition I will for the four first years take labor at the common price in ye year 1774 of all those who have a mind to pay their rates in labor and will pay them in such time of the year as I shall stand most in need of their help. You agree that my salary shall begin when I may give my answer in the affirmative, and you agree likewise that the aforementioned sums for my settlement whenever paid be made as good as money was in the year one thousand seven hundred and seventy four, by which I understand that you agree whenever you pay y'e forementioned sums or any part of them that if the same nominal sum or sums will not purchase as much of the necessities of life as in ye year one thousand seven hundred and seventy four, then ye said sum or sums shall be increased till they will.

If you vote this as your meaning, then I conclude to accept your call.—wishing that the blessing of God may attend our engagements and that we may all our days be a blessing and comfort to each other.

WINSLOW PACKARD.

N. B.

It was voted in open town-meeting, when Mr. Packard gave his answer, that the conditions of his answer was agreeable to the meaning of the town in their answer to him.

Test. Nathan Foster, Town Clerk.

He continued to preach with good success until his death, Oct. 12, 1784, at the age of 34 years.

He left two children, a son and daughter, Origin and Clarissa.

His widow married Rev. Edmund Mills of Sutton, Mass. in 1789, who died in 1825. She was again married to Rev. Nathaniel Emmons, D.D. of Franklin, Mass. in 1831, who died in 1840. She died, Oct. 24, 1853, at the age of ninety-one; after bringing up a family of four sons and three daughters. Her daughter, Clarissa Packard, married Rev. David Holman of Douglass, Mass.

REV. MANSFIELD BRUCE,

BY REV. OIRGEN SMITH.

Mansfield Bruce was born at Grafton, Mass. Apr. 11, 1781. The autumn after his birth, his parents, Elijah and Abigail Bruce, removed to Newfane. The country new, schooling poor, the circumstances of his parents comparative poverty, his education while young was quite limited.

In December 1804, he sought an interest in the Saviour. He united with the Congregationist church of Newton, Mass. but in 1806, not being satisfied with sprinkling for baptism, he was baptised by immersion into the fellowship of the Baptist church of Marlboro and Newfane.

He was married to Grace Goddard, Sept. 24, 1805. They had 9 children. She still survives, (1870) being 86 yrs. old.

Soon after baptism, he was chosen deacon which office he well filled until September 1809 when he was set apart by solemn ordination as an evangelist, but soon became pastor of the same church; and yet went "everywhere" preaching the Gospel to the destitute, aiding pastors in their arduous work, the sign of God's approbation following wherever he went.

In 1813, he supplied the Baptist church in Wilmington one half of the time, and in 1819 became pastor of the same church until his death, Feb'y 5, 1843, in his 63d year. He supplied his desk until the last three weeks before he died. His pastorate of almost 24 years was one of success and great usefulness.

As he spent the whole period of his ministry of 35 years in this vicinity he had become quite a patriarch among the Baptists in this part of the State. His counsel was more sought than that of any other Baptist pastor in Windham County—for the last years of his life. His death was a triumph of that faith in the Gospel he had so long preached.

Elder Bruce was an able, sound and energetic preacher. He spoke with great clearness and power, relying on the arm of the Lord to sustain him.— He was faithful in his charge, unspotted in his life, and beloved by his flock. He was much esteemed as a man, as a Christian, and as an able minister of the Gospel.

During his ministry he preached 6000 sermons, besides many lectures on temperance, moral reform and anti-slavery. He visited the sick far and near. He married 101 couples; baptized 403 persons, and traveled 70,000 miles. He was always punctual to his appoint ments: rain or shine, wind or snow did not keep him at home.

He was a man of intelligence and blessed with great natural abilities, but had not while young the means to acquire an education. After he entered the ministry, he studied very hard and probably laid the foundation of the disease, hydrocephalus, which terminated his earthly career.

He was very industrious and economical; whatever he undertook, he did with his might, so, though his salary was small, not more than half supporting his family, he managed to get a good, comfortable living.

MR. ORIGIN PACKARD,

BY MRS. V. FOBES.

Origen Packard was born, Nov. 30, 1782. His father, Winslow Packard, was the first settled minister of this town. Origen was two years old when his father died. His mother married Rev. Mr. Mills of Sutton, Mass. a few years after and he went to Sutton to reside. He was educated at Leicester Academy under the instruction of his uncle Zephaniah S. Moore, afterwards President of Williamstown College, still later, first President of Amherst College. Origen was quick, easy to learn, and made rapid progress in his studies. He often spent his vacations in Wilmington, having a great partiality for his native place. In the winter of 1798, he started the first Lyceum in town, when he was 16 years old, and the same winter opened a free grammar school, even giving the wood for the fire, which was largely attended, some coming from neighboring towns.—Judge Roberts, late of Townshend, then of Whitingham, once said to Mr. Packard: "All that I am, all that I ever shall be I owe to you; for it was you who first gave me the desire to be educated, and pointed the way to knowledge." Previous to that time, Wilmington had been obliged to get teachers for common schools from abroad; after that they could supply other towns.

Soon after Mr. Packard graduated, he went to New Haven, Ct. and in the year 1807, married Azubah Smith, a young lady of great intelligence and refinement. They settled in Douglass, Mass. where he engaged in the mercantile business; but not having a taste for it, he sold out and removed to Wilmington and settled on the "minister-lot" which was given to his father in the northeast part of the town, where they brought up a family of four daughters and one son.

He was always fond of teaching and continued to do so till he was over 50 years old, and when not teaching was ever ready to give freely any instruction to any young men seeking for knowledge. He was a man of good talents and original mind.

In the winter of 1816 and 17, he became very much interested in the subject of religion, and studied upon it and the Bible until he adopted a system of faith of his own which became quite popular, quite a number joining with him in belief who were called "Packardites." They believed that the Bible was written by inspiration and should be understood wholly spiritually, that all Christians should be united and not divided into sects. Finding that they were only building another sect, they discontinued their meetings, each one attending church where it seemed most like home, though all cherishing more or less their distinctive views through life in great peace.

In 1839, Mr. Packard sold his farm and removed to Bennington, but returned in 1847, and took up his residence with his son-in-law, Volney Forbes, where he and his wife remained until their death, February 1865, aged 82 and 80.

He had often expressed the desire that as they had lived together over half a century, they might die together. When she died after a short illness, he was in usual health, but the day following was prostrated by the same disease (pneumonia) and in two days more followed her to the Spirit-land.

He bore his sickness like a true Christian; while dying he said "I heard a voice;" and raising his eyes with an intense look of gratitude, and pointing his finger, he whispered "Mother!"—and passed away: thus died this peaceable, pure-minded man.

He spent much of the last 12 years of his life in study and reflection. He delighted in astronomy and investigated the science with much enthusiasm, and to quite an extent; but the Bible was to him the Great Book. He studied it through by course 17 times in the last three years of his life, as he said always finding something new and elevating.

"One by one they are passing away,
The old of our town—to their final rest."

HON. JAIRUS HALL.

Judge Hall was born at New Braintree, Mass. in 1765; educated at Brown University, Providence; came to this town about 1790; was town clerk from 1791 to 1832; town, representative from 1804 to 1826; judge, of the county court from 1810 to 1814; justice of the peace for a generation. He married about 500 couples; brought up ten children; was a man of good sense, and abilities, social, genial, and a quiet, Christian gentleman.

He moved to Brattleboro in 1838 and soon after to Boston, where he died at the age of 84 years. A man of note and influence in this vicinity and well known throughout the county and state during the early part of the present century.

HON. STEPHEN P. FLAGG was born in Wilmington, Feb. 25, 1806, son of Timothy Flagg, one of the early inhabitants. He was educated at the common schools, but was passionately fond of music and devoted to it much time and study. While very young he taught singing-schools with good success in the principal towns of Windham, Rennington, Rutland and Addison Counties. For more than 40 years he led the choir of the Congregational Church in this place.

He had a taste for the military, at 21 he was a Lieut. of Cavalry, a regiment of militia formed in the west part of Windham County, and was soon after promoted successively to the Adjutancy, Lieut. Colonelcy and Colonelcy of the Regiment, and in 1832 was commissioned a Brigadier General then the youngest officer of his rank in the State.

In 1830, he married Lucinda Brown of this place. She died in 1857, leaving him four sons and one daughter.—In 1859 he married, Eunice Chapin of Bernardston, Mass. who survived him.

He was selectman in 1833, 34; town agent from 1841 to 64; town treasurer from 1849: justice of the peace from 1833; town clerk from 1836; and Treasurer of the Wilmington Savings Bank; which four last offices he continued to hold until his death.

He was a member of the Constitutional Convention, 1856; a member of the House in 1848, 49, 61. 2; a member of the Senate in 1864, 5.

He died, December 23, 1865.

He was scrupulously exact in the discharge of all public duties; no one ever questioned his fidelity or integrity in the performance of any public trust.

He was a lawyer of considerable eminence, whose briefs and arguments were always regarded with respect by the bar and consideration by the court.

In private life, he was modest and unpretending in his manners, steadfast in his friendship, and loved his native town and its history, his home and its associations.

During his professional life, he had several young men as partners, and was always ready to assist them in the commencement of their legal profession. In return they regarded him with honor and affection.

HON. JOHN H. FLAGG,

the second son of Hon. Stephen P. Flagg was 5 years Clerk of the Vermont House of Representatives; is now Executive Clerk of the United States Senate at Washington.

"MAJOR MORRIS."

Mr. John Morris familiarly known as Major Morris was one of King George's "volunteers." He was quite fond of telling how he came to this country. He was a tailor in Leeds, England, and being out one night on a spree, with his friends in the street, they were seized by a press gang of soldiers and forced on board a transport ship, and the next morning were underway for America. Upon his arrival, he was "enlisted" into Burgoyne's army, and was surrendered with Burgoyne at Saratoga. The prisoners were marched over the Green Mountains on their way to Boston. Major Morris said when he was passing through the woods, he thought that he did not wish to return to England and managed one night to make his escape. After wandering several days and becoming tired and hungry, he almost wished that he could return to the British army, and he set up his cane and concluded to take the direction it would fall, and it fell towards the "Regulars." "That was not fair!" he said and tried, it again, leaning it a little to the other way, and it fell to suit him, so he continued his course until he came to Wilmington, where he settled, married, and raised a respectable family.

WILD ANIMALS.

In the early years of the settlement wild animals were troublesome. Bears, wolves and catamounts were numerous and often committed depredations upon the domestic animals of the settlers. Capt. Chipman Swift who lived where Chauncy Smith now resides was a famous hunter. At one time, some strange animal was discovered in the top of a tall tree near the old burying-ground. No one dared to shoot it for fear it was the devil and might harm them. But Mr. Swift loaded his gun with two bullets and some buck-shot.—It should have the contents of his gun if it was the devil, himself and aiming between his two glaring eyes, he fired, bringing down a huge catamount, who pounced upon his faithful dog and tore him to pieces in his death struggles.

Other stories might be told, but this must suffice.

TEMPERANCE.

A large Temperance Society was formed in 1835, which did much good in the community. It flourished until the breaking out of the Rebellion when men's thoughts were turned in another direction, and during the war temperance languished.

The Waverly Lodge No. 83 I. O. of Good Templars was chartered June 20, 1868. It now has 63 members; seems to be in a flourishing condition; is constantly increasing in numbers.

„ J. W. Edmund Livermore:

Suspended work during the anti-masonic excitement from 1831 to 1856 when it was re-organized under a new charter, but bearing the same name and number, and has enjoyed prosperity up to the present time. It has some 79 members and is receiving new accessions at almost every regular communication. The stations at the present time (1869) are filled as follows:

F. J. Swift, W. M.

E. J. Titus, S. W.

C. C. Bemis, J. W.

EDUCATIONAL AND LITERARY.

The people have from the early settlement taken a great interest in education and in reading, books and papers. a town library of 200 volumes, choice books, was established about 1790, which was kept in good condition and enlarged for about 50 years; since then other libraries have been formed, public and private, including agricultural and

Young Men's Christian Association have been formed, while at the present time almost every man in town has a small library of useful books, and is well supplied with newspapers and periodicals which are universally read by all.

The Town contains 14 school districts, each of which has a good school-house; some of them very nice and commodious, in which schools are supported for two or three terms each year. A high school has been established at the Village which has usually been well sustained.

A newspaper called

THE GREEN MOUNTAIN EAGLE,

was published in 1850; but continued only a year or two, since which no paper has been published here.

THE VOICES OF THE NIGHT.

By MRS. A. M. PHILIPS.

(A native of Wilmington.)

Night's voices! how the feverish heat,
Engendered in the toils of life,

And all the restless fears that beat
With its intenser pain and strife;

The aspiring thought, the lofty vein,
The hopes that make our pathway bright

The grief that shrouds the heart in flame,
Yield to the voices of the night.

How softly to the ear they steal,
As if a spirit moved the air,

And to the thirsting soul reveal
A nobler life, divinely fair,

And on their wings the memories come
Of tones that now are with the blest,

And whisperings of that better home
Where all the weary are at rest.

The incense rising from the rose,
The perfume which the lily yields,
And sweeter than from censer flows
The fragrance of the new mown fields,

Lending to sense a soothing balm
As faith controls the waves of grief

And pours upon the heart the calm,
Still waters of an endless peace.

The dews which from the skies distil,
Their cooling to the leaves impart,

As drops of grace refine and fill
The silent caverns of the heart.

And, lo! the murmur of a stream
That bounds in music to the sea.

The spirit of its song doth seem
A breathing of eternity.

And now the wind that parts the leaves
And whispers through the violet-bed;

That plays among the tasseled sheaves,
Steals softly round my aching head.

With tones of peace from spirit friends
Who fold their white arms round me now,

And message borne of comfort blends
With the cool breath that bathes my brow.

And from the dark, green waving woods
That crown the mount and kiss the stars

And from earth's deepest solitudes
Comes music which the soul unbars
To voices of the spirit-land,
Now calling me away, away
To climes whose skies are ever bland,
Whose seasons are eternal May.

I strain my eyes to catch a glance
Of that unfading land of light;
And though far off its pastures seem,
Yet in the stillness of the night,
An angel comes with snow-white wings
And writes a prayer deep in my heart,
And hope sits by my side and sings
Till darkness doubt and fear depart.

Not where the brightest sunlight pours,
Not where unmingled splendor shines,
The aspiring soul the highest soars
Or reads its joy in fairest lines;
But when the gorgeous day-god sleeps
And night's dear lamps burn still and lone,
The soul a heavenly noontide keeps
Within the radiance of His throne.

The stars fade out, the moon departs.

Up in the east there comes the sun.

Take courage, O, ye fainting hearts!

For life's great toil will soon be done.

Not in the grave will songs be heard

By voices of earth's day or night;

But upward like a soaring bird,
Shall sing ourselves in fadeless light.

THE NEW YEAR'S PRAYER.

(In the days of the Southern Rebellion.)

By D. GILBERT DEXTER.

(One year ago, during the midnight hour when the old year faded into eternity, and a new one commenced its historical journal, a lone soldier's widow knelt in her solitary cot in the village of W.—While the sun came forth from his eastern home, a neighbor called at the door, and there in the solemn attitude of prayer, was the widow—but she moved not, neither did she speak, for "the spirit had returned to him who gave it.")

The wintry moon shines cold and still,
And the winds unds hoarse and drear,
As it echoes along o'er valley and hill'

With its icy breath and freezing chill,
While 'tis sighing the old, old year!

The old, old year is past and gone.
With its care, its strife and its blood,

And a mother is kneeling and weeping alone
With a trusting heart and a trembling tone
As she prays to the ALL FATHER GOD.

List! the notes and the words of this morning prayer

In the cot so lone and still,

Mark, the beating heart and the lines of care,

The emphasis tone and faith so rare,

Enchaining the soul with a thrill.

She prays Oh Father! Saviour mine!
Redeemer, Maker all divine!

Look down upon unworthy me
Who hopeth in immortality.

Our country, bleed ng, torn and rent,
Distracts my mind from calm content,
The throbbing heart and tearful eye,
But tell us joys are born to die.

* * * * *

The husband dear went forth to fight
For God, for freedom, faith and right.
An only son stood by my side with sire;
The sire is low and not a breath
Will wipe away the seal of death;—

The son is dying far away
In dungeon damp where sunny ray Ne'er lends its cheer, no comfort near
To usher in the new, new year.

On thy altar, O, Columbia fair!
I've laid my earthly jewels rare—

VERMONT CAMP SONG.

BY MRS. D. GILBERT DEXTER.

[Published in Milliken's Vermont Record at Brandon, 1863.— Ellen Simonds, one of six sisters and ten children of Dea. Asa Simonds of Peru,—See History of Peru, Vol. I. graduated, Fem. Sem. Troy, N. Y. taught popularly, music, painting, French, etc. at Milton Fem. Sem. 3 years and in 1856 married Mr. Dexter, a merchant at Wilmington. They have several children. This was Mrs. Dexter's first poem published.]

I.

Come, gather round the board, my lads,
Oh, gather round to-day,
And sing of home, our dearest home,
On the mountains far away;
We've left the home of early days,
To fight for God and right—
We'll never yield the gory field
Till truth shall rule with might.
Then cheer, boys! cheer, boys!
The battle has begun—

For Freedom fight
With holy might,
The victory shall be won.

II.

Shall we forget the days of yore,
The fields our fathers trod,
When Ethan Allen bold and true,
Fought for our cause and God?
No, no, we'll ne'er forget our sires
When battle rages high—
We'll ne'er forget they firmly stood
And fought to win or die.
Then cheer, boys! cheer, boys! &c.

III.

For "Freedom and for Unity,"
The motto of the brave,
We'll ever stand, brave mountain band,
"The Ship of State" to save;
Then rally, brothers of Vermont,
Around "the stripes and stars,—
Yes, rally once again, ye braves
Down with "the stars and bars!"
Then shout, boys! shout, boys!
The battle has begun—
For Freedom fight
With holy might,
The victory shall be won.

IV.

Green Mountain Boys! Brave Mountain Boys!
Come, rally round the flag
Our fathers bought with bloody price
From "John of ancient Brag."
We will retain our fathers' name
And punish deeds of wrong,
And never yield the crimson field,
But fight with sword and song.
Then shout, boys! &c.

FANUM LÆTITIAE.

BY GERTRUDE I. DEXTER.

[Daughter of D. Gilbert and Ellen Dexter.]
Building still by mystic fingers,
Raising high its gilded spires,
Dimly seen through hazy distance,
Stands the goal of great desires.
To this bright and beauteous temple
Over devious paths that tried
To the utmost, firm reliance,
Trust in God whate'er betide.
Comes an aged pilgrim, laden
With a lifetime's gleanings rare,
Standing at the outer entrance
Fain to ask admittance there.

'Neath the arcade, weary, waiting,
 Leans a youth, the gods were kind,
 Gifting him with wondrous talents,
 Grace of limb and might of mind.
 'Neath the portals stands a maiden
 Bearing offerings to the shrine
 Of her young life's glad ambition,
 Seeking peace in things divine.

But unto their mortal vision
 Those celestial gates unclose,
 Never, though from morn till even,
 Angels entering disclose
 Beauties brighter than the gorgeous
 Tints of fair Italia's skies,
 Pleasures rarer than the dreamings
 Of a primal Paradise.

Now a bright seraph being
 Stoops and whispers words of cheer, Saying: "Like us thou shalt surely Enter one day, without fear."

HON. HENRY M. DICKINSON, eldest son of Madison Dickenson was born in this town, July 7, 1835; entered Williams College, 1855, graduated 1859. He was Editor of the Williams Quarterly Magazine while there, which he edited with marked ability. He applied himself with intense devotion to his studies. Few better students, probably ever lived. When he left Williams he studied law with Mr. Follett of Readsboro a few months and in 1860, took the regular course in the Law School at Ann Arbor, Mich. reading at vacations with Hon. Chas. I. Walker of Detroit. He arrived at Omaha, in April 1862; appointed Judge of Probate, October 1864, which office he held at the time of his death, July 20, 1865, from congestion of the brain, sick but a few days. Says "The Omaha Daily Republican" in obituary notice: "There are few, if any men in the community who had more friends."

Well may Vermont feel proud of such a son, and well may she lay up a memento in her archives of the noble and gifted that pass away from earth.

Toll the bell quietly.
 Toll it with care,
 Bear its chimes tenderly
 On far Western air;
 The noble and gifted
 Hath struggled with death!

Toll the bell solemnly,
 Son of the West,

Father and brothers
 And sister and others
 Are weeping in sorrow—

Mother, he had one,
 A dear one and true,
 Whose harp lies unstrung,
 Life's journey through;
 Friends met in glory,
 Ne'er will they part.
 A son and a mother,
 Heart prest to heart.

Toll the bell carefully,
 Precious the dust,
 Son of the mountains,
 In God put his trust.
 Smooth the sod tenderly,
 O'er the still breast,
 Calmly and dreamily
 Now he's at rest.

LITTLE EVA.

Little Eva, gentle Eva,
 Bud of spring and blossom fair—
 Lovely gem and household fairy,
 Lost to earth and earthly snare—
 In the regions made immortal,—
 In the clime so fair and bright,
 There the angels greet thy presence
 In the calm of endless light.

Little Eva, gentle Eva,
 Knows no pain or sorrow there,
 Where the angels chant their anthems.
 Where earth's hopes and blossoms are;
 For she's joined the choir angelic,
 And she'll watch us while we sleep—
 Filling dreams of perfect pleasure—
 Calming us to hope—not weep.

THE HISTORY

OF Sutton,

1803—1888.

By Hon. J. E. Willard.

FROM VOLUME V. OF THE VERMONT HISTORICAL GAZETTEER.

Abby Maria Hemenway, Pub.

PRICE FIFTY CENTS.

CHICAGO:

1888.

SUTTON.

BY HON. J. E. WILLARD,

In his frock of blue,
He stood up, hardy and true,—
Every inch a man;—
Beat him this day if you can. [Old Settler]

SUTTON.

IN 1803,

The Grand List was made up as follows: polls at $ 20, each; improved land at $ 1,75 per acre; oxen at $ 10; three-years old $6,50; cows at $6,50; two-years old, $5; horses $13,50; two-years old, $6,50; one-year old, $3,50; watches at $5; and $5; framed houses appraised and then assessed at 2 per cent.

Enoch Blake had a house valued at $250; he, also, had a watch. Thomas Colby and Enoch True each had a house valued at $100, and each a watch.—These were the only framed houses and time-pieces in town; not as yet, had any person a sheep or a clock.

IN 1804.

In 1804, there were 58 polls assessed; nine less than in 1803: and there were the same number of polls in 1805 as in 1804.

IN 1806

there were 67 polls assessed in town.—Among the arrivals of 1806, was that of Stephen Eastman, who settled on "Right No. 26."

IN REMEMBRANCE

OF STEPHEN EASTMAN,

his descendants thought it well to have a re-union of the children and other relatives of the Eastman family at the house of the writer, Sept. 15, 1880. The day was not pleasant, but over 180 persons attended. The first order of the day was refreshments, the second, choice of A. H. Ball, for president, after which, the exercises were:

1st Singing by the kindred; and,
Prayer by Rev. B. A. Sherwood of Sutton.

WELCOME BY M. A. TAFT, Sutton:

Mr. President,

Ladies and Gentlemen:

It may seem strange to you that I should take the stand to welcome you to another man's home. But you should remember that we are all more or less governed by circumstances, and our surroundings and the circumstances in which we are placed make us, to a great extent what we are. This being the case, it has fallen to my lot to make a few remarks at this time; and in behalf of my highly esteemed friend, Mr. J. E. Willard and his worthy companion, I bid you all a hearty welcome to their pleasant home and its beautiful surroundings. Not only do I welcome these kindred here to-day, but, I welcome these townsmen and these neighbors, and am happy to think that these friends are so kind and have come here to help make this gathering a success. Now what we want is that all should feel free and at home, and I am quite sure that if all that are here on this occasion were as well acquainted with Mr. Willard as I am, and knew his large heartedness as well as I do, you would have no fears, and would receive this welcome as genuine and heartfelt. Not far from here among these green hills and fertile fields our fathers leveled the forests and broke the virgin soil, and our mothers (how sacred their memory) shared the hardship toils and dangers of a pioneer life; while they worshipped Him who was their guide, their light, their life and their all.

This is a meeting of the Eastman family, assembled for mutual benefit and pleasure; and if we rightly understand the characteristics of the family, there are none here that are so selfish as to wish for the pleasures of the hour to the family alone; but are very grateful to these old neighbors and friends that were so willing to respond to the invitation given them and meet with us at this our first re-union. We have come from the North and the South, from the East and from the West, a respectable company drawn together by the ties of kindred to renew old acquaintances and establish new friendships; to trace various grades of relationship and learn more of the history of the race. I trust we shall throw aside the cares and perplexities of life for the hour; and feel that it is good for us to be here. We meet near the place where our ancestor once lived and where many of their posterity now reside and their green graves in the cemetery on yonder hill or those in the adjoining towns are made sacred to us as the repositories of their dust. No costly monuments may mark their resting places, yet this gathering of the family shows that they are remembered in the affections and hearts of their posterity. Could great-grandfather Stephen and his children be permitted to stand upon the battlements of Heaven and from those lofty heights behold this assembly, would they not say that the promises of God to the patriarchs of old had been fulfilled when he said I will multiply thee exceedingly. What memories rise before us as we look back over the past seventy years and more when our fathers built their homes in the wilderness on that beautiful and fertile strip of rolling land. But of these and their trials and dangers, through which our ancestor and their descendants have passed, it is not for us to speak. As I study the history of the race I learn that it is noted for its industry, honesty, energy and frugality; and when the dark clouds of war have hung over the nation, they have taken an active and patriotic part in support of the government. And now while corruption and wrong stalk boldly at noonday, may we be found fighting manfully for the right.

My friends, this is a meeting long to be remembered by some that are here before me: These friends that are in the morning of life, if they are permitted to live to old age will look back to this gathering with pleasure and pride, and to them it will be as a bright oasis in the desert of life. Kindred and friends, this occasion is a joyous one! and yet as our imagination tries to penetrate the future there is sadness that comes stealing over the mind as we think how soon the scythe of time will break up our pleasant and quiet families. Another decade will mark many changes with this company here assembled. The generations that were in advance of the older present, have all passed away; our aged mother and friend that died last winter was the last one. And as I look over this company I see quite a large number with whitened locks and trembling limbs and faltering steps, and soon, and very soon, life's cares with them will end and they will be gathered with the generations that have gone before.

In conclusion let me say a few words for the three towns in which most of the descendants of grandfather Stephen reside, Lyndon, Wheelock and Sutton. We love their towering hills and gushing rills; we love their maple groves and forest shades; we love their green vallies and beautiful fields; we love the sweet, solemn tones of their church bells that call us to the house of prayer and praise; yes, and why not? our fathers and mothers before us loved them and it was in the midst of these pleasant surroundings they lived and toiled, died and were buried. How it is with you, my friends, I know not, but as for me, where my kindred have lived, let me live, where they have labored, let me labor, where they have died, let me die, and beside their graves, let me rest.

The parting at the close of these exercises will be the last farewell for some of us, but may we so live that when the splendors of the millennium shall come we may partake of them; and and when the end shall be, and the world shall be rolled up like a worn-out vesture, and the arching skies shall have passed away like a forgotten dream, when eternity with its deep sounding waves shall break upon the rocks of time and sweep them away, forever,— then in a brighter, may we meet again in a greater and grander reunion, which shall last through the ceaseless ages of eternity.

HISTORICAL ADDRESS

BY J. E. WILLARD.

NOTE. I have only taken such extracts from the Address as I thought would be of general interest.

The first settlements in New England were made by emigrants who on account of their religious belief were persecuted, and to obtain that liberty came to an unbroken wilderness,— to brave the perils of wild beasts and savages, bidding farewell to friends that could not go with them, came to establish homes for themselves and children here. Large numbers flocked to these shores for about nineteen years— until the great civil conflict under Cromwell commenced when those in favor of enlarged religious privileges regarded it better to stay and assist in securing them. During the time named in 1638, Daniel Denison, Simeon Bradstreet and others procured a grant of a portion of land in the north east corner of "Massachusetts Bay" for a settlement. In 1640, it received the name of Salsbury, a few years later was divided, the part called Amesburg. Among the grantees was Roger Eastman, born in Wales in 1611. He married in 1639 Sarah— born in 1621. He was a carpenter by trade and his presence with the first settlers must have been a great help to the place—a man to build their houses and barns and mills for them.

The children of Roger and Sarah Eastman were:

- John, born, January 1640 :
- Nathaniel, born, Mar. 18, 1643 :
- Philip, born, Oct. 20, 1644 :
- Thomas, born, September 1646 :
- Timothy, born, Sept. 29, 1648 :
- Joseph, born, Nov. 8, 1650 :
- Benjamin, born, Feb. 12, 1652 :
- Sarah, born, July 25, 1655 :
- Samuel, born, Sept. 20, 1657 :
- Ruth, born, Mar. 21, 1660 :

I think, the children all settled in Massachusetts; and as emigration almost ceased after the success of Cromwell, I think that it is safe to assume that Roger is the father of all the Eastmans in the United States. When the first church was organized in Salsbury, 1687, the Eastmans were fairly represented, and continued to join as long as we have any record at hand. Roger died, Dec. 16, 1694, aged 83 years; Sarah, his wife, Mar. 10, 1698, age 77.

When the state line between Massachusetts and New Hampshire became established, about 1740, Roger Eastman of Amesburg, Mass. found his residence located in the town of Newton, N. H. His children were:

Thomas, born in Amesburg; married Sarah Sargent; moved to Weare, N. H.; afterward settled in Newbury, Vt.

Stephen, born in Newton, Mar. 27, 1744;

Samuel, born, Oct. 8, 1746, settled in Weare:

Ichabod, born, May 22, 1749; settled in Weare, N. H.

Nicholas, born, Jan. 16, 1751:

Isaac, born, Oct. 30, 1754; married Hannah George; 10 children who settled in Maine, New Hampshire and Vermont.

STEPHEN EASTMAN,

the second son of Isaac, married Anna Colby and moved to Bow, N. H. in 1774 or '75. In 1776, the selectmen of the towns of the state circulated association "Test papers" which are now on file in the Secretary of State office at Concord and read as follows:

"We, the subscribers, do hereby engage and promise that we will to the utmost at the risk of our lives and fortunes with arms oppose the hostile proceedings of the British fleets and armies against the United American Colonies."

On the paper filed by the town of Bow, N. H. appears the name of Stephen Eastman, he being one of 8199 men who signed in the State of New Hampshire. The paper uttered treason against the mother country; every person signing it, if the colonies should not succeed, would be liable to have his property confiscated and himself to be hung or banished. Imagine the trial for a man with four small children to support the oldest not yet seven, to take such a stand! But none who knew him will doubt that when he was convinced that it was right that he would try to evade any part of it. Some here can well remember that until past eighty, he would with staff in hand every Sabbath, in fair or foul weather, walk 6 or 8 miles and return to attend the church of which he was a member.

The children of Stephen and Anna Eastman were:

Elizabeth, born, Oct. 22, 1767:

Hannah, born, Oct. 13, 1769:

Elizabeth, born, Nov. 30, 1771:

Janeworth, born, Mar. 29, 1774:

Stephen, born, July 23, 1776:

Rachel, B., born, January 1779:

Eli, born, Nov. 15, 1782:

Anna, born, Aug. 12, 1785 :

David, born, July 3, 1788 :

Mary, born, Apr. 30, 1791 :

Stephen had a small place, but was a shoemaker and followed his trade, and wished to have his son, Stephen, also follow the same business; but it was distasteful to him, and when, one day, a pair of shoes, not very clean brought in to be repaired, his father requested him to clean and mend them, he bolted, or stated, then and there, that with this job ended his shoemaker's trade. Not long after, as according to the custom in those days, for the shoemaker to go from house to house to make the inhabitants their boots and shoes, his father was away on one of these expeditions, Stephen, Jr. went and conferred with his uncle Colby about what course he should pursue, who advised him to make a bee and fell 10 acres of trees on his father's farm and follow farming. He then was only fifteen, but followed the advice.

When his father came home and saw what had been done in his absence, he exclaimed we are ruined ! But from that time things began to prosper better and he admired the management of his son so well he gave all the property into his hands, expecting him to stay at home and take care of him and his wife in their old age. After a little, a new house was to be erected.—The father wished the front to face the highway, but Stephen preferred the end to face the road. Each was so strong that theirs was the best way, Stephen said, I will assist to get the frame up, then I shall seek some other place for myself. Small matters at first have caused nations to change their course, the same will hold of individuals. The way a house should front resulted in Stephen Eastman, Jr. leaving the old home and emigrating to Vermont.—He first went to his uncle William Clement in Danville, who kindly spent some time in assisting his nephew in finding a place to locate. They first looked over Danville and Wheelock, then came to Billymead, now Sutton, and purchased 100 acres, July 12, 1804, it being a part of the farm Jonathan Eastman now owns. Not a tree had then been cut ; the only log-cabin from Lyndon and Wheelock town lines to this place was Deacon Richardson's.—After receiving a deed, he contracted to have the trees felled on 10 acres and the land cleared ready for a crop in the spring of 1806.

He moved from New Hampshire in February 1806, into Bradbury M. Richardson's house, which stood near the orchard in the field toward C. W. Willard's residence; June 16th, following raised a house on his premises near the house in which Jonathan Eastman now lives ; and David Eastman was born the same day. He moved into his house during the summer. Rachel, his wife, was obliged to go to Deacon Richardson's for some time still to do her baking. She had to carry David, the baby in her arms, and he, Lyndia, the little girl two years old—and the meal. The boards to cover his house he had to drag with a team from the Hollow. As late as 1816, the only clock in town was owned by Caleb Fish and there were 2 watches and 9 framed houses in town. How could we do, do you think, with only three time-pieces in town? or go the best of a mile and carry two babies through the wood to bake? or to draw our boards 3 miles to cover our buildings—with a chain? Yet our fathers and mothers were obliged to undergo these hardships; and I presume did without a murmur. These early settlers are very good examples for us to look back upon, if the cares of life pressed they never thought of suicide; but "put their shoulder to the wheel."

He was interested in the State, in its matters; he was interested in the church and ever ready to perform his part. In 1837, when schisms had crept into the churches here and destroyed their usefulness and it was thought best to reorganize the Free Will Baptist Church in Sutton, he threw open his doors and Rev. Daniel and Joshua Quinby and David Sweat formed themselves with twenty others into a church which has ever prospered and is the same organization now at Sutton Village.

Although the Eastmans have never been distinguished for great things they have ever been performing little acts of kindnesses, one of which I will narrate. It was a custom of early settlers to serve a notice on persons liable to come to want, warning them out of town. Stephen Eastman had lived in town about four years when the matter came up in a town-meeting of warning Aaron Baldwin and his family to depart from town so they might not gain a residence. Stephen Eastman was not accustomed to speaking in public, but on this occasion he arose and addressed his fellow townsmen with so much feeling and justice Mr. Baldwin was not warned out, nor any other person for several years after.

He was very eccentric in some things, especially in his dress. On one occasion, doing business at Sutton Corner, one of the villagers said to him why do you come here in such clothes? Why not wear better ones? The old gentleman looked at the good suit of his interrogator and replied, "I pay for what I wear!" Perhaps his interrogator's not paying for his apparel was the first step which lead him to ruin. Often have we seen this venerable man at church dressed in his home-made pants, vest and blue woolen frock, and I have thought that he took as much pride in wearing such suits as his girls did in their silk dresses and gold necklaces with which he had furnished them.

Another characteristic trait of our good old man was rising early and retiring early; many and many a time, have we known him retire before dark and be up by three o'clock at work the next morning. The year that he was eighty, he rove and shaved by hand 135,000 shingles.

Eli Eastman, his brother, had a good farm in the town of Wheelock, and was a tolerable good farmer, and a man of property, but was different in many respects from the rest of his relatives: they were spry at work, he slow; they had their work done in season, he was always behind; they were ready to retire early, he late; they had their debts paid, he was sometimes slack about his.

On one occasion a creditor brought a suit against him and then proposed to have his brother, Stephen, come over and appraise neat cattle enough to pay him and he would take them at Stephen's appraisal, to which Eli agreed and Stephen came over from Sutton and appraised the cattle; but when Eli heard the price, he refused to let them go. — Stephen and the creditor took the bars of the fence down, drove them away, and that debt was paid.

When Stephen, Jr. left his parents in Bow, N. H. he had a deed of the property there. As soon as Stephen had gone, his father selected David, his youngest son to stay at home, a man of aimable and even disposition. Stephen, Jr. soon saw it would be for the advantage of his father and brother to come to Vermont to live, and he selected a tract in the edge of Lyndon and adjoining his farm for them, and then went to Bow for them: but no argument could convince them until he said you will be obliged to go with me, for I have sold and deeded the house. He had done it over their heads, necessity compelled them to leave. On their removal, the whole family, 9 children and their families with one exception, came to Vermont.

There have not been any very eminent men in this branch of the Eastmans; but if we have no great men to admire or refer to in our family pride, we have something far superior. — We can boast, and I am proud to, that not one in the connection, was ever convicted or even accused of any crime; nor are there any drunkards, nor any that make a practice to use profane language; nor do you see them noisy, rude, ready to dispute, quarrel or fight. They are quiet, peaceable citizens such as have a tendency to elevate any community in which they reside.

THE OLD SETTLER'S FAMILY GATHERING POEM.

BY HON. J. E. WILLARD OF SUTTON.
PRESIDENT MOST HONORABLE:

I came here to-day
To see and to hear; and not to spout away!
And the fact is, I've not the jewel of a word;
And days like this, only jewel-words should be heard.

I very well know I could better afford
To keep still, than to hear some one say I am bored.

Still at high noon you said "a five minutes say
I must furnish, deliver, or squarely disobey."

A true Eastman obeys his President's behest;
So I'll say a few words of the Eastmans at rest.

I so aver: at an old Eastman's ancestral hall,
The armor once worn, still hangs on the wall,
The sword in its sheath, the lance placed at rest,

And the battles they have been through are told at their best;

And the grandfather's tale, and the dear mother's story

Fling around each old name a halo of glory.

The Eastmans of Vermont who're entitled to fame,

I'll not this day undertake to mention by name;

The names are too many, they've so gone on before

And are waiting to meet us when trouble is o'er.

How often we speak of the absent and dead,
How often we think of their faces;

How often we see when the banquet is spread,
That new ones are filling their places.

They are with us in spirit, they are present I ween,

They are hovering near, near enough to be seen,

Were our mortal eyes able the brightness to bear,

The glory we've faith to believe they now wear.

I have thought as I sat here, my heart aglow,

Of the good those Eastmans did long years ago.

When they voted at Bow (to us a good lesson.)
"No spirits, but good coffee be furnished at the Eastmans Reunion."

I wish I could sing like the minstrel of old,
Their virtues all shining in song should be told;

Their good deeds on record, I'd brightly unfold;

I would have their names written in letters of gold.

Our Eastmans of Vermont were as true and as good

As those Eastmans that before your great-grand-father stood:

In defending the right and defending the poor
No men of their means have ever done more.
Let us copy their virtues, and live just as wise,
Fulfilling each duty, its day,—in that true honor lies,—
That our lives may be right, that our record may show
For the years as they come and the years as they go,
For sooner or later, we very well know
The places we'll fill are under the snow.

OUR ANCESTRAL DEAD.

By MRS. L. SULLOWAY OF WHEELOCK.

In memory of our ancestral dead,
Stephen and David, much is said;
But what example did they give
That we may learn of them to live?
In early life they sought and found the Lord;
And found Him faithful to His blessed word;
They saw His justice shine, they felt his grace,
And found in Him a peaceful hiding-place.
No flowery garlands here to-day we bring;
But grateful hearts their praise to lowly sing.
The honest truth most simply said
Is the best ornament to bear the dead.

.....
In Vanity Fair, their way winding through,
What in that place did our forefathers do?
They raised a warning loud, a warning long,
A warning that almost shook that ancient town.

.....
No flowery paths, our fathers cried, lead us to God!

With iron and with brass we need be shod;
Thick dangers gather here and many a snare;
But promised strength is swifly gained by prayer.

Pilgrims and strangers! walking the Upper
way,
And angel-guided sweetly upward, day by day;

They gave up all, all for Heaven, made God their Friend,

And then, His blessing He did on them send.

Blessed them, abundant blessed in basket and in store;

And blessed with smiling children more and more;

Yet some, His Reaper, Death, laid 'neath the turf,

Least they might lean too much on earth.

They humbly saw the Reaper's was the hand of God,

And meekly knelt in prayer beneath the rod.

.....
They searched the sacred Scripture-text, so well they read,

The neighboring poor were clothed and fed;

But not one cent did from their pockets go

To make an empty, vain and pride-swelled show.

They built an altar to the Lord

And near it lay His precious word;

They called it Bethel; from that day,

From vain amusements turned away.

With reverence we recall the names

Of Father Taft and Richardson and more,

A host of godly men passed on before

That wait our coming on the shining shore.

.....
Could they speak from their cold clay,
Nothing greater to us could they say
Than, dear children watch! watch and pray,
And prepare you well for the judgement day.

.....
After the poems, were remarks by Rev. M. C. Henderson of St. Johnsbury, Rev. A. B. Sherwood of Sutton,
Dea. Peter Woodman and Dea. David Eastman of Lyndon, and Dea. Andrew P. Taft, Sutton; and then prayer by Rev. M. C. Henderson, which closed the ceremonies.

RECORD OF SUTTON

Con. from page 5.

In 1805,

Mar. 25, voted the selectmen reasonable compensation for their services. Up to this time the town officers had received no pay and now only the selectmen were to have pay.

In 1806,

Otis L. Hidden settled on right 22:— on what place, I do not know, but I think it must have been where Daniel

Lee now resides: this, I think, was the first settlement on what is known as North Ridge. There were no openings made except by residents of the town, for several years, as I find no new names on the grand list as late as 1810.

IN 1811:

The town conducted its affairs with the strictest economy. It was voted to raise $ 11. to defray town expenses.

The inhabitants, also conducted their affairs on the old Puritanic principles as will be seen by vote at March meeting, 1811, "that rams shall be secured from the 1st day of September until the 20th day of November and if the said owners of rams shall let them said rams run into the inclosures of any person said rams to be forfeited to the persons into whose inclosures they shall break and if the said person into whose inclosure they shall break shall give up said rams to the owner, the person so giving up said rams, shall forfeit and pay to said town five dollars."

The people have ever been willing to support the government with men and means; not only in the last war, but in the war of 1812 with England. There never was but one draft of men in this town: that was when the general draft, as an experiment was made in the late war, and if we had had an opportunity to fill the call there would have been no occasion for it.

In a town meeting legally warned and holden, May 25, 1812, it was voted to buy 32 lbs. of powder, 100 lbs. of lead and 128 flints.

June 12, 1812, it was voted in town meeting that all of their men that went into the service of the United States in the army, they should be compensated as those that did not go.

Voted also "in case of a complaint from the Captain that any poor soldiers are not able to equip the selectmen are to procure such equipments at the expense of the town."

March 14, 1814, the town voted to procure 16 cartridges to each gun.

THE GREAT MUSTER.

General Cushman of Guildhall ordered out the Brigade of Militia to muster in October 1824, at Sutton.-- The field used for parade and drill extended from the road leading north from the Village to and including the farm of Corydon Parker. I do not think a better field of land could be found in this part of the state for such a purpose, but the accommodations in this town were very small to entertain five thousand men, and the weather being cold caused considerable suffering; still the people did everything possible to make them comfortable. Our clothier, Mr. Holmes, loaned webs of cloth to cover them at night; yet the men were exasperated at the General for calling them so far, some over 70 miles, there were threats when they went into a sham fight they would kill him. — On the last day of the muster the brigade were drawn up in two files and ordered to fire at the General's horse's tail as he rode down the centre. He heard bullets whistle by him as he rode along. He did not try it but once; after that he rode in the rear of his men.

IN 1819:

The town expenses were as follows, to wit:

"Roswell Cheney for making Grand List $1'50.

Benj. Campbell, settling with Town Treasurer 40

James Way, for services and necessities furnished Taylor Norris $7,76.

Thomas True, services	$ 5.56.
Jacob Webster, articles furnished,
Taylor Norris	$ 4.00.
Jokton Putnam, services	$ 1.75.
Ira Goodrich, services and articles furnished Taylor Norris	$ 7.17.
Caleb Fisk, services	$ 4.22.
Andrew Brown, services	'50.
Jacob Shaw for settling with treasurer.	'50

Amount $ 33.36.

These statistics are an average neither higher or lower.

The above expenses did not include the building or repairing the roads or highways.

CHURCHES.

The first church in town was the

FREE WILL BAPTIST,

it was organized by Elder Eliphalet Maxfield, July 30, 1800; Joshua Horr, John Atwood, David Norris, David Bean, Zebulon Norris, Hannah Horr, six original members. John Atwood was chosen clerk.

The Creed adopted was these words: "And it appears the spirit of truth was working with the children of men and we would say as Iasiah did "Behold, God is my salvation, I will trust and not be afraid for the Lord Jehovah is my strength and my song, he, also, is become my salvation."

At the next monthly conference, Josiah Norris, Lois Richardion and Hannah Bean joined the little church, and at the monthly conference in October, Joseph Richardson and others joined, and Joshua Horr was elected deacon.— Here the record is so obliterated by newspaper clippings pasted upon the leaves by Eugene M. Campbell to make a scrap-book, that we cannot learn anything more of the pioneer church, for about two years.

In 1802 was the quarterly meeting for setting apart of Eliphalet Maxfield for the work whereunto the Lord would have him."

At a monthly meeting in May 1802, the church voted to reject Samuel Orcutt in the following words:

"State of Vermont

Friend Samuel Orcutt,

Whereas we have taken all the pains and used all the means necessary to reclaim you from your fall from the holy confession and solemn engagement that you made with us in brotherhood for to keep up the public worship of God and to walk in the laws and ordinances of our Lord Jesus Christ, and to watch over us and we over you done by revaulted to our grief and we are sorry that your abstinence is such such that we are brought to the disagreeable necessity to reject you off from your membership for it is like cutting off the Right hand, or plucking out a eye but in honor to the cause of Christ and our duty to you we do solemnly withdraw the hand of fellowship from you and you to be no more a member of this church until you return by repentance for which we pray God to give you repentance to the acknowledgment of the truth as it is in Christ Jesus our Saviour

Billymead May 27., 1802

Signed in behalf of the Church"

John Atwood Church Clerk"

REV. AMOS BECKWITH IN SUTTON.

During the year 1802, Amos Beckwith a Baptist clergyman with Calvinistic proclivities came into town from Putney, Vt. and held meetings in a log-school-house near what is now known as the Powers place at Sutton Corner.

Holding many Calvinistic views, yet according to Calvin's principles not strictly orthodox, was Mr. B.

In April 1803, the church was partially re-organized: no doubt to see if they could not all be united in one body under the following covenant, Amos Beckwith, moderator.

First. that it is the duty of all Christians to join together in solemn covenant to keep up the public worship of God and walk together in the ordinances of the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ.

Second. That we must be agreed in the commands of Christ or we cannot be bretheren in visible unity.

Third. That we are agreed the scriptures are the only rule for the Christian church to make her appeals to and in case of controversy of any matter arising not determined by the scriptures the major may rule the minor.

Fourth. That a person may be admitted a member of this church upon his or her confession of their faith in our Lord Jesus Christ upon satisfaction of the church.

Fifth. That we believe the only mode of baptism is by immersion it is not our minds to receive any member into this church to the grief of any of the bretheren

CHURCH COVENANT: We now in the presence of the Great God in the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ give up ourselves to God and each other by the will of God in solemn covenant to watch over ourselves and each other in love and to keep up the worship of God submitting to the discipline of this church as a part of Christ's material body to watch together in the ordinances of our Lord Jesus Christ in obedience to his commands endeavoring to promote each others spiritual and temporal happiness according to the gifts and graces that God giveth still looking for more light and Glorious opening of the scriptures until to coming of our Lord Jesus Christ. X"

At this meeting they chose Thomas Colby and Enoch True deacons, and Bradbury M. Richardson, clerk.

I do not think all the old members joined this new organization, or if they did they soon formed another and called themselves the Free Willers. and held their meetings in a log school house near the forks of the highway just north of where A. H. Ball now resides.

Their discipline was strict and unyielding. A member transgressing in any matter, though of minor importance, if it was contrary to discipline, was sure to be labored with as may be seen by some extracts of letters and records:

"To Moses H. Brewer

this from your once professed bretheren the church of Christ in Billymead. Whereas you gave yourself a member of this church and we promised to take the watch and care of you we feel duty bound so to do and as you have withdrawn from us and conducted very perversely and talked very foolishly about brother David Bean and brother Moulton M. Richardson in saying one would lye and the other would swear to it we look upon such things as very unbecoming among bretheren therefore we hope and trust in the fear of God we strictly admonish you to refrain from these things and confess your fault and forsake evils and return again to the cause of God that you professed and your bretheren may God grant it for Christ sake

Billymead June 10th 1803 by order of the church

Thomas Colby"

FOR NOT ATTENDING MEETING.

To a member:—from a letter.

"Remember that you are eternity bound and that your soul is of Great value when once lost lost to an never ending eternity may God grant that you may consider on the things that make for peace before they be everlastingly hid from thine eyes"

In 1809, John Colby, a son of Dea. Thomas Colby, commenced preaching; there being two separte meetings, he endeavored to unite them and several meetings were held to see if the two could not be united.

In October 1810, a meeting was held for uniting all the bretheren in one body. [They seemed to want to all come together, but somehow could'nt.]

Finally, Oct. 21, 1810, the celebrated Ring Church was thus formed: All the bretheren and all the sisters of the two churches, or so many of them, the school-house to which they came would not hold them; and the people all went out on to the Common and there held their meeting; and the young Preacher after delivery of a suitable address, invited all desirous of embodying in one church to stand around in a circle that their names might be taken; and the number being one hundred and eleven that stood around in the circle, they there joined hands forming a continuous ring and knelt down and agreed to walk together in love.

In 1811, the church voted that when the church disowned a member, it should be made known in a public assembly. In 1812, one of its members was known to be under the influence of strong drink and the church voted, the member confessing to them, and then making a public confession, he should be received into full fellowship or that the church would be satisfied.

In the fall, trouble began to show itself by Rev. Amos Beckwith objecting to have members cry out and shout, and by his belief that a church should have other rules to govern them besides scripture, and this trouble or controversy grew to such proportion, a new church was formed by Rev. A. Beckwith which continued its organization till about 30 years since when the remaining members joined the F. W. Baptists here. The cause of the trouble can be better understood by producing the record, 1813:

"After opening the meeting by prayer to God for wisdom the church voted the scriptrures is a sufficient rule to govern the church."

"Voted that they think Elder Beckwith is wrong in saying the scriptures is not a sufficient rule for the church."

"It was tried to see if the bretheren are agreed with Thomas Colby in saying that Elder Beckwith was not subject to the church; they are agreed he is not subject to the church.

"Voted they are agreed with Thomas Colby in his allegation against Elder Beckwith that he has made division among the people.

"Voted they are agreed with Thomas Colby in saying that Elder Beckwith has broke his covenant with the church.

"Voted that they are agreed with Thomas Colby in his allegation that Elder Beckwith has set up a new church.

"It was asked if they are willing to have a council? "They are church agreed to send to five different churches for a council of two members from each church to come and examine into the doings of the church in Sutton.—The council came, July 1, 1814, but nothing came of it as to settling the difficulties.

But during the time the Baptists were all united in one church and in the year 1812, Rev. John Colby thought the church ought to build a meeting house and presented a plan of a house to them; but as many of them had not paid for their farms and there was rumor of war with England, did not think best to undertake its erection at that time, and Rev. Mr. Colby having some property, determined to build a house himself. He had one week before he was going a journey as an evangelist, during that time, in May, he bought land to set the house on, contracted timber for the frame, boards, nails, workmen, and gave notice he would preach in the new house the last sabbath in the June following. At the end of the week, he took his leave for several weeks, but returned in season and preached in the new meeting-house, June 28, 1812, although the house was not finished for about two years after; and he farther says: I took more pleasure in seeing my property laid out in building a house to worship God in than any old miser ever did in filling his bags with silver and gold.

In Nov. 1814, the church had labor with James Way and he agrees to discontinue buying and selling cattle to those that he suspects are driving them to Canada as it is a grief to the brethren for any to feed the British." The church voted to be satisfied on those conditions; so it will be seen, that it tried to keep all within its body and be loyal to our country in its trials and wars. Nothing of any great interest transpired in the church until December 27, 1827, asked a letter of dismission to join the Methodists. It seemed at the time of no great consequence, but to the Methodists it was a great haul. He became a quite noted preacher of that denomination.

At this time they were also vexed by one member bringing a case of litigation against another member. They had several church meetings and called a council to settle the matter, but with all their wisdom, they did not, and could not prevent litigation. This and other difficulties arose one after the other and caused considerable trouble, and Rev. Jonathan Woodman formed a new church and called it the General Baptist. Here is a space of about 10 years the church has no record and some of the time did not belong to the Quarterly-meeting, and there was no church represented in those gatherings unless it was the old one, known as Rev. David Cross' church, and some think this must have been the case, but, as the writer has no record, and as no one can tell where one may be found, we must go by tradition. During this time or in 1832 or meeting-house was built and dedicated. October 1837, twenty persons met at the house of Stephen Eastman with Rev. Joshua and Daniel Quimby, and David Sweat and organized a new church. Thus the

THE WHITE CHURCH

SECOND FREE WILL BAPTIST CHURCH

was organized with Bradbury M. Richardson, deacon, he having been deacon, for a long time in the other churches.

Stephen F. Bean, was, also, elected at this organization for clerk.

The church, now, made application and was received into the Wheelock Quarterly Meeting. It became active and zealous and grew in numbers. In 1847. the General Conference of the Free Will Baptists assembled here; and the talent of this denomination in the United States were here, and the English Baptists, also, sent two delegates from England, Revs. Burns and Goadby. This seemed to infuse new enthusiasm into the church and their prospect looked bright.

A few years since (1885) the Anniversaries of the societies were held here by the F. W. Baptists, and the people can well remember of hearing some of the best talent in the denomination at that time. The church has been blessed with some of the best clergymen in the society; among whom was

REV. JONATHAN WOODMAN, who commenced preaching in 1816, or about that time. He was connected with the church as an evangelist and pastor 29 years. He resigned his charge this spring, aged 85 years, having preached between 67 and 68 years.

We will also mention in this connection, Revs. T. C. Moulton, L. B. Tasker and Rev. Mr. Dame.

The church now numbers about 200 members with Rev. F. L. Wiley as pastor, (1883.)

METHODISTS.

The records being lost by the death of the recording steward, all the information received for this Society has been from Rev. Silas Wiggins, who came into town in 1820. He was converted in 1823 and soon commenced to preach. He soon went to New Hampshire and preached until his health failed and he came back,—about 1850, and has lived in town ever since except ten years in Lyndon. He thinks the church must have been organized in 1818. The original members, we cannot tell, but including those who joined soon, the following must be nearly correct: Jeremiah and Joseph Parker and wives, Gleasons family,—six persons; Dr. J. C. Morrill's wife and her daughter, Sally Morrill; Joseph and Samuel Bartlett and their wives; Martin Howard's family,—six persons; Jonathan Powers, Phineas Stoddard and five of his sisters; —Clark and wife and one daughter; William Hutchinson and wife; and Almon Mason and wife; Eben Richford and wife; Mary A. True, Elisha Brown,—afterward Rev. E. Brown; Alfred Holmes and wife and Silas Wiggins and wife, Samuel Densmore and wife, Josiah Smith and wife, Benjamin Streeter and wife, Benjamin P. Smith. Irena Fisk, Mary Bartlett, afterward wife of Rev. E. Smith; Susan Dalloff, Deborah Bartlett and Roswell Cheney and wife.

When this church was organized, a certain number of preachers were stationed over several towns: One preached in Sutton one Sunday, and so on in every town in the circuit until he got round.

This District consisted of Sutton, Danville, Wheelock, Burke Lyndon and Newark. Among the first preachers were:

Rev. Dr. Fisk:
Rev. Orrin Scott:
Rev. Newell S. Spaulding:
Rev. Samuel Kelley:
Rev. Samuel Norris:
Rev. Justin Spaulding:
Rev. N. W. Aspinwall:
Rev. N. W. Scott,
Rev. Israel Rust:

Rev. Eleazer Smith :
 Rev. Abel Heath :
 Rev. Edward Kellogg.

The above, I think, were all before 1844, later were :

Rev. P. N. Granger.
 Rev. David Packer:
 Rev. Dyer Willis:
 Rev. H. T. Jones:
 Rev. D. S. Dexter:
 Rev. J. S. Spinney:
 Rev. —Tarbell:

Rev. Mr. Tarbell was the last M. E. preacher stationed here. This was about 30 years since. The members by death and removals were reduced to so few preaching was discontinued, and the meeting-house was soon disposed of and they remained without a house to hold meetings in.

From 1812 to 1832 there was but one meeting-house in town, the Colby one, and when the Baptists were not using the Colby house, the Methodists had the privilege of using it. The best feeling existed between the Baptists and Methodists; better than existed among the members of their own society.

The Baptists having a church-meeting at one time, sent down to Doctor Morrill's who was town clerk, for a copy of the laws of Vermont. Mrs Morrill, a smart, keen woman, thinking it might be well to read them a lesson, did up a bible and sent by the messenger to the turbulent meeting; and as I learn, it had a good effect and stilled the troubled waters.

MRS. MORRILL

while her husband was the town clerk, did all the recording, and, I think, she recorded 2,200 pages in that time.— She died a year or two since (1883) in California, aged over 80 years.

In 1822 and in 1823, the Methodists held their camp meeting in Cabot, and the last year, 20 young persons from this town attended and were all converted at the camp-ground.

The Methodists held a camp-meeting in Sutton in 1851 or '52, with a good degree of interest.

In 1882, they organized a church of 14 members here and the Conference stationed Rev. H. P. Cushing for this town and West Burke, the meetings here being held in the Grange Hall, once in two weeks.

SEVENTH-DAY BAPTIST AND ADVENT.

During the preaching of Miller and Shipman, about 1842. some were converted to the Second Advent faith.

Some in 1843, looked so strong for the coming of the millennium they did not dig their potatoes, but when the year rolled round as usual, instead of acknowledging their error they kept on and soon concluded the seventh day sabbath was the proper one to keep.

They claimed some prayer cures in support of their faith.

Sarah Tilton who lived in this town had been unable to walk for about 30 years, a man of this faith, Stephen W. Willey had a message or impression, if he should go to Mr. Tilton's and pray for her and command her in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ to get up and walk that she would be well. He did as impressed; she arose and walked and was well. She went to her friends and tried to persuade them the Seventh Day Baptists as they called themselves were the chosen people.— She afterward married and has been known to walk four or five miles in one day.

This cure increased the membership of the society considerably at the time, but their course with their children, in not allowing them to associate with the world, the name given by them to all not of their faith, or belief, and not sending them to school, was so repugnant to the feelings of the children, as soon as they became of age they forsook the faith of their parents, by which with deaths and removals, and no new accessions, they soon run down and I think, there is now, but one Seventh Day Baptist in town, and she nearly 80 years old.

[The list of selectmen, for type-convenience, will be found farther over. Mr. Willard being made town clerk in 1871 has very naturally to a man that fills his office well, taken a lively interest in the history of his town.

His History opens very like a town clerk, a little like a politician: Page 4, with a peep at a tax list in 1803,—1804,—1805,—1806. A bit of the record first, and the bit one that suggests, our little town was hardly started in 1803, '06, you should not expect too much from us; and as the curious like to know the cause, more and more as it grows remote, I will tell you, I regard that first anniversary of the old settler of 1806, held in Mr. Willard's house the cause, and this History of Sutton the effect. Let us cultivate anniversaries of the early settlers, we will have local history. Thus in this record, we have of ourself given the Eastman Anniversary its early place, with the history of the churches, etc. thus far. Upon the next page, we will take up the charter and give the ballance of minute and faithful record of early settlers preserved in this town.—Ed.

LINES TO THE FRIENDS

OF FRED F. MCINTIRE,

Who died June 4, 1886, at Haverhill, N. H., aged 29 years, 5 months and 6 days.*

Lonely, sorrowing family groupe,

Wife, mother and sisters, dear,

Waiting and watching tenderly

The loved, unconscious sufferer.

You were weeping round his pillow,

For you knew that he must die;

It was night within your bosoms,

It was night within the sky.

Hoping, looking and listening eagerly

For a kind embrace and last farewell,

But reason never more resumed its sway.

Dear Fred silently, peacefully passed away.

You'll sadly miss him from your group,

His joyous laugh and gentle ways,

The loss to you on earth so great, will be

A gain for him of heaven and eternal days.

In that bright home where loved ones wait

And many waiting mansions are,

My Father grant that you may dwell

One happy family!—my prayer.

J. E. WILLARD.

THE CHARTER OF SUTTON, was granted to Jonathan Arnold and his associates by His Excellency Thomas Chittenden, Governor of Vermont, Jan. 27, 1791, on the following conditions :

1st. For the purpose of settling a new plantation and a valuable consideration.

2d. Reserving 1 seventy-first part for the first settled minister ; 1 seventy first part for the County Grammar School ; 1 seventy-first part for the support of English Schools ; 1 seventy first part for a Seminary or College ; 1 seventy first part for the support of the social worship of God"

The two seventy-first parts for the College and Grammar School were to be under the charge or control of the Legislature of the State which gave them to the University of Vermont at Burlington and the Grammar School in Caladonia County which was located at Peacham ; the other three seventy-first parts to be under the control of the selectmen (in trust.)

3d. The proprietors are empowered to dispose of one seventy-first part for the encouragement of erecting a grist mill and saw-mill, and are, also, empowered to set out the several seventy-first parts in such places as will best encourage the settlement of the town, giving quantity for quality, so that some of the public rights contained more than 1000 acres which could be easily done from the peculiar shape of the town which can be seen by the survey, as follows :

"Beginning in the Northwest corner of Lyndon being a beech tree mark Lyndon Corner July 1st 1787 I A Billymead Corner 1788 and running North 6 Ds. and 15 minutes west 10 miles four chains and 50 links to a beech tree marked Billymead July 22 1788 Standing in the Southerly line of Westmore eight Chains South east from the Westerly corner thereof thence South 45 Ds east eight miles 12 Chains and 81 links to a Spruce tree on flat land Marked Burke North corner Standing in Southerly line of Newark thence South 20 Ds West six miles 2 chains and 80 links to a Stake 7 links south from a little beech tree Marked Burke, Billymead 1787 Standing in the north line of Lyndon thence North 70 Ds West two miles and 64 Chains in said north line of Lyndon to the bound began at containing twenty three thousand and forty acres and is called and shall be known by the name of the township of Billymead."

THE FIRST PROPRIETORS MEETING was held at the house of Jonathan Arnold in St. Johnsbury, Orange Co. (then), Aug 6, 1787, Jonathan Arnold, moderator, and Joseph Lord the clerk, pro tempore. Voted : Jonathan Arnold shall procure a surveyor and other persons to survey and lay out the township into lots and a tax of £2 and 8s. on each right to defray the expense.

The next proprietors meeting was held at the same place, Mar. 31, 1791, Eld. Philemon Hine, moderator, Joseph Lord, clerk, pro tempore.

Voted : That the return of survey and Plan returned by James Whitelaw Esq., Surveyor General be approved and accepted and that the draft of the several lots or Rights be made agreeable thereto that the proprietors may hold the lots by them respectively drafted forever hereafter in severalty.— Passed.

Voted : That previous to each draft the public Rights and mill Right be pointed out and assigned and entered on said plan; and that the Rights so pointed out and assigned be considered in severalty and so held to the respective uses declared in the Charter of said township forever. Passed.

Voted that the Right No. 69 be the College Lot; No. 68, County Grammar School Right. No. 67 be the Right for maintaining and the supporting the social worship of God in said township. No. 33 be the town School Right and No 34 the Right for the use of a Minister or Parsonage. Passed.

"Voted: that No. 16 be the Mill Right and they and each of them are hereby assigned for those purposes forever. Passed.

Voted: that the Mill Right No. 16 be and the same hereby is granted to Daniel Cahoon Esq., on the same terms and conditions that the mill Right in the township of Lyndon was granted Jonathan Gould Esq. at a Proprietors Meeting for said township of Lyndon held in St. Johnsbury 18th day of June 1787 viz that he erect or cause to be erected a Saw Mill and Grist Mill in the township of Billymead within one year after twelve actual settlements shall be made therein. Passed.

Whereas it appears from the Field Book of Survey returned by the Surveyor that by some casualty in running the lines that lots Nos. 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, and 49 are somewhat less (on an average about ten acres) than the other regular lots and whereas it is uncertain where the error originated and it would be attended by great expense to find and rectify the same and whereas by taking a draft the chance to each proprietor is equal and just therefore, voted: that the rights be held by each proprietor who shall draw the same according to the present bounds and lines any difference aforesaid Notwithstanding and it is further voted that all other lots and rights be held agreeable to the present corners bounds and lines however they may be more than the common average quantity such allowances being designed to compensate for disadvantage of situation, mountains and other inconveniences which attend them. Passed.

Voted: that Daniel Cahoon, Jr. and Joseph Lord now prepare for and draft the several Rights amongst the proprietors. Passed.

THE LOTTING.

The draft being made, the numbers of the lots drawn to each proprietor's names were as follows:

Jonathan Arnold, 55, 37, 62, 38, 50, 30, 63, 24, 36, 51, 8, 7, 31, 28, 35, 59, 12 and 17.

Clark and Nightengale, 60, 61, 32, and 57, 2, 23, 48, 59, 22, 47, 46 58, 65, 54, 47, 10, 52, 1, 64, 20 and 49.

William Rhodes 26, 27, 6, 4, 29, 39, 18, 44, and 15.

Joseph Fay, 11, 42, 14, and 21.

Sterry and Murry No. 45 and 14.

Daniel Cahoon, No. 3, 18.

Peter Chandler, No. 40, 25.

Jonathan Jenks, No. 53, 43.

Cynthia Hastings, No. 5.

William Bowen, No. 9 and 66.

Edward Thurber, No. 70 and 71.

The above and foregoing were passed and entered at the meeting aforesaid

Attest Philemon Hine, Moderator,
The above is a true copy from the original.

JAMES CAHOON, Town Clerk.

March 2, 1795.

THE NATURAL HISTORY OF THE TOWNSHIP.

SUTTON lies about 40 miles northeast of Montpelier and about 16 miles north west of St. Johnsbury Village. The surface of the township is somewhat uneven although not as much so as some other towns in the County, it laying in four swells or ridges which are called South Ridge, Middle or Beech Ridge, East Ridge and North Ridge. These divisions are made by the Passumpsic River. The south branch of this river, called Callender river, (it is said derived its designataion, from a man by the name of Callender who fell into it when the town was being allotted by the surveyor) has its source on the east side of the town of Sheffield, and running in a southeasterly direction across the south portion of the town into the town of Burke. On this stream, at the present, time are 3 saw-mills, 1 carding mill, 1 grist-mill and 1 carriage-shop. In some portions of the year, the water is so low—as it is in most mountain towns in the state—but little can be done in the mills.

Until about 1850, where the carding-mill now is there was a woolen factory which employed a dozen, or more hands, and on the opposite side of the river from the factory were a saw-mill and a cabinet-shop, and just below the present grist-mill there was another much larger mill, which was burned down about twenty years since and the present one was then erected.

The Middle Branch (of the river) rises in the hills on the westerly side of the town and fed by several ponds runs southeasterly across Sutton into Burke at West Burke Village. There are no mills on this stream, at present.

The North Branch (of the river) rises in the towns of Newark and Westmore and taking a southerly course, runs into this town and out, uniting with Middle Branch at West Burke Village.—There are a grist-mill and saw-mill in Sutton on this stream, but are so near to West Burke they almost seem a part of it.

OUR SUTTON PONDS

Are ten in number, although from present appearances two or three of them in a few years may only be mud or frog-ponds.

Fish Pond and Duck Pond are nice bodies of water and abound with fish, though not as many as formerly. They lie well up on the mountain, some 200 or more feet above the valley, and several thousand feet above the level of the ocean and discharge their waters to the north into St. Francis River.

The Lime Ponds, also, deserve special notice. The bottom of these ponds consists of a white marl, of which the early settlers in this and surrounding towns made the putty for their windows and lime to lay their chimneys with and plaster their walls.

THE OLD SETTLER'S LIME-KILN was made and lime burned by digging a hole in the side of the hill about 4 feet wide, 8 feet back and six or 8 feet deep, when it was walled up a layer of wood laid crossways the length of the archways, then a layer of the marl, and a layer of the wood and a layer of the marl alternately until the kiln was full, when a fire was set to it. It took several days to burn and cool down, but as soon as burned and cooled the settlers had a most excellent lime ready for use. The writer has seen rooms plastered with this lime which have have been used more than sixty years, in endeavoring to get mortar from brick taken from old chimneys, has found it almost impossible to separate the mortar from the brick, taking many times a portion of the brick with the mortar. It is the opinion of some, if an oven could be so invented that this marl could be burned without its being mixed with the ashes of the wood, it would be superior to any lime produced from stone.

SPRINGS.

There are in this township several mineral springs worthy of mention.— One is on the northerly side of what is known as the Lake Mountain. The writer visited this spot, about ten years ago. He measured the spring and found the depth of the water a little over 6 feet; its diameter 15 feet across the surface. Watching the white sand boiling up in the water over a space of several feet, he thought that he never saw such a sight.

In our midst, are the sulphur and the iron spring.

THE SULPHUR SPRING

is said to have large medicinal properties. It is a water of excellent drinking quality for those that like sulphurated waters. Some horses are very fond of the sulphur water.

THE IRON SPRING,

an invigorating tonic fresh from the hand of Mother Nature, is an excellent drink for either thirsty man, or beast, and delightfully refreshing to the invalid or debilitated.

THE ORIGINAL FOREST.

The natural timber was principally sycamore, or the sugar maple, with a sprinkling of beech, birch and ash generally, but alongside the streams upon the banks are quantities of spruce and white cedar.

THE BANNER MAPLE SUGAR TOWN OF VERMONT.

Sutton, it is understood, is the largest maple-sugar producing town in the State, and perhaps, the largest in the United States. In the spring of 1874, more than 140,000 pounds was made, and one year since, the produce was larger than in 1874.

In School District No. 6 of 12 families more than 28,000 pounds have been made in a single season.

NOTE FROM THE PUBLISHER: If you will send me the name of the man who has made the most maple-sugar in your town, I will print it here; for he has, probably made the most maple-sugar of anybody in the world, the sugar-maple being a native American tree.

I have headed the record of your sugar-making modestly, "The Banner Maple Sugar Town of Vermont" when it might have been written: The Banner Maple Sugar Town of the World.—Ed.

ANSWER: The following list will show the largest sugar producers and the most produced in a single year by any one:

C. W. Willard, 7,050. lbs.

Jona. Eastman, 4,500. „

Alfred Allard, 3,500. „

G. R. Willard, 5,000. „

Arch Craig, 3,000. „,—about.

D. J. Ball, 3,000. „, or more.

H. S. Forbes, 3,000. „,—about.

Messrs. Ball and Forbes do not know the amount made. Their orchards consist of 1,800 to 2,000. trees.

Our sugar is made nearly all of it in this County, dry or what is known as stirred so that it is put into flour barrels and headed up, and is now shipped to Chicago. What they do with so much maple sugar is somewhat of a mystery. Some say it is used in spirituous liquor, especially for brandy which it gives the look of age, others that it is used in glucose.

THE FIRST OPENING

in the Sutton forest was made by Chas. Hackett on the place known as the Wm. Brockway farm in 1791, or 92, but I think, he never moved here.

Those that came and settled in the years 1792 and 93, up to 94 were :

Jeremiah Washburn, who located on right No. 2, on the farm now owned by J. W. Colby. Thomas Washburn, his son, was the first child born in town, Jan. 17, 1795. It is not easy to find from what place they emigrated. It was customary then to give a 50-acre lot to each settler until the requisite number should become residents to fulfill the conditions of the charter, and when they received their deed they were set up as residents of Billymead, now Sutton.

SAMUEL ORCUTT

comes next, a blacksmith, who settled on the place where S. S. Doud now lives, on right No. 14. He married Elsie Brown of Kilery, Me. Children: Hannah, Ephraim, Samuel John, Susannah, Bela, Lydia and Betsey.

Ephraim married Christiana Willey, Feb. 19, 1798, and settled on the ridge of land south of S. S. Doud house.

John was a blacksmith. He moved to Lyndon, and afterward became a clergyman.

Bela married; raised a large family of children; died at South Barton, several years ago.

Samuel, Senior, lived here for some years and removed to Boston, Mass. to live. Only two of his descendent with their families now reside in town, his grandson, Samuel Orcutt and great-grandson, Harrison Orcutt.

JOSHUA HERR

settled on the place where Chas. Hackett commenced (the Brockway place) he lived there several years and then went to Canada. Some said he was a good Christian, others, that he was a cruel and bad man.

PHILIP BEAN

settled on the place now owned by C. W. Willey, but lived there only a few years and moved away.

ELIPHALET MAXWELL

and his two sons settled on the place now owned by Reuben Ellis' estate, between the farm owned by C. W. Willard and the old Wm. Green farm; and the place is now sometimes called the old Maxwell place. Eliphalet, Sr. was called Elder Maxwell, but I think he was never ordained by any society.—The Maxwells lived here a number of years and then the family became scattered.

SIMON BRIER

located on a tract of land near the residence of Jesse Ainger on the South Ridge, but he did not stay there more than a year or two and made another pitch near the sugar house of Ora S. Jesseman; but being a man of shiftless habits soon left and was lost sight of.

CAPT. JOHN ANTHONY

came from Woodstock and married a sister of the Cahoons and settled in the field of M. A. Campbells which lies on the road leading off from Sutton to West Burke. The log-cabin stood near the apple trees in the field. He lived there only a short time and sold to Dea, True. This was the first opening north of Callender's River.

JAMES AND SAMUEL CAHOON

came from Winchester, N. H. and first settled on the farm now owned by J. E. Willard. The house stood in the corner of the field west of the road. The first town-meeting was held in this house and the first church was also, organized there. The Cahoons built the first saw and grist mill in town it was built in 1795, and stood in the field of G. R. Willard southeast of the bridge at Sutton Hollow. The crank of the wheel that carried the saw-mill was drawn on a hand-sled from New Hampshire. Afterward the mill came into the possession of Deacon. True. And when one of his customers was waiting for his grist to be ground he said to the Deacon, I could eat it faster than you grind. How long? said the Deacon, Until I starve to death, said the man.

How many years this mill stood can not now be ascertained; but some time after a saw-mill was erected where the mill of Freeman Hyde's was and a grist mill on the site now of the grist-mill of O. E. Bundy.

Samuel Cahoon and James continued in company a few years and then dissolved partnership. Samuel remained on the old place until about 1807, when he committed suicide by taking opium. It is said that some of his sons became influential men.

James Cahoon married Betsy Blake, Oct. 11, 1797, which was the first marriage in town. James moved after the partnership was dissolved to the place now owned by Mrs Josephine Lee, and kept a grocery or store in a small building, which stood near the dwelling-house of T. J. Barker's. He was a very intemperate man. His habit effecting his eyes, his physician told him unless he reformed he would be blind, he appeared to give up his drams for a time, but one day, he mixed a bowl of brandy, set it down and went out of the room. He soon came back and taking up the bowl of punch saying "go it, eyes!" drank it off. He soon died of delirium tremens, in 1804, age 33 years.

The children of James and Betsey Cahoon were:

Charles Dyer, born May 10, 1800; became an eminent Presbyterian clergyman.

Charlotte C., born, Feb. 15, 1802.

HON. JAMES BLAKE CAHOON

lived in Portland, Me.; was Mayor of Portland at the time of the great fire in that city and in the struggle to stop the ravages of the flames, he injured himself so that he died soon after, as I was informed by his son-in-law, Geo. C. Cahoon of Lyndon.

1795—SETTLERS.

Those that came in 1795 were the following:

David Bean, who settled on the place now owned by his grandson. C. W.

Willey. The house stood in the field west of the house now on the place.— He was one of the deacons of the Free Will Baptist Church here a good many years, and Stephen, one of his sons, after the death of his father was chosen deacon and held the office until he went West about twenty years since.

ELDER DANIEL QUINBY

came from Sandwich, N. H. and settled on the place of A. H. Ball. He lived there until 1799, when he went to Lyndon to live. He erected a saw-mill near where E. H. Butterfield lives. The dam was close to where the bridge is now, but the water-power was not very good and the mill never did great business.

BENJAMIN BOLEY

as near as can be ascertained settled somewhere in the vicinity of A. G. Jenness. He lived there some years and in 1817 moved to the South Ridge. He owned a small place near Lyndon. He lived on the farm now owned by Harlow Easterbrooks. His wife being troubled with rheumatism prepared poke or garget root in alcohol and taking a dose of it, went into her loom to weave, but died soon from its effects.

ENOCH BLAKE

came from Moultonborough and settled on the place now owned by John A. Rice. He was fitted for a pioneer. He soon became the wealthiest man in town. He built a framed house in 1802, it being the second in town, the first was built by the Cahoons. The Enos Blake house is now in quite a comfortable condition for a dwelling-house, and having been occupied ever since it was built; and now occupied by Mr. Blake. At the time it was built it was and for many years after, the best house in town.

Enoch and his wife, both, died of the scarlet fever.

SAMUEL D. BLAKE,

son of Enoch, came from Moltonborough the year before his parents and brothers and sisters came, and commenced the opening which his father occupied. He made his home at Samuel Winslow's then living in Lyndon on the land now owned by Philo Graves, near the farm known as the Rice place.

Young Blake taking provision Monday morning to last till Saturday night, stopping in the woods, preparing himself his meals through the week, with a few spruce and hemlock boughs for his shelter and bed, worked through the summer, returning to New Hampshire in the fall for the winter. In the spring of 1795, coming back with his father's family, he then commenced an opening for himself on right No. 18 on the place now owned by D. D. Hayward.

For some time after the town was settled the inhabitants had to go to Barnet and St. Johnsbury to mill. On one occasion, Samuel took his grist on his back and went by the spotted trees, the only road then, to mill. On his return, it became dark while he was in the woods and he lost his way somewhere on the South Ridge. He was somewhat disappointed at not reaching home that night, he would have preferred after his long tramp a little supper, but as it was, accepted circumstances; pitched the heavy bag with his grist at the foot of a tree for a pillow; bedded himself with his back to the tree and slept; he had camped out before; had a bear poked his nose against one of his limbs, probably, he would have sprang up and grappled him. If a bear or any wild beast of the forest scented his couch, they feared the hero that the summer before had been among them, slashing down the tall trees in their old haunts. He slept unmolested and when the light glimmered through the woods he took his bearings and soon found himself at home.

He married a Lee and reared a large family of children, all of whom have moved from town. Two of them went to Texas. When Isaac died, he left $100, the interest to be used in fixing up the cemetery at Sutton Village. Bennet and Isaac were both sons of Samuel D. Blake.

BENNETT AND ISAAC BLAKE

STEPHEN BLAKE,

another son of Enoch settled the farm where Mrs. Powell now lives; but afterwards moved to the Village and went into trade as a merchant which he followed for a time; sold his store and built a grist-mill at Sutton Hollow.—At last, getting old, he sold his mill and bought a few acres with buildings in the Hollow where he lived till his death. He was married three times. His two first wives were sisters, daughters of Dea. Colby. His last wife was daughter of Thomas Daloff who survives him and still lives in town; and one of his daughters, the only one now living, married M. A. Campbell and now lives in town.

Two of his grandsons:

HON. G. H. BLAKE,

is Editor of the Barton Monitor and has represented Sutton, his native town in the legislature, and Barton in the legislature, in both House and Senate.

REV. A. B. BLAKE,

brother of G. H. Blake, is a prominent Methodist minister in the St. Johnsbury District.

ENOCH BLAKE JR.

married a Ladd and lived in several places and at last settled on the Gile place where he lived till his death, caused by a fall in the barn while doing his chores. His wife fell into the fire and burned herself to death.

His son, Joseph E. Blake, and his grandson, H. A. Blake are the only descendants by the name of Blake in town although at one time there were more by the name of Blake than of any other name.

EBENEZER BLAKE

settled on the place now owned by Stephen C. Otis. He was a successful farmer. He lived the latter part of his life at the Village.

JACOB BLAKE

lived with his father until the death of his parents when he bought the place where A. H. Ball's old house stands. He lived there a few years and then moved to the Village and went into trade with his brother Stephen, whom he soon bought out, and took his son Abel in as a partner under the firm name of J. Blake & Son. About forty years ago they sold out and Abel went to Gardner, Mass., and after, to other parts of the country. In his rambles, he lost his property and came back.—He now lives in Bath, N. H.

Abel has one daughter that married to A. J. Rennie and owns one of the mills in town.

Jacob continued to live in town till about twenty years ago; then went to Massachusetts and died there when about 90 years of age.

As a family, the Blakes were well-fitted to settle a new country; as one of the relatives has said with capacious stomachs and large story tellers, also, nearly all had the faculty to acquire large property while young or in middle age, but came to be in limited circumstances when old, as will be seen. The Blakes held considerable town office—S e town officers.

An anecdote is told of the Blake brothers: One of them having caught something in one of their excursions, they did not know what, said Stephen, we will know when we get home for he has traveled, having been to St. Johnsbury, Lyndon, Wheelock and Sheffield. Arrived at home, they went to view it by lantern light and Stephen's descision was it was either a young bear or turtle-dove.

BRADBURY M. RICHARDSON

came from Moultonborough, N. H., and settled on the farm where N. W. Dean now lives. He like Samuel Blake boarded with—Winslow in Lyndon and at the same time; but went home every night and back every morning to his work. He commenced the opening cut in the field south of the road that leads to C. W. Willey's.

One day while he and Samuel Winslow had been notching trees for a drove, which is done by chopping a large number partly down so that they will all fall in the same direction, and then take a very large one for the starter and chop so that it will fall on the next tree and so on until it will take them all in. Sometimes one drove will cover half an acre or more and in this way no inconsiderable amount of chopping can be saved.) Just as the drove was going they looked up and saw Elisha, a boy of about fifteen years coming under the trees which fell on and killed him. This was the first death in Billymead.

Bradbury went back to New Hampshire after building his log-cabin and married Sally Lee. Their children were Sally, Bradbury, Malachie, Jonathan, Sayrles, Judith, Joseph and Lucy, all of whom are now dead except Judith, widow of Stephen Willey.

Bradbury M. was chosen deacon of the Free Will Baptist Church after it was organized in 1800 and held that office until his death in 1848. He lived on the place where he commenced. In the latter part of his life he resided with his son, Jonathan, better known as Captain.

JOSEPH RICHARDSON,

son of Bradbury M. succeeded his father as deacon and held the office about 25 years. He married Lucina Allen of Wheelock, and settled the farm where Riley their boy now lives. They had a large family. Three of the boys, Bradbury, Jackson and George Richardson are prominent homœopathy physicians in New York City.

Frances, daughter of Bradbury, married Moses H. Noyes and resides in town.

Dea. Bradbury M. was a man that had not an enemy. He was ready to aid the needy, and his doors were open to accommodate all of the new arrivals to his wilderness home until they could make or build one of their own.

JOSEPH RICHARDSON,

brother, Bradbury M., came from Sandwich, N. H. selected a lot and commenced his opening on the road that now runs from G. M. Campbell's to the Wilson school-house. He built his log-cabin in the field near the west side of the Campbell farm on the north side of the road. While he was chopping a clearing and building his house, his family lived at the house of his brother, B. M. This was the second opening on the north side of Callender's river. He lived here and then went back to Sandwich, N. H. again.

After many years his son, Nathan, came back and finally located on the road leading from Sutton to Lyndon, on the place where his widow, Priscilla now lives.

He was in the War of 1812 with the New Hampshire troops, and for several years before he died endeavored to obtain a pension, but never did. But since his death his widow has obtained one.

With the Richardson family, as with many others, nearly all of the descendants have gone from town.

The highway tax in 1795. was £9 and 12s. Up to 1798, it was assessed in pounds, shillings and pence.

At a meeting, Mar. 1, 1796:

"Voted that the inhabitants of this town shall from this time hence forever make their ox-sleds four feet wide and any that is found narrower shall be liable to have them destroyed by any person or persons that are inhabitants of this town."

At the same meeting they raised a tax of $10 and Samuel Orcutt gave the town a sixpence for the privilege to collect it.

It appears by the list of 1796, there were 2 horses, 5 yoke of oxen, 15 cows, 18 acres of improved land, 4 three-years-old, 10 two years-old 7 yearlings and 17 polls.

Voted: that the saw-mill and grist-mill of this town built by Samuel Cahoon be accepted by the inhabitants.

1976: MOSES H. BREWER, who came from Sandwich, N. H. He first located on the place of Daniel Quinby He was in rather needy circumstances and moved from place to place. He was out in the war of the Revolution. One of his granddaughters married A. H. Ball and lived on the place where her grand-father first lived when he came into town.

JACOB EDDY

bought the place of Philip Bean and lived there a short time.

SAMUEL HUTCHING

came, I think, from Sandwich, and as Daniel Colby's wife was his sister, I presume that he came with the Deacon's family. He only stopped one season.

CHARLES LEONARD

came from St. Johnsbury and settled on or near the farm now owned by A. G. Jenness.

A few years after, his wife started to go from their home over to a family then living on or near the place of A. R. Stone's, to warp a web. She lost her way and for some days wandered about till so weak from hunger that she could go no farther, she sank down in despair. She was found nine days after still alive on the hill near a spring west of the Stone place. Others say it was on this side of the mountain west of Willoughby Lake.

ABNER ADAMS

came from Moultonborough, N. H. and settled on the corner of Right No. 45, the opening, not far, from the Joseph Barker place now owned by Harrison Masuer, I think. He must have been poor, for I find by a vote of the town he was exempted several years from taxes.

IN 1797

PETER ATWOOD came from Sandwich, N. H. and settled on the place owned now by Ward P. Whipple. He built a tavern and kept a public house there. He was active and energetic in business, loaning money to his less fortunate neighbors. He, also, bought and sold considerable real estate in town.

A large number of Atwoods with their families came into town within a few years and when they commenced to leave, left as suddenly.

JOHN CORLESS

settled on the farm where Ward R. Eastman lives. He married Susanna Blake, daughter of Enoch Blake. He soon sold this place and settled on land west of John B. Miles; his son lived there with him till his father's death. Sometime after he moved down on the valley road on the place now owned by his widow, Gracia A., where he lived till about ten years ago his horse ran away and he was so badly injured, he died in a few days.

JOHN LADD

married Polly Colby, sister of Deacon Thomas Colby and came from Sandwich, in the winter, moving his family on a sled with two yoke of oxen. Upon his arrival, he sold his oxen and purchased a tract of land where J. M. Pillsbury lives, and there lived until his death. His son, John, lived with his parents in their last years, and until about 25 years ago when he came and lived in the Village. John, Jr. was highly respected by his townsmen, having held positions of trust in town many times, always with credit to himself and benefit to others.

SCHOOLS.

At a town-meeting, Aug. 8, 1797, it was voted to divide the town into two school-districts:

DISTRICT NO. I.

consisting of 8 voters, the area of about 3,000. acres, (11 rights). The school-house was built near the cemetery on the South Ridge on the west side of the road, leading from B. M. R. Willey's to Willard Baldwin. Nothing there now to mark the spot except some cobble stone.

DISTRICT NO. 2.

consisting of 14 voters and an area of about 20.000 acres, the vote was taken to build on the southeast corner of right No. 31. But some of the old residents say it was near the brook where Mrs. Olive Harris lives which is on right 18.

Those that belonged in this Olive Harris district were 2 voters, where J. E. Willard lives; 3 Right 29; in the opening where Ore S. Jesseman lives, Nos. 41, 42, rights, 1 voter; In an opening just beyond G. M. Campbell's on Rights 32, 34, 2 voters; one voter where Amos G. Jenness lives, Right 55; 2 voters where A. H. Ball lives, No 31; one in an opening in M. A. Campbell's field, toward Burke, right, No. 18; one where D. D. Hayward lives, on Right 18; one where A. R. Stone lives, Right 57; and one where John A. Rice lives, on Right No. 3.

Where Sutton Village is there was no opening at this time. The town-meeting was then held at this school-house instead of at Cahoon's dwelling house.

IN 1798,

JONAS GOODELL came and settled on the farm now owned by Harlow Easterbrooks. He lived there till 1807, when he sold to Jethro Sanborn and left town.

DANIEL GEORGE and NATHANIEL WALLACE came here to live in 98, but they never owned any land here and I have no means of knowing where they located; yet in the grand list, after, I find Wallace had improved land and George had a cow.

JESSE ATWOOD

came from Sandwich, N. H. and settled somewhere near Ward P. Whipples. I think, he must have gone in with Peter Atwood.

THOMAS COLBY

came from Sandwich, N. H. and settled on the place now owned by M. A. Taft; think, he married Elizabeth Atwood of Sandwich. He must, I think, have been 45 years of age; he had nine children then, that came with him. He soon made a home for himself and family. In 1800, he had 11 acres of improved land and one cow. In 1802, he had erected a framed house and finished it so it was assessed at $100.—His townsmen recognized his judgment and ability, both in regard to church and state. He represented the town in the legislature and held other offices.—see the officers lists. He was chosen deacon of the church, and perhaps, had more influence in that body than any other member. After some years, he gave his home place to Jonathan, his son, intending retiring from cares; from some cause as often happens when the father gives up the management to his boys, they soon disagreed, so in this case, and the Deacon, so called, built the set of buildings on the place now owned by Mrs. C. W. Willard and moved there with his son, Thomas but misfortune seemed to overtake him, for Thomas soon died.—Josiah Colby, his grandson, married the widow of Thomas and went there to live; but all was not pleasant, and Josiah removed, and Jesse, the Deacon's youngest son living, went home. He remained, but being lame did not prosper much.

The offices of trust the Deacon held were always filled to acceptance both of town and church.

DANIEL COLBY,

son of Thomas, Sr., married a Hutchins and settled in Burke. He built the Colby mills,—at present, only the house remains. One of his grandsons, Dr. G. W. Colby, lives in town, also, one of his great-grandsons, Harley R. Colby, on the Jeremiah Washburn place.

REV. JOHN COLBY,

the 3d., son of Thomas, born in Sandwich, N. H., Dec. 9, 1807, came to Billymead, (now Sutton,) in 1788, and nothing is known of his boyhood except what is published in his life by himself and that not at hand.

He was ordained, Nov. 30, 1809. He traveled and preached through Vermont, New Hampshire, and some in Massachusetts, Rhode Island and New York and, perhaps, in other states; at one time, he went into Pennsylvania and Ohio.

He built the first meeting-house in Sutton. (See in church history page 16 and 17, 18.) It was north of the cemetery and built with large, square pews, seats round the pew and meetings were held in it until the White Church was built when it was moved to the farm of Jerome Baily and used for a dwelling house.

Elder John Colby came home from his trips of preaching several times; at one time so feeble, he thought that he must die; but after a time he believed if Elders Charles and Nathaniel Bowles and Daniel and Joshua Quimby were to pray for him, he would recover. It appears by the record, June 8, 1817, Daniel Quimby believed that the two Bowles, Joshua Quimby and himself should go and pray for Elder John to get well, and on the 9th., they four started for Sutton.

During the night of the 8th., Colby says: "I reflected I had been trying to regain health by following the directions of one and another, and had never followed the directions of St. James, Chapt. 5: "Is any among you sick, let him call the Elders of the church—&c. He expressed himself to his father and said who shall go for them? His father said he would and was preparing when the four clergymen he had selected arrived for the very same purpose. But it is said the Rev. Charles had no faith at first; and that he said it was too much like raising the dead. But they all knelt down. The Elder Quimbys lead and Elder Nathaniel Bowles followed. The three first prayers were for faith for Rev. Brother Charles, who continued in his unbelief until near the close of the third prayer when as he said he could hardly wait for the prayer to close. As soon as the opportunity came, he commenced his prayer for Colby's restoration; and as Colby says before it was finished, all pain had left his body and he was as free from it as ever in his life. He breathed easier, his cough began to abate, from that hour he commenced to amend. As soon as able he resumed his labors as an evangelist. In the fall, he started on a tour South and died at Norfolk Va., Nov. 28, 1817.

1799: JOHN CAHOON

came from Winchester N. H. and settled on Right No. 3. The house stood on a road leading from where John A. Rice lives to Lyndon road near the Sulphur spring. He lived here only a few years and settled in Lyndon.

SAMUEL AMBROSE, from Sandwich, N. H. made his pitch on the farm where E. J. Roundy lives.

He did not stay long, but soon returned to New Hampshire.

TAYLOR NORRIS

began on the farm where Franklin O. Berry lives and married Susanah Orcutt, Mar. 12, 1801. It was said that he was very poor. At one time he was working by the day for Stephen Eastman, boarding himself, Eastman said to Norris: "Why do you have so little energy? The reply of Norris was, "I could do as much as any one, if I sat at your table." After this Stephen Eastman carried his meals $1\frac{1}{2}$ miles to him, and after one or two days, said he never had any better help than Norris.—We find some years after the town contributed to his support. He, I think, was the first one assisted by the town.

DAVID NORRIS

settled on the northeast corner of right No. 44, being a part of the Harrison Masuer place. He sold his place to John Shaw and moved to Danville.

JETHRO SANBORN

bought right 31 of Daniel Quinby, in 1807, but sold and bought the farm of Jonas Goodell, then, at present of H. Easterbrooks. He lived here until his death.

William, son of Jethro, lived on the farm of his father some years but by some over confidence in the use of his name lost his property and his last days were spent in want.

Loami B., grandson of Jethro, was in the War of the Rebellion, being severely wounded, almost losing the use of one hand. He married widow Z. W. Campbell and they live at the Village, he receiving a pension of $30. per month.

JAMES BACON— a settler of 1800, I think, lived in the vicinity of A. R. Stone's.

JOHN ATWOOD

came from Sandwich, N. H. and settled on the road that leads to J. M. Pillsbury's. The house stood just below the orchard in H. S. Forbes' field. He lived there until he bought the carding and fulling-mill at Sutton Hollow. He lived here, not many years, and moved back to N. H.—the cause some difficulty. See John Beckwith history.

IN 1800,

EZRA STODDARD settled on right, No. 13. His house stood west of the road just north of the cemetery on the South Ridge. The road run then from the Stoddard house to Samuel Orcutt's now S. S. Doud's. Stoddard, I think, was killed by the fall of a tree, a few years after.

MOSES NORRIS

bought the Maxfield pitch. He soon removed to Danville and became a clergyman.

WILLIAM RAMSEY

came from Walpole, N. H., bought a part of Jethro Sanborn's land, and made his opening and house on the present William Ruggles place. This was the first house erected at Sutton Village.

JOHN NASMITH settled near the Wilson school-house.

JOSIAH SMITH

came from Sandwich, N. H. and settled on the S. W. corner of right No. 20; the house standing in the field just north of the road that leads to Luther Battles. He lived there some years, and then he and his son, Enoch, bought the present C. S. Taft place and built the house and barn there; but sold out there and moved to the Village. Enoch starting a cabinet and repair shop, did nearly all kinds of wood-work for the farmers. One of the most particular of men about his work, consequently, his labor was never very remunerative; consequent of that, he never acquired much property.

Two of the three daughters of Enoch Smith reside in town, Mrs. E. W. Brockway and G. N. M. Bean; both of their husbands manufacture carriage; both turn off good work.

Mr. Brockway has the reputation of making as good wagons as can be procured anywhere.

Fida, daughter of Enoch, is a teacher in Massachusetts.

The town voted to build a pound 20 feet square and 7 feet high and gave Charles Leonard 5 bushels of wheat for building it.

AMASA HUTCHINS came and settled on the place where D. E. Ruggles lives.

LEVI SILVER

settled on the road leading from B. M. R. Willey to Willard Baldwin's.

ABIEL GOODELL

settled on a part of the farm where Willard Baldwin lives. The house stood near the brook. His son, Dan is living, with his son-in-law, S. S. Doud. He must have received a settlement lot. He went to Westminster and Tobias Hanscomb.

IN 1802:

ZEBULON NORRIS came from Lyndon and settled on right No. 18, where G. O. Eastman lives. He soon sold and returned to Lyndon, but in a year or so came back and settled where his grandson, D. G. Norris lives, although some say he lived on the place owned by F. Roundy; if so it must have been after he came from the D. G. Norris place.

DAN DICKERSON

settled in the field back of the house of Willard Baldwin and it is part of that farm. The road to Dickerson was just in the edge of the sugar-orchard, north of Baldwin's field.

CALEB FISK

settled on right, No. 33, on the road leading to the depot. He was the best educated man that had as yet settled here and did a large proportion of the town business for several years. He was the first representative, (See list of town officers.) selectman 14 years, the longest of any one—A. H. Ball, next, 11 years,—J. E. Willard 10 years.

AMOS FISK,

son of Caleb, drawing brick with two yoke of oxen, in crossing the bridge between L. J. Hall and C. S. Taft, it gave way and he was killed. He was buried in the Sutton Cemetery, his being the first interment there.

Soon, all that had been buried in different places in town were taken up and buried in this ground, (thirteen in all,) and Rev. Amos Beckwith preached upon the occasion from the text:—"And, I saw the dead, both small and great, stand before God." Rev. xx. 12.

CALEB FISK, JR.

went to New York City and was there in the Custom House many years. His widow is, at present, living in town.

PRISCILLA GLIDDEN

came from Sandwich, N. H. and purchased the Leonard place. One of her sons, Nathaniel Glidden, was deputy sheriff, constable and collector many years.

ENOCH TRUE

came from Sandwich, N. H. and purchased the Capt. John Anthony place.

Later, he bought the Cahoon grist-mill.

THOMAS TRUE,

son of Enoch, came with his father, and bought 2 acres in the corner of right 30, extending 20 rods E. and W. and 16 rods N. and S., being the land where Judge Tibbets lives, of the hotel and store of L. J. Campbell's, and the S. N. Whipple and perhaps that of T. J. Barker. He and his son, Thomas had a blacksmith-shop and followed that trade as long as Thomas Sr. lived. After his father's death, Thomas farmed some and did some blacksmithing for a time; but finally abandoned his old trade altogether and devoted himself to his little farm until a few years since he sold out and removed to Greenfield, Mass.

LUTHER NICHOLS

came from Washington, N. H. He enlisted and was in the War of 1812; as I learn, his marriage relations proved unpleasant. The last of his life he lived with his nephew, Samuel Densmore. He died insane some 30 years ago.

BENJAMIN AND EZEKIEL POWERS

settled on the East Ridge,—the first pitch in that part of the town. I think they lived together or near each, I find by the list each had one ox. They did not stay long, Ezekiel going to Burke. One of Ezekiel's grand-daughter's lives in town, Olive E. Harris.

Of Luther and William Tuttle, Jacob Kent, Benjamin Streeter, Stephen McCrillis and Allen Robbard the location cannot now be told.

DANIEL CRAM came from Waterford and settled near where Simeon Olcott lives. He did not stay but a few years came from Putney and bought the place of Zebulon Norris. (the G. O. Eastman). He was the first settled minister and received the minister-lot, No. 34. It is said, that he thought the whole right was too much and he gave the town a deed of 172 acres off from the east end of the right, retaining 128 acres of the west end. He continued to reside in town until his death which was caused by being thrown from his horse while returning from Burke near the unoccupied buildings on the H. S. Forbes place, Dec. 6, 1822, aged 68 years. I learn he believed he had a warning of his death when sick about a year before.

REV. AMOS BECKWITH

His son, living with his father, was away from home, the day of his father's death, assisting the stage in going from Sutton to Lyndon down through Egypt. This was the first time the mail had been carried that way and a man, these days, went with the stage to play the bugle to announce the arrival of the mail. Lodoska, one of John's daughters, says: One day when the stage stopped at Sutton to change the mail several young ladies got out. They were going to St. Johnsbury to a ladies school and she thought them something better than common people; and as she looks back, stage-bugle and all seems like a fairy tale.

Rev. Amos Beckwith married Susanah Truman. Their children were:

Abigail, born in 1781:

Daniel and Truman, Oct. 15, 1783:

Rebecca, Mar. 17, 1786:

John, Oct. 12, 1789:

Elizabeth, Mar. 34, 1792:

Sylvania, Dec. 28, 1795.

TRUMAN BECKWITH

Truman, the only really successful financier in the Beckwith family never lived in town; but his acts of benevolence are so intimately connected with his relatives here, it is thought best to give a sketch of him with the family. At nine years of age he went with his father from Putney to Providence, R. I., a distance of 120 miles, riding on horseback behind his father. He lived a short time with his grandfather Truman ——— and then was apprenticed to his uncle Truman in a drug-store and saddler's shop; but neither business suited him and at twenty-three he went to Savannah, Ga. with Ebenezer Jenks and engaged in the cotton trade. He lived 8 years in Savannah and 1 year in Augusta and came back, but continued in the business until 1861, being then 77 years old; all these years extending aid to his relatives. His brother Daniel lived on the place now owned by William Ruggles, in financial embarresment, he was likely to lose it. Truman relieved him of his difficulties and took the deed of the farm and after Daniel died he executed a deed in trust to two of his nephews that the use should be for the support of his brother Daniel's widow until her death and then for the support of his brother John's widow and two of their unfortunate children, and after their decease to go to John's children.

He, also, made the gift of a farm to his sister, Mrs. Sylvania Ball, and always on coming to Sutton, he made a present to all of his nephews and neices. He educated his brother John's oldest son, Corydon. He gave at his death to each of his nephews and neices $500. He did more kindnesses for his friends than I have space to enumerate.

He died at Providence, R. I. in his 95th year, leaving an estate considerably over a million.

Rebecca Beckwith, daughter of Rev. Amos, married Rufus Newell.

Elizabeth Beckwith married Truman Newell. Abigail died young.

JOHN BECKWITH, ESQ.

son of Rev. Amos, lived with his father. He only had a limited education, but studied law and made a good and shrewd manager in preparing his cases before the court, but never much of an advocate. He was a politician, of the Democratic school, and had considerable influence in the selection of the United States officers in the Northern part of Vermont. He was a custom house officer for many years. With his knowledge of men and his natural cunning in looking after the smugglers and those that endeavored to aid the British in the War of 1812, it became a risky and unremunerative business. Their losses were so great, the smugglers became very angry and desperate. Between 1812 and 1816, either the smugglers or their confederates devised the plan of mutilating him, and executed it, surprising him sleeping in his office. It is supposed two, or more, were engaged in the execution. They clipped off the top and the larger portion of one of his ears.

How much more was their intention to do nobody knows. Beckwith, as was his practice, ever on the alert for rogues employed Jacob Shaw, afterwards his father-in-law, and, perhaps others to assist him in his investigations. As soon as it was light they discovered two different kind of tracts, one something of a club-shape, which Shaw recognized as the shape of a boot he had made for John Atwood, at the Hollow, the owner of the carding-mill. Immediately, Shaw repaired to Atwood's for his rolls. He found him in the house and Wm. Goodwin with him, the boots of both well wet with dew.—The men, he was seeking had escaped through a field of grass, heavy with dew. Atwood and Goodwin were soon arrested and lodged in the jail at Danville. They were afterwards let out on bail by Andrew Brown, Thomas Colby, Thomas True, Pearson True, Thaddeus Curtis, Jethro Sanborn, James Way, Harris Way, and Benjamin Streeter, for the appearance of Atwood and Goodwin at the Supreme Court.

John Atwood conveyed his property to his bondsman as security. This instrument it dated Oct. 15, 1816. It appears by the records that there was an execution against John Atwood in trespass, and directed to the sheriff of Caladonia County or his deputy, or to the constable of Sutton, dated at Danville, June 30, 1816, and signed by Curtis Stanley, clerk.

The amount for execution was for $1,500. damage and cost of $172.79. The jurymen were Nathaniel Knight Augustus Walter, Walter Harvey, John Gibson, Ebenezer Davis, Enoch Hoyt, Joseph French, Fredrick Bugbee, Daniel Dana, James Morrill, 2d, Hugh Laughlin, Simon Blanchard.

On the 1st Dec. of Dec. 1818, the barn of Beckwith was burned and a yoke of oxen in it so they died. Fortune again favored him, he soon had track of the incendiaries. Jacob Webster, then living where A. H. Ball lives, who owned and ran a whiskey still was one of the confederates, he learned; one Gore, the one who set the barn on fire. He carried the fire in a dipper, found on or near the place of a building that belonged to the whiskey still.—Gore ran away to Canada, but by some means was captured and turned State's evidence.

Webster deeded his property to James Way and others. Amos and John Beckwith brought a suit against Jacob Webster for burning the barn oxen and produce and recovered a judgement of $737 damages and $62.40 costs.—Webster took an appeal, but that court sustained the judgement of the County Court.. Webster brought several petitions for a new trial, but in each case the court dismissed the petition.

The council for the plaintiffs were Mattocks and Paddock, and for the defendant Fletcher. Israel Fiske was the chief judge. I think, Caleb Fiske of this town was his brother.

John Beckwith, Esq. married Matilda Shaw, March 11, 1821; their children were: Lodoska B., Corydon, Amos, Laura, Daniel N., Truman, John, Henry, Kate and Sarah.

Lodoska Beckwith married R. D. Wilson and lives with Kate and Sarah.

HON. CORYDON BECKWITH.

Corydon, oldest son of John Beckwith, was born at Sutton; educated at Providence, R. I. and Wrentham, Mass. He studied law with Benj. B. Smalley, Esq. at St. Albans; was admitted to the Bar. He went first to Frederick, Md., where he practiced a few years, and returned to St. Albans and formed a partnership with Mr. Smalley; but was soon drawn to Chicago where he made his permanent residence, practicing his profession. While Richard Yates was Governor of Illinois, the chief justice of the state died and the Governor appointed Mr. Beckwith to fill the unexpired term.

GEN. AMOS BECKWITH.

Amos: the second son of John Beckwith, Esq., born at Sutton, was appointed cadet to West Point from the Second District by Gov. Paul Dillingham. When he graduated, he was appointed Lieut. and stationed at Fort Leavenworth, I think, in Capt. Floyd's Company, afterward Gen. Floyd of the Confederate army. Jefferson Davis was Secretary of War and signed Beckwith's commission. He was Commissary of the Potomac army with the rank of Maj. General. He was transferred to General Sherman's command and went with the General on his march to the sea. After the close of the war he was stationed at New Orleans, then at Washington, and then at St. Louis, where he is now.

DANIEL N. BECKWITH.

Daniel N. Beckwith, brother of Amos and Corydon, was Deputy Provost Marshal of the Second Congressional District in the war; then he removed to Ludlow, Mass. where he has since resided.

TRUMAN BECKWITH

went West as a Government Surveyor. He surveyed the state lines of Minnesota and Iowa, and then settled in Iowa.

JOHN BECKWITH

went West with Truman as an assistant surveyor; since the war, has been clerk in the Commissary department under his brother Amos.

Laura Beckwith married David Joy and lives in Ludlow, Mass.

HENRY BECKWITH

was the only one of the sons of John Beckwith that received a collegiate education. He graduated at Union College with high honors, but died soon after.

IN 1803

WILLIAM BROCKWAY from St. Johnsbury came and bought out Joshua Horr; No building now on the place.

JOSHUA STODDARD

settled on the B. M. R Willey farm.

DR. LEMUEL TABOR

settled at Sutton Corner. He married Nancy Hutching. He was the first physician that located here.

Rev. L. H. Tabor, an eminent Universalist clergyman in the State, was born in this town.

JAMES CAMPBELL

a Revolutionary soldier came from Putney and settled on the place now owned by Silas I Leach. At the close of the war, he traveled 200 miles in four days to reach his home.

JAMES CAMPBELL, JR.

son of James Campbell, Sr. lived with his father and was a man of much business capacity and the best read man in the scriptures in town.

Three sons of James Jr. live in town: Milton A. Nahum K. and L. J., all of which have held considerable town office. Nahum, having represented the town twice in the legislature.

Nahum and his son, Gilbert M. are in the business of drover and buyer of wool and country produce.

Martha James the only daughter now living, and the last member of Rev. Amos Beckwith's church, married to Dea. Francis Switzer and lives in St. Johnsbury.

CAPT. BENJAMIN CAMPBELL, son of James, Sr. came from Putney, and settled on the place where Reuben Drown now lives.

EZRA LEE

settled on the road near where Josiah Smith first commenced. He afterwards moved to the North Ridge. He was father of Daniel Lee of this town.

IRA GOODRIDGE

settled on the place where James N. Holtham lives. He represented this town twice in the legislature and held other offices.

WILLIAM DENSMORE

came from Washington, N. H. and settled on the place where Irving Blake lives (the Wheaton Campbell farm) He soon died, leaving a widow and several small children, all of whom she reared and who became leading and respectable citizens. Two of his grandsons are influential citizens in the place where they live.

WILLIAM A. DENSMORE, grandson of William of Sutton, lives in Lyndon, and was the last cashier of Connecticut and Pasumpsic Rivers R. Co. before it was leased to the Boston and Maine R. R. Co. He has also represented the town of Lyndon in the legislature.

DANIEL R. DENSMORE

lives in Burke, he is postmaster, and a merchant.

ROBERT RAMSEY

settled on the place where the late John Beckwith lived. He kept merino sheep here; afterward he moved to St. Johnsbury and lost his property, after which being on a visit at Sutton, he remarked they had a new law at St. Johnsbury; it being inquired what, to settle a man's estate, he said, before he dies, referring to the old bankrupt law.

Jonathan Webster, Peter Dusting, William Kately, Daniel Swain and Stephen Crillis were among the settlers of this year, but as to where they settled, or how long they remained, I have no knowledge.

IN 1804:

There were in town 37 oxen, 103 cows, 8 3-years old, 20 2-years old, 53 horses, 5 colts, 9 watches, 5 houses, 303 sheep, and 593 acres of improved land. Just what the latter was, I do not know; but judging from the books, I conclude it was land after it was seeded to grass or had been mown.

SUTTON LONGEVITY.

BILLYMEAD BECOMES SUTTON.

At a town meeting in Mar. 1812, „Voted to petition General Assembly at their next session to alter the name of the town of Billymead to that of Sutton—United Vote.”

The first notice or warning for town meeting after the name was changed to Sutton was for the purpose of choosing six representatives to Congress from this State, dated Nov. 23, 1812.

The first survey made of roads was on the 9th and 10th of June 1797, commencing at the Lyndon line near where Willard Baldwin lives, from thence to Sutton Village; then from the Village to Burke line by (M. A.
Taft's; then by S. C. Otis place down by John A. Rice's by the Sulphur spring; then over the South Ridge to Lyndon line near Harlow Easterbrooks;
then from the Village to where A. R.
Stone lives; then from Wheelock line to near Mrs. John Holtham's to the road from Willard Baldwin's to the Village. These roads were bounded by beech, maple, birch and hemlock trees.

REV. JONATHAN WOODMAN.
PASTOR AT SUTTON OVER THIRTY YEARS.

REV. JONATHAN WOODMAN

was born in Wheelock, Mar. 27, 1798. He was converted at the age of fifteen and united with the Free Will Baptist church, and at once began to improve his gift by way of holding meetings in the surrounding neighborhoods. At the age of seventeen, he received a license to preach the Gospel. Being naturally modest, retiring, and very conscientious, he was troubled, but as he could not excuse himself from preaching, he continued his efforts in such ways as seemed to him consistent.

In 1816, young Woodman went on horseback from Sutton to Parsonfield, Me. to attend the yearly meeting. He applied to the local Pastor for entertainment, who not knowing him as a preacher told him he could stay in his family if he would bring the water and cut the oven-wood for the women-folk. These conditions, the applicant cheerfully accepted. On Sunday a great congregation filled the meeting-house and hundreds stood outside in respectful and expectant attitude, but the spirit did not move any of the occupants of the platform to preach. After an awkward waiting, some brother from Vermont asked the Boy-preacher to "improve."

Young Woodman consented, and standing on a bench in the doorway, took for his text Isaiah LXI 1: "The spirit of the Lord God is upon me &c." and the spirit of the Lord was not only upon the preacher, but upon the entire congregation, and more than a hundred dated their conversion from that day.

The first three years of his ministry were devoted to evangelistic work, confined mostly to Northern Vermont and some portions of New Hampshire.—

Powerful revivals and large additions to the churches were frequent through those years. He received ordination at St. Johnsbury in 1818 at twenty-two. He married, for his first wife Charlotte Jackson of Madison N. H.; after her decease, he married, 2d., Mrs. Mercy B. Eaton, a daughter of Rev. Moses Norris of Danville. (Norris was one of the early settlers of Sutton). His 2d wife died in 1877.

The pastorates occupied by Mr. Woodman in Vermont were Sutton, Lyndon, Wheelock and Sheffield; New Hampshire: Madison, Effingham, Pelham, Great Falls, Sandwich, and Jackson: in Massachusetts Lowell and Lawrence. His pastoral labors aggregated about sixty years; about forty to Vermont, 15 years to New Hampshire, 5 years to Massachusetts; of these over thirty years were devoted to Sutton. He began and finished his pastoral work with the Sutton church. The close was in 1883.

Mr. Woodman early became an interested and an important factor in the Free Will Baptist denominational work. Mr. Woodman, Rev. Mark Hill of Sutton with others felt the importance of a periodical literature devoted to the interest of the denomination. They were two of the nine known as Hobbs, Woodman & Co who assumed the financial responsibility of publishing a religious newspaper. Mr. Woodman named the paper

THE MORNING STAR.

The first No. of the "Morning Star" was issued at Danville, May 11, 1826.

Mr. Woodman was one of twenty delegates that organized the General Conference of the denomination, which conference met at Tunbridge, Vt., Oct.

11, 1827. He offered the opening prayer. There have been 25 sessions of the General Conference held; of which, Mr. Woodman has attended 14 sessions and presided over two. In 1847, the General Conference was held in Sutton with Pastor Woodman as President. This was in many respects a notable session. Dr. Burns and Goadby of England were present and active members of the conference.

In 1848, Rev. Mr. Woodman and Rev. Eli Noyes were appointed delegates to the General Baptist Conference in England, which they both attended, and at the earnest solicitation of the English brethren, he remained with them four months, preaching in several of their churches.

In person, Mr. Woodman was of the medium height, compact, proportionate and erect. His step was elastic, his movements graceful and his bearing dignified, yet benignant. He was amiable, courteous and devout. He was a close observer of nature, men and current events. In short, he was practically educated. Thirty-five years after the birth of the Free Will Baptist denomination, and seven years after the death of its founder, Jonathan Woodman commenced his public ministry. Since then, he has seen the people with whom he began his ministry increased twenty fold.

He was, also, successful in his financial affairs. He bought a farm of Stephen Blake in 1836 of 170 acres, and followed farming many years with his pastoral duties. He bought, at one time, a threshing-machine and sent it to his son Jonathan in Australia to use there.

He continued to serve the church until September 1885, when he was disabled by a paralytic shock which was followed by another in December 1887, from which time he gradually declined to the end. He died at Tewksbury, Mass., January 1888, in the 90th year of his age. Four days later at Sutton, in a church edifice that had been built under his supervision, filled with a grief-stricken people, his venerable form rested while his brethren conducted an impressive memorial service, when with reverence his remains were borne to the Village cemetery and there deposited to rest till the morning of the resurrection with his people.

REV. MARK HILL

came from Buxton, Me. He married Arvilla Ruggles and settled on the place now owned by L. W. Gordon and for many years carried on the largest amount of farming of any man in town. He was very benevolent and ready to assist charitable calls and also preached in such places as could not easily be reached by others, and never preached on a salary. He built or caused to be, a house for public worship in the edge of Sheffield and organized there a church which was called the Second Free Will Baptist Church of Sheffield.

At his demise, he gave about one half his property, amounting to about $3000, to the Foreign and Home Missionary Societies, American Bible Society and American Tract Society.

HENRY W. EASTERBROOKS was born in Lyndon and married Abigail Ruggles of the same town. When they were married they bought a place in the lower field of the farm owned by L. W. Watson and moved on to it. For some years lived there; then built the house and moved into it where L. W. Watson resides, and lived there until a few years since when he sold his farm to Mr. Watson and moved to the Village. His wife died in March 1888 and he the following August, aged 84 years.

By the closest economy and hard labor they had amassed considerable property, about one third of which, he gave in bequests in the Free Will Baptist denomination.

JOCKTON PUTNAM

came from Burrilville, R. I. and bought the place that H. S. Forbes now owns. He was the first to move to have, and the most influential in having the name of the town changed from Bilymead to Sutton. His son-in-law, Andrew Brown, came with him and lived with his father Jockton. As I am informed, they were men of considerable property; but owing to Brown lending his name on the bond of John Atwood in the John Beckwith suit, which being decided against Atwood he, Brown, was obliged to pay; and there being but little money in circulation in those days, he was obliged to dispose of a large amount of property to obtain sufficient money to pay his share of the bond; and as other misfortunes now followed they soon came to almost financial ruin.

JOSEPH PUTNAM,

son of Jockton, settled on the place now owned by F. W. Barker and John P. Buzzell, erecting the buildings now known as the Buzzell place.

At one time, before Jockton and Joseph Putnam and Andrew Brown had erected the building on the Forbes and Buzzell place, they lived in the house just below the Forbes orchard and Laban Taft, making four families in one, small house. Joseph as soon as his house was built moved in to it and lived there the remainder of his life. His son, Jenks M. married a Woodruff of Burke; one of their daughters married Moulton A. Taft and lives on the old Colby place; the other married Edwin Morgan and lives in Massachusetts.

LABAN TAFT

came from Burrilville, R. I. and lived in different places, but the last of his life, he lived with his son, C. S. Taft. Laban married a Putnam, Jockton's daughter. Their children married and settled in Sutton and Newark.

In June 1812, the town warned out Laban Taft so that he should not gain a residence; in 1887, his sons and grandsons paid more taxes in town, with one exception, than any other family name.

The Tafts were natural musicians, Laban Jr. was one of the sweetest.—Asa P. Taft, a grandson of Laban Sr., has been a music-teacher and at present is employed in the choir of the Universalist church at St. Johnsbury.

I learn, Laban, Sr., one time went to Rhode Island with an ox-team, when he arrived the Rev. John Colby was holding meetings and young Taft attended with the intention of carrying Colby out; but the Spirit came upon him and he was converted, and when he came home he joined the Free Will Baptist Church on Pudding hill in Lyndon and was chosen deacon, which office he held until the church was disorganized a few years ago. Few men have left a record of as good and consistent a Christian life as Deacon Laban did.

WILLIAM HOUGHTON

and his wife, a Clay, came from Lyndon about 1820. Their children were William, James, Albert H., Daniel C. Justin, Stella, Harriet, Diantha, Maria and Marilla.

The parents were exceeding poor and it is said, that many a time, the mother has been heard to say that after one meal was served she did not know where the next was to come from. But some of the children had much force of character and soon made a mark for themselves.

REV. JAMES HOUGHTON.

James, son of William Houghton, became a Congregational minister and lived in Burlington. One of his sons, J. C. Houghton, is cashier of the First National Bank at Montpelier.

ALBERT H. HOUGHTON

went South and became very wealthy as a merchant, dealing largely in cotton; but during Sherman's march to the sea the Rebels burned his store and merchandize rather than have it fall into the hands of Sherman and the Union. He then came North and settled in New York; went into the firm of Hurd, Houghton & Co., Publishers, and died there. It is told of Albert when a boy that the family having dined on potatoes alone without salt for several days then procuring some salt, Albert took a large lump and ate it to season his potatoes.

HENRY O. HOUGHTON

of the firm of Houghton, Mifflin & Co. Riverside Press, Cambridge, Mass., has lately made the Library Association of Sutton the offer that for every book they buy of him at the catalogue price he will give them one of the same volume. It is said that some time he intends to give his native town a library.

DANIEL CLAY HOUGHTON, D.D.

was educated at the University of Vermont, class of 1841. Among his classmates were the late Henry J. Raymond of the New York Times, afterwards Congressman, and J. R. Spaulding of the New York World,

At the time of his death in 1860, Dr. Houghton was Editor of "The American Presbyterian." He was a man of great energy, sterling worth and large discretion. "He held an able and ready pen as his writings and contributions as editor show."

STELLA HOUGHTON.

Stella educated herself and went to Tuscaloosa, Ala. to teach and afterward married a rich planter and died there.

MARILLA HOUGHTON.

Marilla was educated by her brothers and sisters and went West to teach in 1858. She married Dr John C. Gallop, and in 1861, they founded the Houghton Seminary in Clinton, N. Y. Here she lived and assisted her husband in the management of the school up to 1880, when the Doctor resigned as principal and A. G. Benidict was appointed to the position. The writer understands the school was founded and managed principally by Mrs. Gallop—through her efforts. I find in the Memorial of the Doctor, that Rose Cleveland the late Mistress of the White House was educated at the Houghton Seminary and wrote a letter (with many others,) of sympathy to Mrs. Gallop on the death of the late Dr. John C. Gallop in 1884.

MARIA HOUGHTON.

Maria went West as a missionary and it is said, suffered many hardships in the prosecution of her self-appointed work for the benefit of others.

REV. JOHN COLBY'S BOOK.

Rev. John kept a journal and it was published in a book of two or three hundred pages. Occasionally, we find a copy in the hands of some old people.

LITTLE HOUSEHOLD PET.

BY MRS. EMILY J. COLBY.*

In the spring time, low, we laid her,
 Darling, little, household pet,
 And our hearts are filled with anguish
 And our eyes with tears are wet.

Yes, we miss her, sadly miss her
 In the parlor, in the hall;
 Oft we stop and listen, listen
 For her merry voice to call.

Can the angels need the children
 On that bright, celestial plain?
 Is the heavenly music sweeter
 That they join the glad refrain?

Perhaps the Father saw our need
 And to draw our hearts to Him
 Took our treasure up to Heaven,
 That we might long to enter there.

Oft we hear our darling's voice
 Sweetly calling Father, come!
 Father, mother, meet your children
 In this bright, celestial home."

WHERE IS MY CHILD TO-NIGHT?

I do not see my darling to-day
 Amid the buttercups and clover,
 I wonder if they miss in their play
 The face of their sweet little lover.

Oh, buttercups! gleaming golden,
 Fair, ox-eye daisies silvery white,
 Tell me as you nod and blossom,
 Where is my child to-night?

Oh, honey-bee! you jolly rover,
 Do you miss the little feet to-day
 As you dip in and out the clover?
 Where is she, honey-bee, say, oh! say?

Bright sunshine burning warm and yellow,
 Do you miss the gleam of golden hair?
 Dear bobolink, with tone so mellow,
 Where is the, singing voice so rare?

The buttercup drops its petals,
 Sadly the daisy bends its head,
 The bobolink whispers the lilies
 "Her winsome, glad maiden is dead."

EMILY J. COLBY.

*Mrs. Emily J. Colby of Sutton is the grand-daughter of Deac. Thomas Colby; George W. Colby, her husband, the grand-nephew of the Rev. John Colby. Mrs. Colby's non deplume is Dora Sutton.

THE MILITARY HISTORY

AND

Census of Bennington County,

BY HON. HILAND HALL, LL. D.

THE COUNTY OF BENNINGTON.

BY HON. HILAND HALL.

Notices of the County prior to 1860 are found in Volume I at pages 121 and 250-253.

POPULATION.

At page 251 is a table showing the population of each of the towns in the county, at the dates when the census was taken up to and including the census of 1860.—Below is a like table of the population of the same towns by the census of 1860, 1870, 1880, as follows :

Bennington Co.	—1860—1870—1880.
Arlington,	—1146—1636—1532, gain 386.
Bennington,	—4302—5760—6333, gain 2031.
Dorset,	—2090—2195—2005, loss 85.
Glastenbury,	— 47— 119— 241, gain 194.
Landgrove,	— 320— 302— 266, loss 74.
Manchester,	—1688—1897—1928, gain 240.
Peru,	— 556, gain 13.

Pownal,	—1733—1705—2015, gain 282.
Readsborough,	— 929— 828— 745, loss 184.
Rupert,	—1103—1017— 957, loss 146.
Sandgate,	— 805 —705— 681, loss 124
Searsburg,	— 263— 235— 232, loss 31.
Shaftsbury,	—1937—2027—1887, loss 50.
Stamford,	— 760— 633— 726, loss 34.
Sunderland,	— 567— 553— 655, gain 88.
Winhall,	— 741— 842— 721, loss 20.
Woodford,	— 379— 371— 487, gain 108.
	—19443-21325-21947.

By this table it will be seen that the population of the county for the twenty years from 1860 to 1880 has increased from 19,443 to 21,947, being a gain of 2,504 and that in general there has been a slight decrease in the towns which are almost exclusively devoted to agricultural pursuits ; while the gain in numbers has been in those engaged in manufactures and lumbering, viz: in Arlington, Bennington, Glastenbury, Manchester, Pownal, Sunderland and Woodford. The large percentage of increase in Glastenbury is attributed to the construction of the Glastenbury railroad of about 9 miles in length from Bennington up into the mountain regions from which lumber and charcoal have been more cheaply transported to the South and East than formerly.

BENNINGTON COUNTY IN THE WAR FOR THE UNION.

The patriotic ardor which pervaded the North on the fall of Fort Sumpter and the consequent call of the President of April 15th, 1861, for 75,000 volunteers, was as earnest and active in the town and county of Bennington in its determination to suppress the rebellion and preserve the union, as in any part of the country. In Bennington, the flag of the stars and strips, the symbol and representative of love of country and of the Union, was at once suspended across the street and displayed on public buildings and private dwellings.

THE FIRST WAR-MEETING.

A public meeting was held on the evening of the 19th of April, filling the largest hall in town, that was attended and addressed by men of both political parties. During the meeting news came of the massacre, on the morning of that day, of Massachusetts men on their way at the call of the President for the defence of the Capitol, by a mob of Secessionists at Baltimore. The day was recalled as the anniversary of the murdering assault on the Revolutionary patriots by the British at Lexington. The enthusiasm for sustaining the government of the Union was intense.

The Star Spangled Banner was sung and stirring resolutions were unanimously passed to take the most energetic measures to raise men for that purpose. Similar patriotic action was taken by other towns of the County.

The Governor of the state had promptly called an extra session of the Legislature which met on the 23d of April and enacted laws for raising, organizing and equipping as volunteers, or by drafting, if found necessary, such number of regiments as might be required by the General Government; and also made provisions for paying the noncommissioned officers and privates who should enter the service, $7 per month beyond the usual pay allowed by the United States. To meet the immediate call of the President, ten companies of already organized militia in different towns of the State were mustered into the service of the United States on the 2d of May, for three months, which constituted the First Vermont Regiment in the War for the Union. The companies were from the following towns, viz :

Company A., Swanton, Franklin Co.
Co. B., Woodstock, Windsor Co.
Co. C., St. Albans, Franklin Co.
Co. D., Bradford, Orange Co.
Co. E., Cavendish, Windsor Co.
Co. F., Northfield, Washington Co.
Co. G., Brandon, Rutland Co.
Co. H., Burlington, Chittenden Co.
Co. I., Middlebury, Addison Co.
Co. K., Rutland, Rutland Co.

The regiment was under the command of Col. J. W. Phelps and consisted of 780 men.

THE SECOND REGIMENT

FOR THREE YEARS SERVICE.

A full company of volunteers for permanent service was speedily recruited in Bennington, a list of the names of which, both officers and men, with the towns from which they came, will be found in the first volume of this Gazetteer at page 259.

This company of which the commissioned officers were: James H. Walbridge, Captain, and Newton Stone and William H. Cady, lieutenants, was the first company raised in the State for the three years service, and accordingly became Company A of the Regiment.

The Regiment was mustered into the U. S. service, June 20, 1861, and continued in the service more than four years, until July 15th, 1865 when the regiment was mustered out.

The term of the men who had first enlisted had expired before that time and their places had been supplied by second enlistments of the same men in part, but largely by new recruits, so that the majority of the men, both officers and privates of which the regiment has been originally composed was probably, from this cause in connection with the various casualties incident to so long a service, no longer members of it.

This remark applies with slowly decreasing effect to the subsequently raised regiments for the three years service.

All the troops hereafter mentioned were for three years, except the 13th and 14th regiments, which were for 9 months only.

The following is a Roster of the FIELD, STAFF AND COMPANY OFFICERS from the County of Bennington of the

THE BATTLE OF BENNINGTON.

AUGUST 16, 1777.

BY HON HILAND HALL.

INTRODUCTORY

In the following account of the Battle of Bennington, only the leading facts are attempted to be given, numerous interesting and exciting incidents being necessarily omitted.

In order to have a just appreciation of the battle and its consequences, it is necessary to call to mind the condition of country and of the State at the time of its occurrence.

The campaign of 1776 in the North ern department had been disastrous to the American arms. After suffering severe losses our forces had been driven from Canada in great distress, and the enemy by the destruction of the American flotilla had obtained full command of the waters of Lake Champlain. Great numbers of troops were arriving at Quebec from Europe, and a fearful invasion was expected at the opening of the lake in the spring. To meet such an invasion extensive works had been erected at Ticonderoga, on which great reliance was placed. But they were defective in arrangement, and but partially manned, and on the approach of Gen. Burgoyne with a powerful army, Gen. St. Clair found they would be wholly untenable, and felt compelled to abandon them. The rear guard of his retreating army, under the command of Col. Seth Warner, was overtaken the next day, July 7, 1777, at Hubbardton, by a large body of the enemy, and after a brave resistance, during which many were killed and wounded on both sides, was overpowered by numbers and obliged to give way. The greater portion of St. Clair's force succeeded in forming a junction with Gen. Schuyler at Fort Edward, while the remnant of Colonel Warner's regiment, about 140 strong, took post at Manchester.

Burgoyne's army, numbering about 9,000 men was equipped and furnished with every war-like material that wealth and skill could supply, and consisted mostly of British and German veterans, with bodies of Canadians and Tories, and a formidable horde of Indians. Its commander expected to make a triumphant march to Albany, there to be met by an army from New York, and thus by obtaining the control of the Hudson River, and cutting off New England from the other states, to complete the conquest of the country for the King. He had already issued a flaming proclamation, threatening destruction to the lives and property of all who should oppose him, but promising protection and security to those who should give him their adhesion, and offering payment "in solid coin" for all provisions that should be brought to his camp. On the 10th of July, having reached Skenesbough, (Whitehall) he issued another proclamation in which he directed "the inhabitants of Castleton, Hubbardton, Rutland, Tinmouth, Pawlet, Wells and Granville, with the neighboring districts; also the districts bordering on White Creek, (Salem) Camden, Cambridge, &c.," to send ten persons or more from each township to meet Col. Skeene at Castleton on the 15th, who would communicate conditions upon which the persons and properties of the disobedient might yet be spared." The proclamation concluded with the following barbarous threat: "This fail not under the pain of military execution."

To a large portion of the frontier inhabitants, Burgoyne's army appeared irresistible. If he should let loose his horde of savages upon them which in his first proclamation he said amounted to thousands, there would seem to be no escape for them. Great numbers from those towns, and some from towns still further to the south, repaired to Col. Skene and taking the oath of allegiance to the Crown, some from choice and some from supposed necessity, received written protections for their security. Of these many took up arms against their country and joined the invading army. But the more patriotic portion of the inhabitants scorning submission to the invaders, abandoned their homes to the mercy of the enemy, and taking with them such of their effects as they were able to transport fled to the south, some stopping in Bennington, but most of them going on to their friends in Berkshire Co. and Connecticut. Berkshire county in the language of a contemporary, 'was burdened with these fugitives.' Nearly all of the territory between Bennington and the route of Burgoyne towards the Hudson and Albany was thus made in effect an enemy's country, and Bennington became a frontier town.

Prior to the Revolution the territory of Vermont was known by the name of The New Hampshire Grants, over which the government of New York claimed jurisdiction and also the title of its lands. This claim was disputed by its inhabitants, who after a long and severe controversy, had by a convention of the delegates held at Westminster on the 17th of January, 1777, declared the territory an independent State. At the time of the evacuation of Ticonderoga by St. Clair a subsequent convention of the new State was in session at Windsor, engaged in the work of framing its new constitution of government; and the abandonment of that post left the families of many of its members in immediate peril. At the news of this alarming event the constitution was somewhat hurriedly adopted, and having appointed a Council of Safety to manage the affairs of the State until the regular government could be put in operation, the convention adjourned.

The Council of Safety thus constituted met first at Manchester, but soon adjourned to Bennington, where it continued in permanent session throughout the year, adopting and carrying into effect the most energetic measures for protecting the State against its foreign, as well as its domestic enemies. Pressing messages having been sent to New Hampshire and Massachusetts for aid, such of the militia as could be gathered were called out to strengthen the force of Col. Warner at Manchester, where an attack was apprehended. A permanent force to patrol the frontiers and to guard against any covert outbreak of the tories in their midst, was indispensable; and to provide means for maintaining such a force and to meet their other expenses in defending the State, the Council ordered the property of those of their inhabitants that had joined the enemy to be sequestered and sold. A proper fund being thus secured, a regiment of Rangers was organized under the command of Col. Samuel Herrick, which did valuable service to the State and country.

New Hampshire responded nobly to the call of the Vermont Council. The Assembly at once ordered a large portion of their militia to be organized into a brigade and placed under the command of General John Stark. He had served with credit and honor in the previous French war and as Colonel at Bunker Hill, and in Canada, and under Washington at Trenton, and Princeton, but Congress had promoted junior officers over him, and he had resigned his commission and retired from the service, though he retained the same patriotic ardor as before. He was reluctant to be placed under officers he had outranked and there was also at the time a very general distrust in New England of Gen. Schuyler who was in command of the Northern department; for which reasons General Stark's written instructions were of a discretionary character. He was directed "to repair to Charleston, No. 4 and when the troops were collected there "to take the command of them and march into the State of Vermont, and there act in conjunction with the troops of that State, or any other of the States, or of the United States, or seperatly, as it should appear expedient to him, for the protection of the people or the annoyance of the enemy."

Crossing the Green Mountain from Charleston with the greater part of his command, Stark reached Manchester on the 7th of August, where he met Gen. Lincoln, who had been sent from Stillwater by Gen. Schuyler to conduct his militia to the west bank of the Hudson. Stark communicated his instructions and declined obedience on the ground of the dangerous condition in which it would leave the people of Vermont, and because he believed Burgoyne would be more embarassed in his operations by his remaining on his left, than by his joining the army in front. But for this refusal of Stark, which was founded on the soundest military view of the state of affairs, Bennington would have been in a measure defenceless, and would, doubtless, have fallen a prey to the enemy.

At Manchester, Stark found that a considerably large body of the enemy which for some time had been at Castleton, threatening Manchester and to cross over to Connecticut River, had marched to the Hudson. He, with his force, passed on to Bennington, where he arrived on the 9th. He was accompanied by Col. Warner, whose continental regiment was left at Manchester under the command of Lieut. Colonel Samuel Safford. At Bennington, Gen. Stark encamped for a few days, collecting information in regard to the position and the designs of the enemy, and consulting with the Council of Safety, and with Col. Warner relative to future operations.

The progress of Burgoyne towards Albany had been so retarded by the natural difficulties of the route, and the obstructions thrown in his way by the Americans, that it was nearly a month after his departure from Ticonderoga before he reached the Hudson River. Here he found himself so deficient in provisions, and also in cattle and carriages for transportation that he was much embarrassed about the means for advancing further. Learning that the articles he most needed had been collected at Bennington as a convenient depot to supply the American forces, he resolved to seize them for the use of his own army.

For this service Lieut. Col. Baume was selected. Burgoyne in his letter to the English Ministry states the force under his command to have consisted of 200 dismounted dragoons, "Captain Frazer's marksmen, (called, also, Rangers) which were the only British, all the Canadian volunteers, a party of Provincials, (Col. Peter's corps of Tories,) 100 Indians and two light pieces of cannon, the whole detachment amounting to about 500 men." There is no doubt this number is too small by several hundred. The German official accounts give the number of the troops of Baume at 374 instead of 200; and of the British, Canadians and Tories, the prisoners taken in the action, amounted to 230, as will be seen hereafter, which would swell Baume's force to over 600, without reckoning those who were killed in battle and the many who escaped by flight. There can be little doubt that the number of men brought into action by Baume exceeded 700, besides his 100 Indians. Col. Skene, at the request of Burgoyne, had accompanied the expedition that the German Commander might have the benefit of his better knowledge of the country and of his supposed influence with its people.

PREPARING FOR THE BATTLE.

Baume set off with his force on the 13th of August, and arrived the same day at Cambridge, 16 miles from Bennington. Early the next morning, he reached Sancoick, a small settlement near the mouth of the White Creek branch of the Walloomsac river, about half a mile below the present village of North Hoosick. Here he found a party of Americans in possession of a mill which they abandoned on his approach, and in the mill, on the head of a barrel, he wrote Burgoyne an account of his progress, informing him that "by five prisoners taken here they agree that 1500 to 1800 men are at Bennington, but are supposed to leave at our approach."

They did leave on his approach, but not in the direction he had anticipated. The old mill at Sancoick is still standing and in use by John Burke, the present owner, and is about 8 miles from Bennington.

Gen. Stark on the 13th had received information from scouts that a party of Indians were at Cambridge, and he sent Lieut. Col. Gregg of his brigade with 200 men to stop their progress, but during the night, he was advised that a large body of troops with artillery were in the rear of the Indians and that they were advancing towards Bennington. He immediately sent to Manchester for Col. Warner's continental regiment, and also for the neighboring militia to rally to his support.

On the morning of the 14th he assembled his brigade, and in company with Cols. Warner, Williams, Herrick and Brush went out to meet the enemy. He had marched about five miles when he met Gregg on his retreat from Sancoick and the enemy in close pursuit. Stark drew up his men in order of battle, but Baume halted in a commanding position, and the ground occupied by Stark, being unfavorable for a general attack, he fell back about a mile and encamped. His encampment was in the north-west part of Bennington, on the farm formerly owned by Paul M. Henry, on the Hill, upon which a dwelling has lately been erected by Lewis Northouse, the present proprietor.

The Walloomsac river is a branch of the Hoosick, fordable in most places, having in general a westerly course, but which after passing Stark's encampment runs in a northern direction for half a mile, then westerly for a mile and a half, where it turns suddenly to the south and pursues that course for three-quarters of a mile or more. Here on the west side of the river, Baume halted and made his arrangements for defense. On the top of a thickly wooded hill which rises abruptly three or four hundred feet from the west bank of the stream, he posted the greater part of his Germans under his own immediate command. This position was west of the sudden bend in the stream, and Baume's front to the east was well secured against an attack by the precipitous ascent of the hill on that side, which impracticable ascent extended from his camp for half a mile along the bank of the river to the bridge at the southern foot of the hill, over which the road from Bennington to Sancoick, and Cambridge passed. On the top of this hill Baume prepared entrenchments of earth and logs to resist attacks from the west and on his flanks.

For the defense of the important pass at the bridge, Baume caused a strong breast-work to be thrown up on the high bank of the river, on which was mounted one of his cannon, in charge of a body of German Grenadiers. Two small breast works were also erected on opposite sides of the road, near the west end of the bridge which were manned by Frazer's marksmen; and the position was still further strengthened by posting all the Canadians in log huts which were standing near the bridge on both sides of the river. This point is where the river is now crossed by the covered railroad bridge, about three miles from North Bennington on the route to Troy.

Baume on his way from the Hudson, and at his encampment had been joined by a considerable number of Tories, many of them under the lead of Col. Francis Pfister, a half pay British officer of wealth and extensive influence who occupied an imposing residence erected by him on the west bank of the Hoosick, near what is now known as Hoosick Corners. These with most of Peter's corps of loyalists were posted on a hill east of the stream 40 or 50 rods to the south-east of the bridge.

Here, strong works of defense were erected, known as the "Tory Breast-work," and of which Col. Pfister is understood to have been placed in command. On its right was a sharp ravine and both flanks would have the protection of ball and grape from the cannon at the bridge. The other cannon in charge of German grenadiers, supported by some Tories, appears to have been placed further to the west in a cleared field near the road. It was on a hillside which overlooked and commanded the approaches to the bridge and to the Tory encampment, and also to the south flank of Baume's encampment. It may have been moved nearer to Baume's position during the engagement. (The several positions of Baume's forces are shown by the plan in Burgoyne's account of his expedition, of which a copy on a reduced scale is given in the "Memorials of a Century by the Rev. Isaac Jennings, and another still smaller is found in Lossing's Field Book of the Revolution. The top of the map is west and upon it the Tories are designated as "American Volunteers," the British marksmen as "Rangers," the Americans as "Bodies of the enemy." All others except the "Canadians," are Germans, the "Chasseurs" being German marksmen. On Burgoyne's map the Walloomsac is called the Hoosick.) The encampments of the two hostile bodies, though little more than two miles apart were entirely hidden from the sight of each other by a heavily wooded, intervening hill.

The force under General Stark was composed of the greater part of his brigade of New Hampshire militia, a small number of Vermont militia from the east side of the mountain, under Col. William Williams, who had been stationed at Manchester, Col. Herrick's corps of Rangers then forming, the State militia from Bennington and its vicinity under Col. Nathaniel Brush, and on the morning of the 16th Stark was joined by Col. Simonds and some militia from Berkshire County (Mass.) His whole force might perhaps have numbered about 1600.

On the night of the 14th after ascertaining the position of the enemy, Stark called a council, consisting of the leading members of the Council of Safety as well as of Cols. Warner and Herrick and other military officers, in which a plan for attacking the enemy was discussed and adopted, and it was agreed that the attack should be made the next morning. But the 15th was so excessively rainy as to prevent any attempt at a general action. Scouts were however sent out some of which were engaged in successful skirmishes.

THE BATTLE

The morning of the 16th was bright and clear and Stark prepared for the attack in accordance with the plan previously agreed upon. Col. Nichols with 200 of the New Hampshire troops, to which a reinforcement of 100 was afterward added, was detached to make a wide circuit to the north of Baume's post, and come round upon the rear of his left, and Col. Herrick with 300 men, composed of his Rangers and Col. Brush's militia, was to make a like wide southern circuit to the rear of his right, the two parties to meet and make a joint attack upon his entrenchments. Cols. Hubbard and Stickney with 300 men of Stark's brigade, were ordered to the enemy's extreme right. While these three detachments were gaining their assigned positions, the enemy was amused by a threatened attack on his front.

About three o'clock in the afternoon firing was commenced by the party under Nichol's which was the signal for a general assault. It was immediately followed by the detachment under Herrick, and by that of Hubbard and Stickney, while Stark, himself with his reserve of New Hampshire men and the Berkshire and some Vermont militia, in the face of the enemy's cannon, assailed the Tory breast-work and the pass at the bridge in front. The engagement thus became general and "lasted" says Stark in his report to Gates, "two hours, and was the hottest, I ever saw—it represented one continued clap of thunder." The Indians alarmed at the prospect of being enclosed between the parties of Nichols and Herrick, fled at the beginning of the fight, but Baume with his Germans and all others under his command, having the advantage of their position behind entrenchments, which the rain of the 15th had given them ample time to erect and make strong, fought with great resolution and bravery, but they were overpowered by their militia assailants and either fled or surrendered prisoners of war.

The battle being ended and the prisoners sent off to Bennington under a proper guard, the militia dispersed to look over the field and collect plunder. but very soon intelligence was brought that a large, additional force from the British army was approaching, and within the distance of two miles. This body of men was under the command of Col. Breyman and consisted, besides 22 officers of 620 rank and file, all Germans, with two pieces of cannon, which Burgoyne on hearing that the force at Bennington was greater than had been expected, had dispatched to reinforce Baume. The rain of the preceding day and the heaviness of the roads had delayed Breyman's arrival until the victory over the men he had been sent to aid had been accomplished. The victors were however in great confusion, and it appeared difficult to stop the progress of the new enemy. Happily at this juncture, Warner's regiment of about 140 men which had been delayed by the rain, in its march from Manchester, came up fresh under Lieut. Col. Safford and took its position in front, serving as a rallying point for the scattered militia. Breyman advanced with his two brass field pieces up the road with wings of infantry on each side of it, occasionally firing his cannon to clear the way, the Americans slowly retiring before him. When a considerable body of the militia had been collected a stand was made (about 40 or 50 rods east of the present Walloomsac depot) and Breyman's force brought to a halt. Here he was attacked in front and flanks, a most deadly fire being poured into his ranks from a wooded hill on his left. The action was very severe and continued till after sunset, when many of Breyman's men being killed and wounded and his artillery horses shot down, he abandoned his cannon and fled. Gen. Stark pursued his flying forces till the approaching darkness rendered it necessary to draw off his men to prevent their firing upon each other. "With one hour more of daylight," says Stark in his official report, "we should have captured the whole body."

EFFECTS OF THE BATTLE.

Among the trophies of this day's victories, were four brass field pieces, twelve brass drums, 250 sabres, four ammunition wagons, several hundred stand of arms, and 658 prisoners, and 207 were left dead on the field. The whole loss of the enemy could not have been much less than 900 men. Some of the contemporaneous accounts make the number still larger. Of the prisoners, 30 of them were officers, 37 British soldiers, 398 Hessians, 38 Canadians, and 155 Tories. Col. Baume was mortally wounded and taken prisoner as was also Col. Pfister, the commander of the Tory entrenchment. Both were taken about a mile to a house in the town of Shaftsbury, which a few years ago was still standing opposite the present paper-mill of Charles E. Welling, known as 'the Baume house,' in which they both died within a day or two afterwards.

The loss of the Americans in both engagements was about 30 killed and 40 wounded.

This victory, in which undisciplined husbandmen with their hunting guns without bayonets, bravely stormed entrenchments manned by regular troops and defended by cannon, is justly styled by Bancroft as "one of the most brilliant and eventful of the war." The loss of the enemy in men and material was severely felt. But the consequences were otherwise still more important.—By inspiring confidence on the one side, and depressing the spirits of the other, the current of successes was at once turned from the British to the American arms.

The fate of Burgoyne and his army was in effect sealed at Bennington, and his final capture well assured. General Washington, on being informed of the event, considered it as deciding the fate of Burgoyne, and dismissed all anxiety about his invasion. Its effect upon the enemy was most disheartening.—Madame Riedesel, wife of the commanding general of the German troops who accompanied her husband through the campaign, says in her memoirs, that by Baume's failure "the army was prevented from advancing, while the enemy, recovering suddenly from depression, increased their numbers daily."—Burgoyne, himself, though he struggled on for a few weeks longer, was evidently disheartened. Four days after Baume's defeat, after preparing a dispatch to the British minister for the public ear, he wrote him another letter marked Private, dated "Camp near Saratoga, Aug. 20. 1777," in which he gave quite a gloomy account of his affairs, treating the failure of the expedition to Bennington as his great misfortune, in which he says of it, that, "Had I succeeded, I should have formed a junction with St. Leger and been now before Albany." After speaking dis-paragingly of the tories, he says: "The great bulk of the country is undoubtedly with the Congress," and of the Vermonters, he bitterly adds, "the Hampshire Grants in particular, a country unpeopled and almost unknown in the last war, now abounds in the most active and most rebellious race on the continent, and hangs like a gathering storm on my left."

To General Stark should be assigned the highest meed of praise for the victory; but he was nobly aided by the skill and valor of both his officers and men, and they are all with him entitled to the lasting gratitude of their country. Of his officers, Col. Warner is undoubtedly entitled to special credit. Warner was a colonel in the Continental army, had acquired a high reputation as a military leader, by his services in Canada and at Hubbardton, and he had long been a resident of Bennington and was familiarly acquainted with the ground occupied by the posts of the enemy and their approaches. He was Stark's chief adviser in planning the attack on the enemy, he went into the action by his side and was his active associate in the first engagement, as well as in repelling the attack of Breyman's reinforcement. Dr. Thacher in his contemporary Military Journal says "Stark assisted by Warner matured his plans for the battle." and Stark, himself in his letter to Gates after speaking in the highest terms of the daring bravery of the officers and soldiers under his command says, "Col. Warner's superior skill in the action was of extraordinary service to me." Gordon also in his history speaks highly of the services of Col. Warner and those of Col. Her- rick of the Vermont Rangers. Other officers and men deserve notice for their meritorious exertions in gaining the victory, but the space allowed for this article will not permit it. There are also numerous interesting incidents connected with the battle that must for the like reason be omitted. It has been only possible to give the leading facts.

General Stark from his arrival at Manchester acted in concert with the Vermont Council of Safety and received their earnest countenance and support in all his movements which were duly appreciated by him as is shown by a publication in the Connecticut "Courant" over his own signature in which he passed on the Council a high eulogium for their patriotic exertions and services.

When the Congress at Philadelphia was informed of Gen. Stark's declining to move his force from Manchester to the west side of the Hudson, as before mentioned, a resolve was passed disapproving of it. But after the wisdom of his conduct in that respect had been demonstrated by his victory and its fortunate effect on the campaign, they came tardily to the determination to do him full justice by approving his patriotic services and restoring him to his merited rank in the army.

On the 4th day of October, 1777, Congress unanimously passed the following resolution:

"RESOLVED: That the thanks of Congress be presented to Gen. Stark of The New Hampshire Militia, and the Officers and troops under his command, for their brave and successful attack upon, and signal victory over the Enemy in their lines at Bennington; and that Brigadier Stark be appointed Brigadier General in the Army of the United States."

Two weeks after the passage of this resolution by Congress, on the 17th of October, the event, which Stark's Victory at Bennington had clearly foreshadowed, and made certain,— was accomplished by the surrender of Burgoyne and his army as prisoners of war, to the American forces at Saratoga.

THE OLD CATAMOUNT TAVERN

AT BENNINGTON, VT.

On the 30th of March 1871, the old "Catamount Tavern" House,— which had long been the most notable relic of early times in the Centre Village of Bennington, Vermont, was burnt to the ground. It had been unoccupied for a short time and the origin of the fire is unknown. The house which was in a tolerable state of preservation, had been built over a hundred years; having been erected by Captain Stephen Fay, a year or two prior to 1770. It was a wooden building, about 44 feet by 34, two stories high, having two high chimneys with high fire-places in each story, besides which, there was a very large fire-place in the cellar or basement, part of which was used as a wash-room, and cook-room as occasion required.

The two chimneys are now standing, (Autumn of 1871) exhibiting their spacious fire-places with heavy, iron cranes in those of the lower story and basement. On the marble mantle of one of the fire-places the words "COUNCIL ROOM," appear, cut there in early times.

On the top of the high sign-post before the front door, was placed the stuffed skin of a catamount, from which came the name of the house, though in early days, it was in accordance with the custom of the time more generally spoken of as "Landlord Fay's."

During the period of the early settlement of the State, the house was a great resort for travelers and emigrants, and it was also widely known as the Head Quarters of the settlers in their contest with the New York land claimants. It was the home of Ethan Allen for several years from 1770, when he first came to the "New Hampshire Grants," as Vermont was then called.

The settlers held their lands under grants from New Hampshire, to which the territory was supposed to belong; but in 1764, the King, by an order in Council placed them under the jurisdiction of New York. Whereupon the Governor of that Province declared their titles to be void, and regranted their lands to speculators, who recovered judgement in the New York courts against the settlers, and sent their sheriffs and posses to execute them, who were resisted by the occupants and forcibly prevented from obtaining possession. This controversy raged for years, and the settlers appointed committees of safety before whom offenders against the integrity of their titles, styled "Yorkers," were brought for trial. On conviction they were variously punished, sometimes by banishment from the territory, and sometimes by whipping on the naked back, a mode of punishment for crime then in common use throughout the country. The latter punishment in allusion to the great seal of the Governor of New Hampshire, affixed to their charter titles, and to the instrument with which it was commonly inflicted, the settlers humorously called "the application of the beach seal."

Another mode of punishment was devised for one offender, residing within their own limits: One Dr. Samuel Adams of Arlington, who had held his lands under a New Hampshire charter, suddenly became an open advocate of the New York title, advising his neighbors to purchase it. This tended to weaken the opposition to New York by producing division among the settlers, and he was repeatedly warned to desist from such discourse, but he persisted in his offensive language, and arming himself with pistols and other weapons threatened death to any one who should molest him. What followed is related in the language of a contemporary: The Doctor was soon taken by surprise and carried (15 miles) to the Green Mountain (Landlord Fay's) tavern, at Bennington, where the committee heard his defense, and then ordered him to be tied in an arm-chair and hoisted up to the sign—(a catamount skin stuffed, sitting upon the sign-post, 25 feet from the ground, with large teeth, looking and grinning toward New York) and there to hang two hours in sight of the people, as a punishment merited by his enmity to the rights and liberty of the inhabitants of the New Hampshire Grants. The judgement was executed to the no small merriment of a large concourse of the people.

The Doctor was let down and dismissed by the committee with an admonition to go and sin no more. The mild and exemplary disgrace had a salutary effect on the Doctor and many others." Dr. Adams, on Burgoyne's invasion, became a violent tory and fled to Canada, from which he never returned.

When Sir Wm. Tryon, Governor of New York in 1771, issued a proclamation offering a reward of £ 20 each for the apprehension of Ethan Allen, Remember Baker, and Robert Cochran for their riotous opposition to the New York government, they retaliated by publishing over their names a counter proclamation offering a reward of £15 for James Duane and £10 for John Kemp, their two leading land-claiming antagonists, styling them "those common disturbers of the public peace," the rewards so made payable on their being brought to "Landlord Fay's at Bennington.

The following is a copy of the proclamation:

 £ 25 REWARD!

Whereas James Duane and John Kemp of New York, have by their menaces and threats greatly disturbed the public peace and repose of the honest peasants of Bennington, and the settlements to the northward, which peasants are now and ever have been in the peace of God and the King, and patriotic and liege subjects of George III. Any person that will apprehend those common disturbers, viz: James Duane, and John Kemp, and bring them to Landlord Fay's at Bennington, shall have £15 reward for James Duane and £ 10 for John Kemp, paid by

Ethan Allen,
Remember Baker,
Robert Cochran.

Dated Poultney,
Feb'y 5, 1772.

Colonel Ethan Allen was sojourning at the "Catamount Tavern" in the spring of 1775 and from the "Council Room" of that house went forth his order of May 3d, for mustering the Green Mountain Boys for the capture of Ticonderoga, which was effected seven days afterwards "in the name of the great Jehovah and the Continental Congress."

In this noted tavern house, sat the Vermont Council of Safety during the trying campaign of 1777, guiding and directing the patriotic exertions of the Green Mountain Boys to stem the torrent of Burgoyne's invasion; and here also, Stark and Warner, with the aid of the Council, planned the famous attack on Baume's entrenchments, where was won the brilliant victory of Bennington, which turned the current of success from the British to the American arms and was followed in a few weeks [as told in the preceding pages,] by the capture of Burgoyne and his army at Saratoga.

Captain Fay, the proprietor of the house had five sons in the battle of Bennington, one of whom was killed. On being told that one of his sons had fallen in the fight, the venerable patriot through his deep grief "thanked God that he had a son that was willing to die for his country."

Here in 1778 was tried and condemned one David Redding, a traitor and spy; and in a field in front of the house a gallows had been erected and a great crowd had assembled to see him executed. But on the morning fixed for the execution, the Governor and Council granted him a reprieve for one week, for the reason that he had been tried by a jury of six, while by the common law there ought to have been twelve. The multitude, who had as well as the six jurors condemned the traitor, were clamorous at their disappointment, and violence was seriously apprehended, whereupon Col. Ethan Allen, who had just returned from his long English captivity mounted a stump and waving his hat and exclaiming: "Attention, the whole!—proceeded to announce the reasons which produced the reprieve; advised the multitude to depart peaceably to their habitations, and to return on the day fixed by the Governor and Council, adding with an oath, "You shall see somebody hung at all events, for if Redding is not then hung, I will be hung myself!" Upon which the uproar ceased and the crowd dispersed. Redding being again tried and convicted by a jury of twelve was hung on the day to which his reprieve had been granted, in accordance with Allen's prediction.

The children of Captain Fay were numerous and respectable, and several of them have been prominent in the affairs of the State of Vermont. He died in 1781, and the house, not many years afterwards became a private dwelling for two of his sons, in succession. then for a grandson, and then finally for a great-grandson, John Fay, Esq. who died Feb. 25, 1856.

HILAND HALL.

BENNINGTON—HISTORICAL.

ANNALS OF POST-OFFICE, COURT-HOUSE AND VILLAGE STRIFES IN THE TOWN OF BENNINGTON FROM 1784 TO 1884.

The old Village of Bennington, like many others in New England was built on high ground. The north and south road through the State passed over it, which in few years became a thorough fare for much travel between Connecticut and western Massachusetts and the new lands to the northward. The summit of the hill at the north end of the village was 100 feet higher than the more level land at the other end. Its two extremities were about three quarters of a mile apart and were hidden from each other by the southern brow of the upper hill, from which there was a steep descent to a slight valley before reaching the other end of the village. That this village had two ends should be borne in mind, as many of the occurrences to be mentioned hereafter will be found to hinge in some degree on that fact. These two ends or parts were in common language distinguished from each other as the "Up-hill" and "Down-hill."

The road from Albany, leading to and across the Green Mountain ran through the lower part of the village, but was very little used until sometime in the present century when it gradually became a through route from Albany to Boston and other places east of the mountains on which road, as well as that to the northward, well patronized stages were run.

THE MEETING-HOUSE

was built in the lower part of the village, about 1765, and in 1780, an academy building, called was erected on the present site of the meeting-house, in which a successful high school was kept until it was burnt in 1803.

In 1781, when a building for

COURT-HOUSE AND JAIL

was required, it had been erected on the summit of the hill near the present residence of A. M. Huling.

In 1783, Anthony Haswell came from Massachusetts and began the publication of the

VERMONT GAZETTE

on the Upper-hill, and for many years it was the only newspaper printed in the State on the west side of the mountain. Its publication was continued weekly, with brief interruptions, nearly all the time by Mr. Haswell or some of his descendants until about 1850 when it was discontinued. For a few months in 1797, the paper took the name of the "Tablet of the Times," in 1806, that of the "Epitome of the World," and afterwards from 1808 to 1816, that of the "Green Mountain Farmer," when it resumed its first name, under which it was continued until it ceased to exist, as before stated.

From 1777 to 1791, Vermont exercised full authority in its civil affairs as an independent State, being unacknowledged, both by the other states and the Continental Congress. In 1784, its Legislature passed an act establishing viz: at Bennington, Rutland, Brattleboro, Windsor and Newbury, allowing post-riders three pence per mile for travel between Bennington and Brattleboro and two pence on the other routes. They were to account to the postmasters and to be paid from postages and their other receipts. They distributed the Bennington and the Windsor newspapers to their subscribers along the routes they traveled. Under this act was commissioned postmaster general by Gov. Thomas Chittenden, Mar. 10, 1784, and it is probable that who was partner of Mr. Haswell in the publication of the Gazette, acted as the Bennington postmaster. He was appointed to that office on the admission of the State into the Union, and held it from Aug. 25, 1791 till 1797, when under the presidency of the elder Adams he was appointed collector of customs for the district of Vermont and he then removed to Burlington. He was succeeded as postmaster by father of our late deacon, George Lyman, and held the office from October 1, 1797 till 1808. The post-office was kept in the printing office by Mr. Russell, and by Dr. Lyman in his drug-store next south the residence of the late John S. Robinson, on the upper hill.

FIVE POST-OFFICES IN THE STATE,

ANTHONY HASWELL

DAVID RUSSELL,

MICAH J. LYMAN,

Each section of Bennington Village had its hotels, and merchants' stores, and mechanics' shops; the two sections not unnaturally came in competition with each other in business and for public favor. Was there ever a village whose two ends did not? This rivalry sometimes produced unpleasant feelings and sharp controversies, and it became not the less active when it was found, during the presidency of John Adams, that the men of the two sections were in general of opposite parties in politics.

UP-HILL AND DOWN HILL POLITICS.

Nearly all of the Down-hill people, among whom were the Dewey's the Swifts and Tichenors, were Federalists, while those of Upper-hill, comprising the Robinsons, the Fays, Haswells and others, were ante-Federalists and friends of Mr. Jefferson, who was soon to become president. They took upon themselves the name of Republicans, disclaiming that of Democrats, which from the excesses that had recently been committed under it during the French Revolution, was unpopular, not to say odious.

The Federalists however dubbed the Republicans with the name of Democrats by way of reproach, and the Republicans retorted by calling them aristocrats and monarchists.

In order to a proper understanding of the various changes that have taken place in our postmasters, and in their movements from place to place, some preliminary statement of the party relations of the men of the town with the different administrations of the general government, seems necessary.—Mr. Tichenor, a native of New Jersey, whose courtly manners and fascinating conversation had acquired for him the familiar title of the “Jersey sleek,” and whose great personal popularity had enabled him to obtain ten successive elections of governor, up to the year 1808, while the other State officers were generally chosen by the Republicans, and also a majority of the legislature, was the acknowledged leader of the Federalists; while Jonathan Robinson, who was chief judge of the supreme court from 1801 to 1808, and was then chosen a senator in Congress to fill a vacancy and held the office by another election till 1815, occupied a like leadership of the Republicans. He and Governor Tichenor were both able men and shrewd politicians, and each of them exercised an important, and frequently, a controlling influence over their respective parties throughout the State. Judge Robinson being senator during President Madison’s administration and having his friendly confidence, had the principal control of his patronage throughout the State, which was quite large during the three years war with England that terminated in 1815.

From 1808 to 1813, the Republicans were generally in a majority in the town, and were able to choose members of that party to the assembly though the elections were often very spirited and close. But during the war with England when the times were hard and taxes high, the Federal candidates were chosen, and at the election in 1813 and 1814 the Federal Governor and other state officers were also elected. The Legislature of 1814, also chose Governor Tichenor United States Senator to succeed Judge Robinson.

On the return of peace with England the Federalists, from the alledged unpatriotic conduct of their prominent leaders during the war, became very unpopular. The Federalists, in fact ceased to exist as a national party after 1816, and the old party lines soon became so obliterated in most, if not, all the states, that the period of some eight or ten years from that date has not inappropriately been styled ‘The era of good feeling.’ Mr. Monroe, who succeeded Mr. Madison, was the only candidate for the presidency for his second term in 1820, and received all the votes of the electors of all the states, with the exception of one vote out of the seven from New Hampshire, which single vote was cast by a crotchety elector for John Quincy Adams.—At the next presidential election in 1824 there were four candidates, all Republicans: John Quincy Adams, Wm. H. Crawford, Andrew Jackson and Henry Clay, when their being no choice by the electors, Mr. Adams was chosen by the House of Representatives. Mr. Adams had been supported by the Republicans of Vermont, including those of Bennington. Prior to the next presidential election most of the friends of Crawford and Jackson united with others in opposition to the administration of Mr. Adams, claiming for themselves the name of the Democratic party; and the supporters of Mr. Adams took for themselves that of the National Republican party, for which a few years afterwards that of the Whig party was substituted. The Democratic party thus formed has continued to the present time. In 1828, Jackson, the candidate of that party was elected president over Adams, Vermont choosing electors, who voted again for Adams. The State, and also the town and county were almost unanimous for Adams; but the Gazette, representing most of the old Republicans of Bennington Hill occupied a hesitating position in regard to the two candidates with an evident leaning in favor of Jackson. After his election it gave his administration its active support, and ever afterwards its like support to the Democratic party. In 1832, Jackson was again elected president and in 1836, Martin Van Buren, both by the Democratic party, but in 1840, Gen. Harrison, the Whig candidate, was chosen over Mr. Van Buren.

This statement of the names and political positions of the presidents seems necessary to a proper understanding of the questions arising in regard to the appointments of the several postmasters in the town and the location of the post-offices. From this it will be seen that the old Republicans of the Upper Hill, having been continually in political accord with all the presidents from Jefferson in 1801 to Harrison in 1841, would naturally exercise the control in the selection of postmasters and in determining the places where the office should be kept.

Micah J. Lyman, who was a Federalist, had held the office of Bennington postmaster from 1797 until Nov. 20, 1808, when he was succeeded by Orsamus C. Merrill, a Republican. Mr. Merrill was son-in-law of Senator Robinson and he held the office until he became a Lieut. Colonel in the army in 1813, when William Haswell was appointed his successor. The office had been kept by Mr. Merrill for most of his time in a room south of and adjoining the State Arms tavern, opposite the Court House.

Mr. Haswell held the office over 20 years, from June 6, 1813, to Nov. 1, 1833, keeping it the greatest part of the time at different places on the Hill in the vicinity of the Court House. — During the latter portion of his term of office the increase of other parts of the town had tended to weaken the Upper Hill as its convenient business centre and to favor the claims of the Lower Hill and of the people to the eastward of it.

BENNINGTON BANK—1828.

In 1828, these claims were partially recognized by the erection of the building for the then recently chartered bank about mid-way between the two ends of the Old Village. The building is still standing on the brow of the Upper Hill overlooking the Down Hill portion and is on the upper corner of the side road that leads towards the northeast part of the town, opposite the house of Gen. David Robinson, now that of his grandson, Geo W. Robinson.

NORTH BENNINGTON POST-OFFICE.

During the same year (1828,) a new post-office had been established at North Bennington, which supplied a portion of the north-west part of the town with mail facilities and withdrew some business from the main office.

There had also been growing up for several years a new village—in the valley, from one to two miles east of the old Centre meeting-house, and its people and others living further to the eastward were beginning to complain that they were required to go up the steep meeting-house hill and half a mile up another hard hill to obtain their mail matter, when they insisted that more than half the revenue of the office came from them. Mr. Haswell doubtless felt the force of this claim, for in 1830, he had a small building erected on the lower corner of the before mentioned side road, south of and opposite the bank, thus somewhat shortening the distance of travel for the lower hill and the eastern people. In this building, Mr. Haswell kept the office for the remainder of his term, having a young man, Asahel Hyde, since a successful business man at St. Albans, for his intelligent and gentlemanly clerk.

EAST BENNINGTON

In November 1833, Henry Kellogg succeeded Mr. Haswell as postmaster, and he held the office until the spring of 1841, for over seven years. He continued to keep the office for several years in the same building in which it had been left by Mr. Haswell, where a youth then pursuing his studies, Edwin H. Chapin, was his genial and scholarly clerk, and who was afterwards the Rev. Dr. Chapin, the distinguished pulpit orator, who died in New York City, Dec. 26, 1880, at the age of 66.

EAST BENNINGTON POST-OFFICE.

The efforts of the East Village people to have the post-office brought nearer to them continued to increase with their population, and the mail contractors on the Albany and Brattleboro route complained of the unnecessary delay and hardship of being compelled to drive their stages away from their route up a heavy hill in order to deliver and receive their mails: and by the year 1839, the pressure became too strong to be longer resisted, and the office was removed down the hill to the Scott store where it was kept for the residue of Mr Kellogg's term. Whether this removal was made by special order of the department, or by leave asked by Mr. Kellogg, has not been ascertained.

General Harrison having been elected president over Mr. Van Buren, was inaugurated Mar. 4, 1841, but died the 4th of April, following, being in office but a single month, and was succeeded by John Tyler, the Vice President. though the Whigs had been accustomed to declaim against "the spoils system of removing minor officers on the change of administrations, which had been first put in active operation by the Democrats, on the accession of President Jackson yet they were generally quite willing when opportunity offered to follow the example of their opponents. In accordance with this system, David Love became postmaster, May 8, 1841, and held the office until the winter of 1843, when he was succeeded by John C. Haswell. Mr. Love kept the office during his term in the Scott store. There was no objection to Mr. Love or Mr. Kellogg as postmasters, other than that each of them when removed was charged with the offense of belonging to the wrong political party. The practice of changing the minor officers of the government on the access of a new administration, though often condemned as fraught with many great evils has been continued to the present time (Feb. 1883.) An attempt has recently been made by an act of Congress to correct the demoralizing effects of the scramble for office under this "spoils system," and to ensure appointments of the minor officers in the departments at Washington and in other large public offices of the country without reference to their politics, but with sole regard to fitness. Whether it will be successful can best be determined by experiment.

Mr. Tyler had not been long in office before he became flattered with the idea that if he should abandon the party that had elected him and oppose its measures, he could by the use of his government patronage, with the aid of the Democrats, form for himself a personal party that would nominate and elect him to the presidency for another term.

The "State Banner," which was founded as a Whig paper and was published in Bennington. (East village) did not follow Tyler in his revolt, but adhered to the mass of the Whigs of whom Henry Clay and others were the prominent leaders. But John C. Haswell, the publisher of the Gazette, in common with other Democratic editors, readily gave him aid in his hostilities to the Whig party, and Mr Haswell by his active efforts with his paper in that direction, so ingratiated himself into the favor of his administration, he had little difficulty in obtaining the office of post-master in the place of Mr. Love, whom he succeeded Feb. 3, 1843.

Soon after he became postmaster, Mr. Haswell found he could obtain a more lucrative position in the general post-office at Washington and went to that city, leaving the Bennington office in the care of Edward Rice, who became post-master, July 12, 1844, and served till Feb. 23, 1847, when he resigned and was succeeded by Mr. Haswell who again became postmaster.

When Mr. Haswell had been first appointed post-master, he had purchased the Hall and Southworth law office, which stood on the side hill just above the residence of the late A. B. Gardner and during his time kept the office there. In the fall of 1841, the new road which entered the Centre Village from the East Village, north of the Truman Squire house, had been opened which made it much easier for travel than the steep, old road by the meeting-house, and rendered the side hill office quite as convenient for the East Village people as the Scott store, and it became still more convenient when Mr. Rice caused the building to be drawn down the hill to the corner of the new road, opposite the Squire house, which he did soon after his appointment.

A few months before Mr. Rice left the post-office. the rivalry between the East Village and the Old Village which had continually been growing warmer, was suddenly brought to a high fever heat. The first Court House which had been built at an early day on the Upper Hill, had been destroyed by fire in May 1809, and a second one that had been erected near the site of the former one was now, Oct. 28, 1846, also burned to the ground.

The East Village had been on a steady increase for quite a number of years, while the Old Village, at the best, could only be said to be at a stand-still. Ten years prior to 1846, four new churches had been organized in the East Village, viz: a Baptist, an Episcopal, a Congregationalist and Methodist, each of which had erected substantial church buildings. New streets were opened and occupied by dwellings, stores, shops, iron foundries and manufacturing and mechanical works of various kinds moved by water-power, until the new village had become more than double in population and business to that of the old. There was also an unmistakable tendency towards a continued increase of the new village and a decrease of the old. Under these circumstances it was to be expected that an earnest and persistent effort would be made for the erection of the Court House in the New Village. In order to determine the place where the new county buildings should be erected, application was made to the Legislature then in session, and by an act of Nov. 2d, 1846, after providing for a tax for erecting the buildings, Ebenezer N. Briggs of Brandon, Abishai Stoddard of Grafton and Caleb B. Harrington of Middletown were constituted a committee to designate the place where it should be built. The committee met in the town the January following and spent several days there, during which time there was an abundance of button-holing and feasting of the committee and also a public hearing of the claimants in the old Centre meeting-house, which was crowded with anxious listeners, the claims of the East Village being advocated by A. P. Lyman and Wm. Southworth, and that of the Upper, or in default of, that of the Lower Hill by John S. Robinson and Pierpoint Isham. But contrary to the hopes and expectations of the New Village, the majority of the committee against the opinion of Mr. Stoddard, decided in favor of the Old Village and directed that the buildings should be erected to the north of the old meeting-house between the north-west corner of the old burying ground and the house of the late Truman Squire. Thus the Court House was anchored where if not then quite out of place, was sure to be so very soon.

During the period in which J. C. Haswell under his first appointment and Mr. Rice were postmasters, a new office had been provided for the East Village by the name of East Bennington of which Gen. Henry Robinson was appointed postmaster, Jan. 13, 1844, but which was discontinued May 28, 1846, for the alleged reason that it was nearer the main office than the regulations of the department allowed.—He is said to have kept the office a part of the time in a small building near the store of Wills and Fairbanks and a part of the time in that store, now known as the Godfrey store. When Mr. Haswell left Bennington for Washington as above stated, he sold his printing material to one of his brothers and Mr. Bushnell, by whom under the firm of Haswell and Bushnell the Gazette was published until February, 1847, when he returned to Bennington and became the owner again of the printing establishment. On the 23d of that month, he was appointed postmaster as Mr. Rice's successor, and very soon after removed the press and Gazette from the Hill to the East Village. Mr. Haswell soon after, either in March or April, supposing that he had authority from Washington through Mr. Brown, the assistant postmaster general, to change the location of the office, caused it to be removed to the East Village. He was the owner of the small building in which it had been kept by Mr. Rice on the Squire corner, and had it moved about a mile down the hill and placed on the corner, of Main and South streets, opposite what is now the Putnam house. To effect the removal, the building was placed on timbers, serving as runners and drawn by oxen. It went quite smoothly down the hill about one-third of the way, but when it came to the level ground it dragged hard, so that the team had to be increased to eight or ten yoke of oxen. With these under the direction of the famous teamster, Dickerman A. Rider, and his skillful handling of his ox-goad the removal was finally accomplished. The accession of the main post-office, which they had long desired was the occasion of rejoicing to the East Village people, who looked upon it as some compensation for the late denial of their just claim to the site for the new court-house. Bells were rung and hundreds of the inhabitants turned out to witness and cheer on the removal of the building, the dramatic appearance of which was much heightened by the stopping of the stages at the moving office to deliver and receive their mails, and the receipt and delivery of letters to and from it. The rejoicing, however, was not of long continuance. David Robinson, John S. Robinson, and Benj. F. Fay, representatives of the old Bennington Hill Democracy, a few days after the removal went to Washington to protest against the act, and demanded the return of the post-office to the Hill and the removal of the post-master. On their arrival at Washington, Cave Johnson, the post-master general under President Polk, sent Mr. Haswell a despatch, who immediately repaired to that city where the matter was discussed pro and con in the department with the result that Mr. Haswell should remain as post-master, but that the office should at once be returned from the East to the Hill Village.

The removal of the Gazette by Mr. Haswell to the East Village caused great commotion and strife in the Democracy of the town and county. A new press and type were soon obtained and another paper started on the Hill, which also assumed the name of the Vermont Gazette, each of the two, claiming to be the genuine continuation of the original of the previous century, and each the "Simon pure" representative of the Democratic party. Bitter crimination and recrimination followed. But Mr. Haswell being continued as post-master, all mail matter for both newspapers passed through his hands, and the papers being of the same name, it is not surprising, that controversies should arise in regard to which newspaper some of the letters and packages were intended to be sent. Complaints were made and continued by the publishers of the Hill Gazette that matter designed for them was improperly retained by Mr. Haswell for himself. The natural remedy for the difficulty was for the department to appoint a new postmaster not interested in either paper, which was accordingly done, Jan. 28, 1848, when Henry Kellogg became Mr. Haswell's successor. It seems that Mr. Haswell was not found guilty of dishonest intentions, for he was on the same day appointed postmaster for East Bennington, and he held the office for several months afterwards.

The strife between the two newspapers continued until September 1849, when Messrs. Aiken & Lull, the proprietors, of the Hill paper purchased the establishment of Mr. Haswell who removed to San Francisco, Cal., where he still resides. The Hill Gazette, however, was found to be unprofitable and was discontinued, after a year's father struggle in October 1850.

During this term of Mr. Haswell's postmastership, from May 1847 to January 1848, when Mr. Kellogg became his successor, he occupied the building which had been previously used by his brother William for the post-office, on the corner opposite the old bank. It was now drawn down to the Squire corner to the place from which the former building had been removed and there again used for the purpose for which it had originally been erected. This building was deeded to Sarah, wife of Zenas Jones, Aug. 14, 1849, and by him removed south of the meeting-house and occupied as a dwelling.—Mr. Kellogg after his appointment in January 1848, was post-master until July 1849. This was about a month prior to the sale of the latter building to Mrs. Jones, and it is believed it was occupied by Mr. Kellogg until he ceased to hold the main office and became post-master for Bennington Centre, after which this business was kept in his law-office building.

A few months after the inauguration of General Taylor, who had been elected president by the Whigs in 1848, A. P. Lyman in behalf of the people of the East Village went to Washington, taking with him sworn evidence of the great preponderance in population and business of the East Village over the Old, and of the advantages to the town and vicinity of having the post-office removed there obtained an order making the East Village the location for the Bennington office, and appointing Horace L. White, post-master. Judge Jacob Colamer of Vermont was then post-master general, but it was said he hesitated about acting in the matter, and the evidence was submitted to the personal examination of the President, who promptly directed the change to be made.

Mr. White's commission bore date, July 12th 1849, and he was post-master until after Mr. Pierce became president, when he was succeeded by Truman Huling. Mr. White kept the office in the small building on the corner, east of and opposite the Putnam house.

On the appointment of Mr. White and the removal of the main office, the East Village became and has continued to be known as Bennington.

On the removal of the post-office Mr. Kellogg was retained as post-master at the Branch in the Old Village designated as West Bennington, but on application of its inhabitants was two weeks afterwards changed to Bennington Centre by which it has continued to be known since July 27, 1849. He was post-master until succeeded by John Hicks, Dec 16, 1850, and kept it where before stated.

During the period that Mr. Kellogg held the main office at Bennington, Geo. B. Prentice succeeded Mr. Haswell as post-master at East Bennington. His appointment was made, Aug. 17, 1848, and he was post-master until the East Village became Bennington on the appointment of Mr. White when the office was discontinued. He kept the office in the store of Wills & Fairbanks, now the Godfrey store.

Apr. 30, 1853, soon after Mr. Pierce became president, Truman Huling was appointed post-master in place of Mr. White, and continued until April 1857, during which time he kept his post-office at the book-store of Almon Eddy, in the Adams block, opposite the present Court House.

Apr. 7, 1857, when Mr. Buchanan became president, John R. Gates was appointed post-master and continued until April 1861, keeping the business in a building on Main street, nearly opposite the Methodist church.

Apr. 9, 1861, J. I. C. Cook, who had become publisher of the "Bennington Banner," was appointed post-master and held the appointment during the administrations of Lincoln, Johnson and Grant until Apr. 22, 1872, when he was succeeded by Thomas J. Tiffany, still, post-master (1883.) The office was kept by Mr. Cook near the corner of Main and North streets, and also by Mr Tiffany until the spring of 1882, when it was removed to the Free Library building.

AT BENNINGTON CENTRE.

Since the removal of the main post-office to the East Village, the following have been post-masters, viz: Henry Kellogg, as before stated; John Hicks, Dec. 16, 1850, under the administration of President Taylor, keeping the office in his harness-shop near the Walloomsac house; Alfred Robinson, Dec. 28, 1853, and Geo. W. Robinson, Mar. 21, 1859, under the administrations of Presidents Pierce and Buchanan, and Charles R. Sanford under that of President Lincoln, April 9, 1861, who is still postmaster (1883), and whose office has been kept in the Sanford store.

AT NORTH BENNINGTON.

The following is a list of the successive postmasters at North Bennington with the dates of their appointments: Daniel Loomis, Nov. 18, 1828;

Charles S. Wright, Oct. 11, 1833:

Wm. E. Hawks, Apr. 1, 1839:

Hiram R. Haswell, Apr. 20, 1855:

Chas. E. Houghton, Mar. 28, 1856:

Chas. E. Welling, Jan. 4, 1864:

Milo C. Huling, Sept. 5, 1866:

Chas. E. Welling, Sept. 17, 1866:

Chas. M. Colvin, Dec. 20, 1875: — who still remains postmaster— 1883.

THE BENNINGTON COURT HOUSE.

One other matter connected with the County buildings remains to be stated. The Court House which had been erected in the Old Village, in compliance with the decision of the committee under the act of 1846, and which had been built of brick, had been destroyed by fire on the morning of March 26, 1869. But now the population and business of the new Village of Bennington had increased to four or five times that of the old. It had been connected for years with the outside world by railroad and was the place of the main postoffice. It had become so decidedly the centre of the business of the town and county, the county clerk had found it necessary for the accommodation of the bar and of the public to keep an open office in that village with the current books and papers of the County and Supreme courts. This had been done with the consent of the county judges and it fortunately saved from destruction the most important records of both those courts, and in consequence much less loss and inconvenience was occasioned by the fire than would otherwise have happened. The probate records were in the court-house but were preserved from destruction in its fire-proof safe.

No attempt was made to retain the court-house in its former location, but a portion of the people of the County were desirous of having the County buildings in one central place, where all the records should be kept, and all the courts held, instead of at the two ends of the County.

The Legislature, therefore, by act of Nov. 15, 1869 after laying a tax on the County for the expense of erecting proper buildings provided for the submission of the question whether there should be one or two sets of such buildings to the legal voters of the County in their town-meetings to be held on the last Tuesday of the following February. Such of the voters as desired only one set of buildings were to designate on their ballots the town or village in which they wished them erected. If there should be a majority of the voters for any single place, the buildings were to be erected there, but if otherwise, they were to be placed in the Village of Bennington. By the provisions of the same act a committee consisting of Henry W. Putnam of Bennington, Samuel M. West of Arlington, and Augustus G. Clark of Manchester, were appointed to superintend their erection in conformity to the result of the vote thus provided for. The majority being in favor of the continuance of the two county shires, the committee proceeded to erect the present court-house and jail in Bennington Village, which was done at a cost to the county of $30,000.

The building is of brick, and beside the court room contains the county clerk's office, the probate office and the jail and jailor's residence. Both the county clerk's and the probate office are provided with fire-proof vaults. The jail has seven cells for the confinement of males and one off the residence of the jailor for females.

After the burning of the court-house at the Centre, until the new building was completed, the courts were held in the hall of the Bennington Free Library.

The rivalries and controversies which have been mentioned in the foregoing account are such as would naturally arise among intelligent and order loving people having different, local interests, and there seems no reason to question the sincerity or the integrity of purpose of any of the contending parties. In the midst of the forest it was natural that the first settlement of the town should have been made on high ground and for two generations it was the most suitable place for it. It was a conspicuous and commanding position among the new settlements, and from the character and ability of its inhabitants it soon became conspicuous from a distance.

It was known at New York City as the head quarters of the defenders of the titles under the grants of New Hampshire, as their defiant stronghold against the land jobbing and land robbing government of its colony. To that government it was a "city set on a hill that would not be hid;" and when its lordly Governor sent his sheriff with hundreds of followers, to take possession for the city speculators of the farms of two of its inhabitants, was found quite ready and able to protect them; and did in fact with a proper show of resolution and musketry easily persuade the city dignitary with his famed posse comitatus to return hurriedly back to Albany relieved of all inclination to embark again in a similar expedition.

Bennington Hill was alike conspicuous in its resistance to the oppressive measures of the British crown. A few days after the shedding of the first American blood at Lexington, it furnished the commander and was the place of muster for the men of the New Hampshire Grants who on the 10th of May, 1775, captured the fortress of Ticonderoga for the "Continental Congress" and also in the name of a still higher power.

At a later period of the Revolution, the men of Bennington were no less conspicuous in defense of their country when Burgoyne, on his triumphant march toward Albany, sent a large body of his veterans to seize Bennington and the public stores gathered there, they were not permitted to cross the threshold of the town, but were met on its borders and most of them captured or slain. The only visit any of them were permitted to make the town was as prisoners of war. This first successful resistance to the invasion inflicted a blow which secured the capture of the Invader and that of his whole army at Saratoga, a few weeks afterwards.

A MONUMENT.

The early inhabitants of the town of which the Old Village was the nucleus and centre, has given to it a history of which the present generation may well be proud. Their recent, earnest exertions to raise a creditable monument to the memory of the brave men from New Hampshire, Vermont and Massachusetts, who together achieved the victory of the 16th of August 1777; a monument which is to have its foundation on the site of the old store-house which was sought to be captured by Burgoyne, and on the summit of the highest, centre hill, overlooking a rich surrounding country, may be taken as an indication that the patriotic deeds of the fathers are not unappreciated by their sons.

PROGRESSIVE CHANGES.

But the merits and fame of our early inhabitants, however great, could not secure their work from the powerful effect of progressive changes in the business and employments of men.—founded at a time when agriculture constituted the chief and almost the only business of life. It was found quite inappropriate to a period when a majority of its people became engaged in other pursuits. The streams and the more level land in the valleys furnished water-power and numerous other facilities for manufacturing and its attendant industries, with which the Hill could not long hope to compete.—The substitution of the New Village for the Old, as its business centre, could not be successfully resisted.—The change was inevitable.

BENNINGTON FREE LIBRARY.

In 1865 a Free Library was established in Bennington by the joint action of Seth B. Hunt and Trenor W. Park.— Though full biographies of these respected donors of the library, are expected for this work from other hands, a few words in respect to them is deemed proper here.— Mr. Hunt was born Bennington, February 1811, and died in New York City, April 20, 1880.— Mr Park was born in Woodford, adjoining Bennington, Dec. 8, 1823, and died at sea on his way from New York to the Isthmus of Panama. Dec 13, 1882. Both of them spent their early and much of their later lives in Bennington; both by their own efforts and industry had been successful in business, and both had long been liberal in their contributions to religious, educational and charitable objects.

The donors purchased an unfinished, commodious, brick building, situated in a central place in the village, and fitted it up for the use of the library.— The building is two stories in height, the upper story containing a library room and a reading-room, a large hall for lectures and public meetings with an entrance room attached, all well provided with tables, shelves and other suitable furniture. The lower story is divided into rooms for offices and stores. The library contained at first about—carefully selected volumes of standard works, and has since, from its annual increase and other sources been largely increased. The original cost of the whole to the donors was about $10,000, of which each shared equally.

The times and conditons on which the library was given are specified in a deed of trust from the donors to Hiland Hall, Benjamin R. Sears, Daniel Mc' Cowen, Thomas J. Tiffany and John V. Hall, which terms and conditions are as follows :

First In order to perpetuate the trust it is provided that in case of the death, resignation, or removal from the town of Bennington, of any one of the trustees the fifth part of the premises conveyed shall revert in the residue of them, which fifth part they are required to convey to such person as they shall name as their associate trustee.

Secondly, The trustees, their survivors and successors are to permit the premises to be occupied and kept for a library for the free use without compensation of the inhabitants of the town of Bennington and its immediate vicinity, and to which a reading room may be attached, and under such regulations for the safe keeping of the books and papers and the proper care and return of such books as may be taken from the library for reading as may from time to time be approved by said trustees."

Thirdly It was provided that the large room on the second floor should "forever be set apart for a public hall and might from time to time be rented by the trustees for public meetings and lectures and other assemblies of people under such regulations as they might prescribe, and the other parts of the building not suitable for the use of the library and reading room might be rented for such purposes as said trustees might choose, the proceeds of all rents to be appropriated for the payment of taxes, expenses of insurance and proper repairs and improvements and for the care of the library, reading room and building,—the residue to be applied to the increase of the library."

Fourthly "The said trustees may commit the care and management of the library, reading room and building to the Association already formed, for taking charge thereof, or to any other association hereafter to be formed or to individuals in their discretion, and shall have power to resume the charge of the same whenever in their opinion the objects of the trust would thereby be promoted."

Fifthly The building, furniture and library are to be at all times kept well insured by the trustees and in good repair and may be rebuilt by them in case of destruction by fire."

Sixthly The trustees are so to manage the trust as always to prevent its becoming of a sectarian character, no preference being allowed to one communion, denomination or belief over another, and the said five trustees may execute all their services and perform all their duties by a majority of their number."

It was also further provided in the deed that if the trustees should attempt to divert the property thereby conveyed or the proceeds thereof, from the purposes and objects of the trust or to permit it to be done by others to whom they might commit the charge of it, or suffer the property to run to waste and decay, then the deed was to be null and void, and the property and its proceeds was to revert and become invested in the said donors and their heirs the same as if the conveyance had never been made.

A Young Men's Association, such as had been mentioned in the deed of trust, having been organized, the inauguration and formal presentation of the institution took place at a gathering of the inhabitants of the town in the hall of the library building on the evening of the 23d of June 1865. The deed of trust, which bore date on that day was publicly read, and interesting and appropriate addresses were made both by Mr. Hunt and Mr. Park on their purposes and expectations in founding the library, to which thankful responses were made by Hiland Hall, in behalf of the trustees, and by the Rev. Wm. S. Apsey, President of The Young Men's Association for their generous and most valuable donation. Other prominent citizens, also, joined with them in expressing the grateful acknowledgements of the inhabitants of the town for the unsolicited liberality of the respected donors.

The number of desirable volumes in the library has continued to increase under the care of the Young Men's Association until the present number exceeds 3000, and the reading room is supplied with such newspapers and periodicals as the needs of those who frequent it seem to require. The means by which the additions to the library have been made are from the rent of the library property and some donations from Mr. Hunt, Mr. Park and others. The latest money donation was from Mr. Park of $1000 for the purchase of new books, which has in part been expended for that purpose, largely to supply the place of books that had become so much worn as to be unfit for further library use, but leaving a portion of it for further expenditure.

HILAND HALL.

BENNINGTON VILLAGES AND THEIR INDUSTRIES,

BY HENRY D. HALL, ESQ.

BENNINGTON.

The Village of Bennington has changed, perhaps, more than any other part of the town since the notice of it given in the Gazetteer,— Bennington County, No. II, page 136, about twenty-six years since.

Favorably situated with reference to water-power, nearly all of its advantages have been improved and the industries which have developed have quite largely increased its population and material wealth. This is manifested from the number and more extensive mills, shops, dwellings and churches which have been erected within the nearly three decades just passed, and which it is the object of this article to notice to some extent.

It lies in the valley through which run the streams which unite in forming the historic "Walumscoick" river or as it is now called Waloomsac,— the Pownal, the Roaring branch from Woodford and the Furnace brook from Shaftsbury,— the waters of the first two, giving the most available water-power.

At the south-west, about two miles distant, is Mount Anthony, 2505 feet high, and at the north-east, nearly the same distance is Bald Mountain, 3125 ft. high, both affording the eye of the inhabitant or visitor by their imposing elevation and beautiful scenery, delight and satisfaction. It has nearly 4000 of the 3000 inhabitants now in the town of Bennington, and has contained since the burning of the Court House in Bennington Centre in 1869, the Court House, County Clerk's office and jail for the Southern Shire of the County.

BENNINGTON NEWSPAPERS.

The Bennington Banner, a weekly newspaper, is published by Charles A. Pierce and is a continuation of the State Banner established by Enoch Davis in 1841. There is a job printing office connected with it the motive power for which as well as for all printing purposes, is supplied by the village water-works, and also, a book bindery.

The Bennington Reformer, J. H. Livingston, editor and publisher, is a Democratic organ published here and has reached its twelveth volume.

BENNINGTON GRADED SCHOOL.

There was a special act by the legislature of 1870, procured for the "Bennington Graded School District," and the district was organized, Nov. 9, of the same year, and a building of brick of dimensions, adequate and with all the modern improvements in furniture, seats, ventilation etc., was erected in a central part of the village, suitable for the accomodation of twelve grades of scholars, numbering 500 pupils or more, at cost of about $50,000. It proves well adapted for the purpose for which it was built, and is probably second to none in the State, in all its appointments.

THE HARLEM EXTENSION.

About 1867, a rail-road was constructed from Bennington, south, called the Harlem Extension, to Chatham, N. Y. to connect with the Harlem railroad, making a continuous line from Montreal, Canada to New York. For a while through trains were run to the great convenience of traveling, and of cars carrying milk and produce to New York, thus promoting the interests of the different towns on the line; but after a time a different regime followed, and it is only at intervals that there are accommodating connections to New York. This road was constructed to a large extent, by the issuing of bonds by the several towns on the line, and the endeavor to get rid of paying them has resulted in outside parties, as litigation has progressed and the status of the road in law has changed from time to time, to purchase and control it for a season; and it is now run as the New York, Rutland and Montreal Railway, having a depot in the village, necessitating the transfer of passengers, baggage and much of the freight, passing through the town, to and from the Bennington and Rutland Railway, and as early called in the Gazetteer, the Western Vermont Rail Road.

THE SECOND CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH.

The second Congregational Church edifice was destroyed by fire, Aug. 11, 1864, and in about a year, a chapel was erected which now constitutes the room for Sabbath school purposes. The main church building was completed in 1773 and is connected to the chapel with a parlor and other rooms for social conveniences. A parsonage was built in 1883, on the north end of the church grounds of brick, as are also the church and chapel, which fills out the entire block. The pastors since the organization have been Revs. Arctas Loomis,

C. H. Hubbard, C. B. Hurlbert, E. G. Reed, F. J. Mundy and C. C. Kimball D. D. Dr. Kimball was installed in August 1884.

The present Baptist church is of brick and was erected in 1878, the old church having been taken down to make room for one larger. There is a parsonage connected with it, but is not upon the church grounds. The pastors since the previous notice in the Gazetteer have been Revs. W. S. Apsey, S. K. Dexter, R. M. Luther, G. C. Baldwin, Jr. and Z. Martin.

THE FIRST METHODIST CHURCH is of stone and has been remodelled and enlarged within a few years, so as to make it a commodious and fine edifice. A parsonage was erected in 1883, on the corner of School and Pleasant streets, which is in keeping with the other church property. The present pastor is Rev. T. C. Potter.

ST. PETER'S EPISCOPAL CHURCH which is of brick has been recently improved and beautified, answering well the need of this growing society. There has been within a short time a new rectory built upon the church grounds.—The rectors have been since Rev. Dr. Manser, Revs. Phillips, Bliss, Jones, Graves and A. J. Barrow.

THE FRENCH CATHOLIC CHURCH was organized in 1880. This society occupied a room in Noyes block until 1882, when a suitable church of wood was built on School street, where services are regularly held.

BANKS.

There are two National Banks of $100,000 capital, each. The 1st National Bank of Bennington, L. R. Graves, President, Geo. F. Graves, cashier. The Bennington County National Bank, Charles Thatcher, President, Clement S. Cone, cashier.

MANUFACTURES.

There have been some new kinds of industries sustained and a considerable increase in some of the kinds which have for a long period been carried on here.

THE BENNINGTON MACHINE WORKS are the outgrowth of the two moulding furnaces in the lower part of the village, which have been discontinued.

Olin Scott, the present proprietor, erected these works in 1865, consisting of a large foundry and machine shops, where gunpowder and paper machinery of all kinds are a specialty, while other machine work usually done at such establishments is also carried on.

THE KNITTING INTEREST was characterized in 1861, as "two Knitting Factories, employing fifty hands in and about the mills, and outside the mills 150 more." This branch has developed into much larger proportions, giving employment to more than four times as many now.

H. E. Bradford & Co's hosiery and knitting mill was established in 1858, and is situated on upper Main street. It was destroyed by fire in 1865, and a new one erected soon after. An accident occurred at this mill in January 1874, which resulted in the death of nine persons. It was supposed the explosion was the result of the igniting of gas which had generated beneath the building from a leakage in the tank containing gasoline for the lighting of the mill.

Geo. Rockwood & Co's knitting mill is at the east end of the village on Main street, and was erected on or near the site of the old oil mill of Rockwood & Colvin.

The old mill for the manufacture of linseed oil and oil meal will be remembered by many as being quite noted, and was before rail-roads were so common, the place where flax seed from this vicinity and neighboring towns in the State of New York was brought and the manufactured oil and meal was taken in large quantities across the mountains into New Hampshire and Massachusetts with teams.

THE VALENTINE KNITTING MILLS.

The knitting mill of A. B. Valentine, one of the largest in town, was burned in the fall of 1882. It was rebuilt in part in 1883. It has been operated by a company of young men, formerly in the employ of Mr. Valentine, who have made a nice class of goods, finding a ready sale in the market. It is situated in the heart of the village, a little off of Pleasant street. He converted a building, formerly used by his father, Joel Valentine, as a carding factory, into this knitting mill in 1866, by remodelling and enlarging it, and had made previous to the fire large additions from time to time. At this writing the mill has been wholly rebuilt and enlarged, and in its tower has been placed a first class town clock, giving excellent time to the whole village. Mr. Valentine is now interested in the operation of this mill, and two of the old company, Moore and Puffer, are to prosecute the same line of business in a new mill erected by Mr. Valentine, and leased by them, on the opposite side of the stream. The main building is three stories high upon a foundation at least 100 X 40 ft.

RIBBED KNITTING MACHINE WORKS.

Tiffany & Cooper came into this village several years since and started business in a small way, in the manufacture of ribbed knitting machines for knitting in a peculiar way, the wristlets and anklets for shirts and drawers. The success of this machine which was followed by another for knitting full fashioned goods, shirts and drawers in a single piece so that when seamed up they will be adapted and fashioned to the form, necessitated the enlargement of their works, and they reaped a rich reward for their industry and enterprise. This firm is now dissolved, its members prosecuting, separately, the manufacture of these machines.

TIFFANY KNITTING MILL,—OF FULL FASHIONED GOODS.

Tiffany Brothers have a mill for knitting the full fashioned goods above mentioned, which has recently been enlarged to keep pace with the demand for their product, in which they also manufacture cut goods.

COOPER'S SPRING NEEDLE MACHINE WORKS.

Charles Cooper has for years been engaged in making machine spring needles, a business, requiring much skill, and is annually placing on the market five or six millions of the different styles required in all kinds of knitting machines. A few years since his son became a partner with the firm name of Chas. Cooper & Son, and added to this business that of knitting full fashioned goods, as well as the cut, and is located on the premises formerly occupied by the paper mills of Geo. Benton & Sons. About two years since, Mr. Cooper purchased the water privilege used by M. G. Remington in the wagon business, and which is centrally located and has erected large buildings in which with the water power supplemented by steam, he carries on the needle and machine business, and additional to the product of the mills, the making of full fashioned goods.

SOAP, WHEEL-GOVENORS, BOWL-SHOP, SHODDY-FACTORY, ETC.

Enos Adams and Enos Adams & Co. are engaged in making mineral soap, steam and water wheel govenors, patent mop-sticks, wooden bowls, cotton batting and manufacturing shoddy,—the different kinds of work, giving employment to quite a number of hands.

THE STONE WARE POTTERY.

now owned and operated by Edward Norton and C. Welling Thatcher under the firm name of E. Norton & Co. still retains its reputation for making the first quality of ware, and though burned in 1874, it was immediately rebuilt in more convenient form, and has recently been enlarged.

CARPET-TACKS,—PATENTEE.

Henry W. Putnam purchased the sites of the Brown and Grover furnaces on North street a number of years since, and has been manufacturing patent bottle fasteners, clothes-wringers and various other articles of light hardware, and more recently has been making large quantities of double pointed tacks for carpets and other purposes.—He is also patentee-manufacturer of the best canning fruit-jar on the market and is largely interested abroad in the manufacture of barbed wire, now so extensively used as fencing material.

THE BENNINGTON WOOLEN MILLS.

in the western part of the village were built by Hunt & Tillinghart in 1865.—Seth B. Hunt became the sole owner of them in 1872. In 1874, he sold to S. S. & M. Fisher of New York. The buildings are of brick and cover a large area of ground and in the business, 300 to 400 hands have been employed.—

Owing to the death of Messrs Fisher of New York, the property was sold to Haines & Co. from the East, who operated it for a time, but failed in business and for more than a year, the mills have been idle.

MANY OTHER INDUSTRIES.

There are many other industries, not mentioned here; among them, wagon-shops, machine-shops, planing-mills, box-factories, ochre, and paper clay works, etc. etc., not because they are unimportant, but for lack of space; as the mention of all would add too great length to this review.

HOTELS.

There are four hotels in this village, giving good and sufficient accommodations to the traveling public, to the usual village boarders, and in the season, for summer visitors; and in this connection, it is proper to mention two bakeries and four livery stables in the village.

VILLAGE WATER WORKS.

The Village has lately been supplied with pure spring water, which is conveyed in pipes by the Bennington Water Co., to all parts, from a large reservoir, upon high ground about two miles, east, giving sufficient force for its use for fires, and which is made available for drinking and household purposes. A contract has been made with the company in which H. M. Putnam is largely interested, for the use of hydrants in different parts of the village, which will do away with the use of fire engines in most cases, except it may be in the suburbs.

ELECTRIC LIGHTS.

The streets, under a contract with the Bennington Electric Light Co. are to be lighted by electricity and the work for its consummation is being accomplished rapidly, so that the old method of lighting by kerosene will soon be superseded by this more modern one, though as yet not in use in many villages of its size.

The stores and smaller places of trade are upon a scale that calls traffic from adjoining towns, and the erection of pleasant, and in many instances of quite expensive buildings has been on the increase, as the developments of business have added to the wealth of the inhabitants, so that on the whole, the village will compare favorably in general appearance and thrift with other New England villages of its size.

THE PARK GUARDS,

a Military Company, was organized January 1876, named from the late T. W. Park, Esq., who from time to time generously contributed to its aid. The armory and drill room is upon Pottery street.

At the Centennial Celebration, Aug 15th, and 16th, 1877, this Company held the post of honor in the regiment and escorted the President, his Excellency, R. B. Hayes. The Company was at the Celebration of the Battle of Saratoga in October of the same year, in commemoration of the surrender of Burgoyne.

THE FIRE DEPARTMENT

is well organized with efficient officers, and both the engine and hose companies are uniformed and supplied with all necessary equipments for effective service. For years the village has supported a first class steamer, and one other hand-power machine, but the buildings being so largely of wood, at times it has been difficult to completely control the fire fiend.

On the 16th of August 1887, the three hose companies had a prize trial, running 80 rods and coupling the cars to a hydrant, which was witnessed by a large number and specially attracted the attention of the friends of each.

THE OLD BAND.

There was formerly here one of the best instrumental bands in the State, which added much as an attraction and a pleasure to the village; and there has been growing lately a desire to revive the 'band spirit' and reorganize and bring out the present musical talent of the place. It is hoped the effort may succeed.

NORTH BENNINGTON VILLAGE.

Since the sketch of this village was published twenty-six years ago, in the Gazetteer, page 139, there has been some progress in its history, a review of which is the object of this article.

Under the general law of the State, it became an incorporated village in 1867. The two school districts, mostly in the limits of the village, in 1870, took measures to organize district. A commodious brick building in a central position with ample grounds for school purposes, was erected in 1871, at an expense of about $12,000. It has had the efficient support of the citizens in the supply of teachers &c., and has furnished an excellent school for all within the district, and the higher grade has been patronized more or less by scholars from neighboring districts. About ten years since a contiguous district in the town of Shaftsbury was added to it and the school has now five grades.

A GRADED SCHOOL

The old Academy was sold prior to the erection of the present school building about the year 1870, to who in 1874, under the pastoral care of Rev. Father O'Dwyer, remodelled and enlarged it, making an attractive and commodious church where services are regularly held. Father Prevost is the present officiating clergyman.

THE PARK RESIDENCE.

T. W. Park, Esq., who died in Dec. 1882, to whom North Bennington, and in fact the whole town, is indebted for much of its prosperity, built about the year 1865, a fine residence which he occupied during the warm and summer months, on the farm formerly owned by and upon which his father-in-law, Gov. Hiland Hall was born. It is now the summer residence of Gen. J. G. McCullough, who married his eldest daughter.

To give the needed space for grading the grounds of his residence, was moved by Mr. Park to a more desirable location several rods, north, where it was enlarged and neatly fitted up, which with other recent improvements, renders it a very pleasant and inviting house of worship. The first house was dedicated, Dec. 31, 1845, and the first pastor was Rev. Justin A. Smith. The present pastor is Rev. George Shepard. One clerk, Wm. E. Hawks, has served the church since its establishment, and he is also the present senior deacon.

THE BAPTIST CHURCH

THE CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH.

The founding of a Congregational church here was the outgrowth of a Sunday school, held for a year or more in the mill store in the south part of the village. In May 1868, the church was organized of members from the Bennington and Bennington Centre churches, who had either moved into the village or were living near it, with two others on profession of faith. From this time regular services were held in Bank hall and the Sabbath school was discontinued at the mill. The first minister was of Coventry, who remained one year.—In October 1869,

REV. LEAVITT BARTLETT

REV. H. C. WESTON

of Charleston, Mass. was ordained as pastor, he having been called by the church while yet at the Theological Seminary at Andover. During his pastorate, a church of brick was erected, of modern style and costing about $15,000.

REV. L. C. PARTRIDGE was called in April 1875, and commenced his ministry, the first sabbath in May. He finished his labors in October 1885.

REV. GEO. R. HEWITT

was installed as pastor, in June 1886.

THE BANK.

Mr. Park established a National Bank in 1864, with a capital of half a million, which has always been a well paying institution, but its stock has lately been reduced to $150,000,—which is sufficient for the accommodation of business in this vicinity. The bank building is of brick, the second story being used as a village hall.

THE DEPOT.

During the year 1881, a large and convenient depot was built through the generosity of Mr. Park, the principle owner of the Bennington and Rutland rail-road which receives the attention and commendation of travelers who may stop for a short or longer time at the station, as well as the admiration of the citizens generally.

COTTON FACTORIES.

The two cotton factories have been enlarged, and unto the water power, the actual quantity of water having decreased as in many other localities, steam has been supplemented so that by the greater retention of the water and its economical use, their capacity has been more than doubled, and there has until recently been about 80,000 yards of print cloth made per week.*

PAPER-MILL.

The capacity of the paper-mill now owned by the Stark Paper Company, which company also has a mill at state line in the edge of Shaftsbury, has been increased so that as against three to four tons of paper, weekly in 1861, it turns out ten to twelve tons per week. Chas. E. Welling, Esq. is the principal stockholder in the company, and both mills when running make from 20 to 25 tons of paper per week.

GLASS GRINDING,—STEREOSCOPES.

Within a few years the grinding of glass by water power for lenses, and the manufacture of stereoscopes has been carried on here quite extensively, the two shops employing from 12 to 15 hands. Three years since a large factory for glass grinding and polishing, and the making of stereoscopes, work boxes, writing desks, &c., was built by H. C. White, upon a water power about a mile south of the village, where from 20 to 25 hands are given employment, and the manufactures of their different shops are shipped far and near throughout this country and many orders have been sent to Australia, South Africa and other foreign countries.

*The Vermont mills, only, are being operated at present, and are manufacturing yarn, which is sold and shipped for use in other parts of the country.

RUBBER TABLETS.

The making of rubber tablets by H. T. Cushman is a growing interest and his contracts in supplying the Dixon Crucible and Pencil Co. of Jersey City with their large line of ink and rubber erasures which are sold all over the country, proves them of the best quality, as no other on the market can compete with those made by the Faber company. Other novelties of small wood work are also manufactured here.

THE LOCK-UP.

A good and sufficient Lock-up, of stone, of convenient size, with two cells opening into the front room, is centrally located, and is considered by law-abiding citizens as a good investment. It is undoubtedly a terror to evil doers and has its influence to deter from lawlessness.

THE LADIES LIBRARY.

The ladies established a library in 1877, by subscription and the donation of books by interested citizens, which has been maintained with interest to the present time. The organization took the name of "Ladies Circulating Library Association," with an annual membership fee of $1, and has a catalogue of about 250 volumes.

THE BURNING OF THE BURGESS BRIDGE, spanning the Waloomsac river. 500 ft. long and about 40 ft. high on the Troy and Boston R. R. two miles west, on Thursday, Oct. 15, 1885, resulted in the death of three citizens of this village. The fire engine was taken to the bridge and in trying to pass under the east end, the highway running under it, the bridge fell and killed and burned two, and fatally burned the third.— There has been no calamity in this neighborhood so appalling and giving such a shock to the whole community for miles around for many years, if indeed, ever.

A large fire occurred a year since, which destroyed much of the business portion of the village and from the effects, of which the business of the place has not, as yet, entirely recovered.

BENNINGTON CENTRE VILLAGE.

Bennington Centre has somewhat diminished in population in the last two decades, numbering now about 200 inhabitants.

The building of brick, with the historic name of "State Arms House" so long kept as a tavern, and where the State Militia were annually called for June training upon the Upper Hill, which has for many years been occupied as a residence, is to be taken down to open the grounds contiguous to the Battle Monument.

The Walloomsac House, formerly a 'Hotel' and celebrated as an 'Inn' in days when the large travel between Albany and Troy across the mountain to Brattleboro and the East was done by stages; was kept for years as a boarding house through the summer months. It is now closed, though it is hoped only for a limited time.

There is here a general country store in which is located the post-office, and also, another store where groceries and hardware are kept.

THE FIRST CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH.

The old First Congregational Church of Bennington is still energetically and prosperously maintained. The present pastor, Rev. Isaac Jennings* has officiated as such since June 1853,— a long pastorate, and one productive of much good, and has been a continual pleasure to both pastor and people.— The Church is remembered by many who in the activities of life and the pursuit of business, have removed to other parts of the town, or established homes beyond the borders of the State.

After the burning of the Court House in 1869, the decision to build the new one at Bennington, one mile east, was not unexpected, as the County would be better accommodated.

There are quite a number of summer residences, some quite palatial, in or near the village, built by business men of Troy or New York, some of whom are the descendants of old residents.

A VILLAGE IMPROVEMENT SOCIETY has been lately organized here, which augurs still greater efforts in beautifying the now pleasant village, as well as the care of the cemetery of this historic place.

On the brow of the hill at the north end of the village was situated the which General Burgoyne with a detachment under Col. Baume was longing to capture on the morning of the 16th of Aug. 1777, and it is near this very spot that the Bennington Battle Monument is being erected.

On the eastern slope and overlooking the larger village of Bennington is the Roman Catholic church of stone.

to Bennington as more convenient for the larger portion of the congregation.

THE SOLDIERS' HOME.

BY HENRY D. HALL, ESQ.

The patriotism of the people of Vermont did not die out with the termination of the rebellion. It has since shown itself in sympathy for the soldier and his family in many ways; often in acts of kindness in a more tangible form than merely the saying "be ye warmed and filled, depart in peace," as well as in substantial encouragement in carrying on their G. A. R. organizations in which there is so much interest, and which have been of such great assistance to many of their comrades. It has now selected a way of showing its interest more fittingly and systematically, in the establishment of a Soldiers' Home for "deserving soldiers and sailors and such of their families as the trustees may deem proper;"—thus giving a practical recognition of the debt of obligation to those now living, who with the great number that gave up their lives, are deserving of lasting gratitude.

The act of incorporation for an institution of this kind was approved with permission to hold property obtained by gift, purchase or otherwise to the amount of $200,000, Nov. 24, 1884, and an appropriation of $10,000 was made for the use of such home by the same legislature.

A committee was appointed to select a suitable place and propositions were made by towns competing for its location, in different parts of the State, but the offer of the "Trenor Park Home for Destitute Children and Women"—for this purpose was accepted and the property made over to the State in the winter of 1886 and 7.

It is beautifully situated on the north side of the Village of Bennington, about one half mile from the Court House and Post office, and in sight of the ground upon which the Battle Monument is being erected. The premises had been purchased by the late Hon. T. W. Park with the idea of making it a "Home for children and old ladies," by setting apart a sufficient endowment fund for the necessary expenses, but whose sudden death occurred before the consummation of his most cherished plans, though he procured the act of incorporation to be passed by the legislature for carrying out this purpose, with the above title a few months before his death.* The home had been used for farming purposes, and in the summer for the accommodation of "fresh air children" from New York until it was made over to the State. (*1852,—page 40.)

Connected with the institution are about 200 acres of arable land with a main building well and permanently built 50 x 45 feet, three stories high, including the attic which is high and completely finished, with ells and other necessary additions. It was constructed with the modern improvements and the system of sewerage is most perfect. The barns and out-buildings are large and commodious, having been built with wise reference to fitness and convenience. The fountain, which sends a stream of water into the air 198 feet, is supplied by springs from the mountain, with a fall of more than 300 feet and the grove containing a beautiful fish-pond with carriage drives through it adds greatly to the beauty of the level acres, used for meadow and planting land which adjoin it.

The Bennington Banner of August 18th and 25th says:

"It was fortunate indeed that the muster of State troops and the laying of the corner stone of the monument took place in such close proximity to the Home. These events gave opportunity to the thousands of patriotic people visiting the town to also inspect the Home, the very valuable property and its vast and beautiful surroundings — Few people it is to be presumed, went to Bennington for the purpose of visiting the Home, but when there, few went away without improving their opportunity. Exclamations of favorable surprise were upon every lip.

"The present condition and future prospects of the Home are all that could be desired, and all can join in expressing the opinion that the institution is an honor to the State."

"The Home will be filled gradually to its capacity as fast as the same can be done judiciously, regard being first had to relieve the towns from persons chargeable upon them."

"Considerable has been written and said concerning the establishment of the Home at Bennington, and of the extent of the property and its many conveniences, but to be able to understand the whole nothing can take the place of personal observation. The property was formerly the palatial residence of Mr. Seth B. Hunt, a prosperous Bennington manufacturer, who had spared no expense to improve, beautify and adorn it.

"THE SOLDIERS' HOME DELIVERED.

At 11 o'clock, Aug. 16th the formalities attending the dedication of the Vermont Soldiers' Home took place.

The Governors of Vermont, New Hampshire and Massachusetts, and most of the military guests, together with the militia officers and many, old soldiers assembled at the Soldiers' Home, where after music, Gen. Wm. Wells, chairman of the board of trustees, called the assemblage to order and introduced Col. Z. M. Mansur, who in behalf of the board, addressed Governor Ormsbee, and formally delivered the property to the State of Vermont. He gave a history of its acquisition and adaptation and bespoke for it the protecting care of the State.

Governor Ormsbee accepted for the State the noble gift from the heirs of the late Hon. T. W. Park and the work of the trustees in expending upon it the State's appropriation, and said that so far as his influence could go, it would be given to promote a constant interest in the grateful benevolence thus entered upon.

Senator Edmunds was then called out . . . He praised the site and its beautiful surroundings and expressed his pleasure that Vermont had provided a home for the increasing number of her gallant but unfortunate sons who helped to save the country in its hour of peril and are now with the advance of years finding themselves unable to battle with the hardships of life. He congratulated the veterans and the State upon the good fortune and good management which had attended the founding of the Home and hoped the State would make its capacity equal to the needs that may arise.

Ex Governor Pingree followed him and spoke of the lively appreciation that loyal Vermont has always had of her heroes. She recognizes, but for them, we should not to-day have a great and free country that is the pride and praise of all people. To them the people owe a debt that never can be paid; and the least that the public can do is to see that their sufferings are made as light as possible. This ended the speaking, but in conversation, Govs. Ames and Sawyer spoke of the beauty of the Home and the remarkable economy with which it had been secured and adapted.

It was learned from the trustees that about 50 applications have been made for admission to it, but it will accommodate only 38 residents, and the next legislature will have to be asked for an appropriation for additional quarters.

The veterans and the trustees spoke with equal praise of Superintendent and Mrs. Coffey."

The officers of the Home are Wm. Wells of Burlington, president; P. P. Pitkin of Montpelier, treasurer; C. C. Kinsman of Rutland, secretary; and Capt. R. J. Coffey, superintendent.

It was prepared for inmates in the spring of 1887, and there were on its delivery, as above, to the State, fifteen veterans availing themselves of its comforts and privileges.

Lewis N. Beeman, Co. I, 6th Reg., age 49, residence Swanton, admitted, Aug. 16, 1887.

There is certainly just reason for satisfaction and pride on the part of the State and gratulation to those who are enjoying and the greater number who may enjoy in the future, the benefits of this humane institution, founded in patriotism and affection.

BENNINGTON BATTLE MONUMENT.

BY HENRY D. HALL ESQ.

[With selections from Gov. Hall's published papers and the Bennington Banner.]

The importance of the Battle of Bennington as the pivotal event upon which the tide of arms turned in the Revolutionary struggle between the Colonies and the Mother Country, has become more and more apparent as the years have rolled by. The recurring anniversary has been celebrated and the deeds of its actors have been rehearsed to the multitudes gathering to perpetuate the day, by the patriot orator and statesman in language both instructing and inspiring. In addition to its observance as specially for patriotic commemoration of the battle, it has been used as the day for political conventions by the different parties in their strife for governmental control, as well as for religious, temperance and other commendable purposes, and the patriotism exhibited on the memorable 16th of August 1777, has been held up by each as worthy the imitation of every one, and a share in it as the heirloom of all lovers of the glorious institutions of our country. The celebrating of the one hundredth anniversary of the battle had been advocated for years and as early as August 1875, the veterans of the late rebellion at a reunion at Brattleboro, among them, Col. J. H. Walbridge, "voted to adjourn to meet in Bennington during the week of August 1877." Maj. J. H. Cushman "in a speech at the Officers Reunion at St

Albans, October 14th of the same year, warmly endorsed the project." This action with the interest developed by agitation of the subject by citizens of Bennington and vicinity soon awakened such enthusiasm with reference to it, that in October a call was made in a village paper for a meeting for the purpose "of forming a to aid in preparing for the centennial anniversary of the Battle of Bennington." It was heartily responded to and the "Bennington Historical Society" formed with the following list of officers:

"The president was Hon. Hiland Hall. Among the Vice presidents were the Rev. Isaac Jennings, Seth B. Hunt, Trenor W. Park, Rev. C. H. Hubbard, A. B. Gardner, Henry G. Root, Dr. Benj. F. Morgan, Thos. White, Henry W. Putnam, Hiram Bingham, H. E. Bradford and David F. Squires. The corresponding secretary was Chas. M. Bliss; the recording secretary, Merritt B. Morgan and the treasurer, Daniel McEown. The Board of Directors were A. B. Valentine, A. Robinson, Jas. H. Walbridge, C. E. Dewey, Ew'd Kingsley, A. J. Mattison, J. V. D. S. Merrill, C. R. Sanford, H. T. Cushman, Asaph P. Childs, Geo. A. Wood, Olin Scott, J. Halsey Cushman, George W. Robinson, Milo C. Huling, L. P. Norton, A. C. Hubbell, E. O. Cole, Ed. S. Chandler, L. F. Abbott, William E. Hawks, 2d, O. D. Adams and the president of the society, its past presidents, secretaries and the chairman of all its committees.

The active work of preparation for the celebration and the monument now commenced in earnest. During the winter of 1875—6 this board of directors, such members as especially interested themselves in the work and were in the town during the winter, held weekly meetings in the Court House at Bennington. The president of the society, the even then venerable Gov. Hall, was never present, but he was constantly kept informed of the proceedings; and in consequence he gave the board his most hearty support.—Several of the vice-presidents and other citizens were also deeply interested in the work.”

At this time the plans of the society were formed and an interest was soon manifested through the state and in the states of New Hampshire and Massachusetts, which was an earnest of extended effort to induce the several states as also the general Congress to make appropriations for defraying the expense of erecting a suitable monument, supplemental to what could be raised by private subscriptions. C. M. Bliss and G. W. Robinson of the society were most active in their exertions in obtaining subscriptions, and in their personal efforts to further the project in other ways, especially Mr. Bliss in his attendance upon the different legislatures and at the Capital at Washington.

By an act of the Vermont Legislature approved November, 28, 1876. The Bennington Battle Monument Association was incorporated “for the purpose of erecting and maintaining a suitable monument commemorative of the achievements of Gen. John Stark and the patriot soldiers of Vermont, New Hampshire and Massachusetts at the decisive battle “fought on the 16th of August 1777.”

By the same act an appropriation of $15,000 was made payable when full proof could be made that $5,000 had been raised by the Association and was ready for the purpose. This sum was raised in 1880 and paid in to the State treasury, which with the $15,000 paid by the State, was set apart as a fund of the Association in the keeping of the State.

In 1877 the State of Massachusetts appropriated $7,000 in aid of the monument. This appropriation lapsed under the general law of the State and in 1886 it was renewed and increased to $10,000. To prevent further lapse it was funded, the Association adding $5,000, which with the $1,000 constituted the Bennington Monument fund of Massachusetts of $15,000.

In 1777, the State of New Hampshire appropriated $5,000 in aid of the monument.

In February 1881, Congress appropriated $40,000 on conditions similar to those of the States.”

The first meeting of the Association was held on the 2d Wednesday in January 1877, and the committee on the nomination of officers reported as such: “President, Hon. Horace Fairbanks of St. Johnsbury, vice-president, Hon. Hiland Hall of Bennington, secretary, Charles M. Bliss of Bennington, assistant sec., John T. Shurtleff of Bennington, treasurer, Milo C. Huling of North Bennington,” who were duly elected.

At subsequent meetings, by-laws were adopted and other important business transacted; and at another adjourned meeting, Jan. 23, the following board of directors were elected by ballot: A. B. Gardner, A. B. Valentine, Olin Scott, Charles E. Dewey and A. P. Childs.

The work of the Association was for the year 1877, principally to conduct the Celebration of the week of the 16th of August that year. Notwithstanding the fact that a commission was created, the responsibility for the celebration rested by law, on the Association. The Association, and not the Commission, invited all the guests, and it looked after the exercises of the special two days celebration, with the care of which it was charged by its charter. The commission appointed an executive committee consisting of Messrs Root, Valentine, Huling, Page and Geo. A. Merrill of Rutland. The Association also appointed a committee consisting of Charles M. Bliss, Isaac Jennings and A. B. Gardner to which E. J. Phelps, when he was elected the president of the Commission was added, to have charge of the literary exercises of the two days."

This observance of the Centennial called together thousands from the country, near and remote, as citizens or officials; various organizations, both civil and military; his Excellency the President, R. B. Hayes and members of his Cabinet; the Governors of several States, and other distinguished personages from this and other States.

"An account of the proceedings of the week of the Centennial is given in a semi official work by the Association, and one by C. S. Forbes of St. Albans, both of which have been published.—The whole expense of the celebration was over $14,000." It was estimated that over thirty thousand persons were in attendance on anniversary day. Annual and special meetings of the Association were held and important business transacted; but one subject of commanding interest held its place—that of securing a suitable design for the monument.

On Dec. 2, 1884, at a meeting of the directors, held in New York City, the design of Prof. Weir was by the committee of design recommended to the board.

The board of directors at this time were Hon. Geo. D. Robinson, governor of Massachusetts; Hon. Samuel W. Hall, governor of New Hampshire, Hon. Samuel E. Pingree, governor of Vermont, ex-officio members of the board, and Hon. Benj. F. Prescott, ex-governor of New Hampshire; Hon. Edward J. Phelps, L.L. D., professor of law in Yale college; Gen. John G. McCullough, Hon. Henry G. Root, Maj. A. B. Valentine, Samuel B. Sanford, Esq., and Rev. Isaac Jennings.

The committee of design at this time were Hon. E. J. Phelps, soon after appointed our minister to England, chairman; Hon. Alexander H. Rice, L. L. D., ex-governor of Massachusetts; Hon. Benj. F. Prescott, ex-governor of New Hampshire and president of the Association. The author of the design adopted, John F. Weir, professor of painting and design in Yale college, was present at the above meeting—in New York, Dec. 2, 1884, the report of the committee of design was accepted, and a resolution was passed unanimously adopting said design, and also in accordance with the resolution every member of the board, including the Governors of Massachusetts, New Hampshire and Vermont, ex-officio members, gave their individual vote in writing, and within the time that the meeting was kept open for the purpose, for the Weir design."

This design, which was mainly sculptural and of small dimensions was a great disappointment to the people of Bennington who had contemplated the erection of a structure of magnitude and grandeur properly typifying the historical importance of the Bennington victory which in accordance with the historian Bancroft they had always felt to have been "one of the most brilliant and eventful of the war" of the Revolution. The design consisted of five life like bronze statues, in Revolutionary costume, the commanding figure 15 feet in height, standing on the top of a rough granite shaft 20 feet square at the base and 45 feet high, the four other figures being at the corners of the base 8 feet in height. They accordingly looked upon the proposed structure as tending to degrade rather than honor their patriotic ancestors who had helped to achieve the victory.

The opposition to the design of the directors was so strongly manifested at the January meeting, 1885, that the question of its adoption was not moved and its consideration was postponed to the semi annual meeting to be held the following August. Gov. Hall who was spending the winter in Springfield and unable to attend the meeting had written a spirited letter to the treasurer of the Association to be read in the meeting, briefly, but earnestly, protesting against the adoption of the design. It was not found necessary to use the letter at the meeting, but it was published the next day in the Bennington Banner and extensively circulated.

Previous to the August meeting, the Bennington Historical Society took measures through a committee of its members to have a design for a conspicuous monument prepared, and on its approval by a larger advisory committee from the states of Vermont, Massachusetts and New Hampshire to be presented to the Association for their adoption in lieu of that of the board of directors.

Early in June, Gov. Hall addressed an open letter to his fellow members of the Association in which he set forth his objection at considerable length to the design, claiming and insisting it was not only altogether inappropriate, but that it was not in any just sense a compliance with the terms, or spirit of the act of incorporation which declared its purpose to be "for erecting and maintaining a suitable monument commemorative of the achievements of Gen. John Stark and the patriot soldiers of Vermont, New Hampshire and Massachusetts at the decisive battle of Bennington fought August 16th, 1777."

The report of the committee of design discarded all existing monuments of magnitude and grandeur, both ancient and modern, including those in this country of Bunker Hill and Washington, as unworthy of being followed, assigning as the reason for such condemnation that they were speechless, and did not tell any story of the event to be commemorated, but left its description to be ascertained from some other source.

To overcome this supposed fault the committee resorted to an alleged story telling power of sculpture in bronze statues that the monument might properly describe the battle. forgetting or overlooking the well known truth that sculpture had no original power of speech, but like painting could illustrate and emphasize to the eye such facts only as were already known, and that without such previous knowledge sculpture was equally dumb with their condemned monumental shaft.

But the artistic language of the proposed design would be found to give no special account of the battle by which it could be distinguished from any other Revolutionary engagement.

None of the sculptured figures before mentioned purported to typify any of the officers or soldiers engaged in the battle. That on the top of the monument was not to be a portrait likeness of Gen. Stark, but was only to be a type of "a Revolutionary leader," the other four figures to use the language of the committee were declared "not to be portraits of individuals but types of the time and the event" intended to represent "the farmer and the artisan turning, from their avocations to take up arms to resist invasion, the woman of the time sheltering her child from the coming storm and the minister of religion invoking the divine benediction."

Such a structure might be a fair type of what would occur at any active resistance to invasion, but it would have no special relation to the victory of Bennington, and would be just as applicable to a dozen other revolutionary engagements, whether small or great, successful or otherwise as that of Bennington. In all of them there would be seen the Revolutionary leader, the farmer and the artisan turning to take up arms, the woman sheltering her child and the minister invoking the divine blessing. The design thus being merely a type of an ordinary occurrence in the war of the Revolution, could not in any sense be considered as commemorative of the achievement of Gen. Stark and his patriot soldiers at the victory of Bennington.

At the meeting in August, a very large number of the members being present the report which had been submitted in January recommending the smaller design, was withdrawn, and the way made clear for the adoption of the larger and commanding one coinciding with the views of Governor Hall. The subject was fully canvassed. Senators W. M. Evarts of New York, Justin S. Morrill and Hon. E. P. Walton of Vermont and Prof. A. L. Perry of Massachusetts with others taking part in the discussion; and the larger design recommended by the committee of the Historical Society was adopted by unanimous vote.

The annual meeting was held the following Jan. 13, (1886) "when the committee styled a 'working committee,' appointed Aug. 12, 1885. consisting of C. M. Bliss, Geo. W. Robinson, M. C. Huling, John V. Hall and J. T. Shurtleff was continued with its same duties and powers.

Early in 1886 the working committee secured the approval of the design by the President of the United States and at length, subsequently, the payment of the appropriation of $40,000 by Congress was effected. The moneys of the three States were released on the basis of the contract with Mr. Ward for a monument 300 feet high.

At a special meeting, Aug. 5, 1886 it was unanimously "Resolved that the monument be located in the centre of the highway on the crest of the hill, as nearly opposite the site of the Continental store house as practicable." also unanimously "Resolved that the working committee raised in 1885 be empowered in co-operation with the board of directors to proceed at once to lay the foundation the of monument of the design already adopted with full power to make contracts and cause the erection and completion of the monument."

At a meeting held Jan. 12, 1887, the working committee, at their request, were relieved and full powers given the board of directors of the Association to make contracts and build the monument after the design approved by the Association, and to transact all business relating to matters of the Association

At a meeting held by the directors, April 12, J. V. Hall, president pro tem and Rev. Isaac Jennings, secretary, a building committee consisting of H. G. Root, A. B. Valentine, and Milo C. Huling was appointed, also a finance committee, viz: John G. McCullough, John V. Hall, and J. T. Shurtleff.

The work of these committees was now pushed forward with vigor, and soon a contract was made with Contractor W. H. Ward of Lowell, Mass. for building "a monument not less than 300 feet high and substantially in accordance with the 'Rinn plan' at a cost of $75,000."

By an act of the legislature in 1886, commissioners were appointed to secure the site selected for the monument with proper surroundings by the purchase of lands and the removal of buildings, and in section 6, a sum not to exceed $10,000 was appropriated for this purpose. The report of the commission states that "there is no question but that the acquisition of a part, or all thereof (ie the 40 acres) is desirable," but owing to expense only about 12 acres were actually reported as now necessary.

At a meeting of the board of directors of the Association, June 4, 1887, it was voted "to invite the citizens of Bennington to meet them at Library hall and join them in arrangements for the celebration of the laying of the corner stone of the monument on the 16th of August next." It was also voted "that the board of directors extend an invitation to the Grand Lodge of Free and accepted Masons of Vermont to participate in the laying of the corner stone of the monument." The invitation was accepted by the Grand Lodge and due notice given the board of directors.

On June 15th 1887, a formal resolution was passed "inviting the Hon. Benj F. Prescott, Ex-Governor of New Hampshire and President of the Bennington Battle Monument Association, to act as president of the day on the occasion of laying the corner stone of the monument."

THE LAYING OF THE CORNER STONE OF THE BENNINGTON BATTLE MONUMENT.

Tuesday, August 16th 1887 will become historical as the day on which was impressively laid the Corner Stone of the towering Monument for the erection of which so much of thought, money and labor had been bestowed by those who for years had this grand object in view.

The First Brigade, Vermont National Guards, Brig. Gen. W. L. Greenleaf commanding had been in camp upon the grounds attached to the Soldiers Home for several days previous to the 16th, as had also Fuller Battery, Capt. Levi K. Fuller commanding, and had by their daily drill and evolutions called out the praises and encomiums of hundreds who had from day to day come from the town and vicinity to witness them.

We quote from the Bennington Banner:

"The 16th day of August 1777, 1877 and 1888 mark three important and eventful epochs in the history of Bennington. One hundred and ten years ago the victory won for freedom and against British oppression by the patriotic Benningtonians under Col. Warner and allies from Massachusetts and New Hampshire, all under Gen. John Stark, was most potential in turning the tide of war in favor of the young Republic. The celebration ten years ago of the Centennial of the Battle of Bennington was a most memorable occasion. The laying of the corner stone of the Battle Monument to-day has also been a notable event. The weather was pleasant and fully 30,000 people were in town as spectators of, or participants in, the celebration."

HON. EBENEZER JALLS ORMSBEE, EX-GOV. OF VERMONT.

"The day was ushered in by the ringing of bells and a volley from Fuller Battery, encamped here. There were clouds mingled with the sunshine but no rain or other circumstances to mar the comfort of the occasion.—The incoming trains from all directions brought crowds of people into town. The Sir Knights in their showy and symbolic dress, the visiting military, the G. A. R. and the Odd Fellows soon made our streets alive with organised bodies who were to make up the parade of the afternoon. The various delegations were met at the depots and escorted to their respective headquarters which had been provided at the halls of the organizations to which each belonged. The Governors and their staffs were the guests of the Association and were entertained at the Putnam. The visiting military companies were the guests of the citizens of Bennington. They were cordially received and hospitably entertained. As these all came into the town an inkling was obtained of what the afternoon's procession would be like. The evolutions of the Sir Knights, the marching and movements of the 32d Separate Company of the New York National Guard, the fine appearance of the Berkshire Boys (both the cadets and Canton Colfax), together with what could be witnessed of our own uniformed troops and societies, all these seemed to take up the attention of the assembled thousands and kept them in good nature while anticipation was heightened in consequence.

GOVERNOR'S DAY.

At ten o'clock the formalities of Governor's Day in Camp Col. Seth Warner occurred. The brigade was reviewed by Governor Ormsbee, Commander in Chief. In this pleasant duty, he was accompanied by Governors Sawyer of New Hampshire and Ames of Massachusetts, who had arrived just in time to participate. The three Governors were attended as they inspected the Brigade by General Greenleaf and his full staff as well as by their own.—This as well as the review took place on the parade ground, the point of observation of the Governors and guests being to the east of the Soldiers Home.

Among those invited by Governor Ormsbee as guests (25 in all) were Senator Edmunds, Ex-Governors Holbrook, Fairbanks, Barstow and Pingree of Vermont, State Treasurer Dubois, Secretary of State Porter and Com. E. T. Woodward, representing the Government, and several of our prominent citizens, members of the Monument Association and the Editors of the local papers.

Governor's Day this year was one of great brilliancy, owing not only to the fine appearance and discipline of the Brigade, but also to the presence of distinguished citizens and the overshadowing importance of what was to follow. The very great improvement in the bearing of the Vermont National Guard after a few days in camp was never more noticeable than on this occasion. As the troops passed in review the breast of all Vermonters swelled with pride as they heard the compliments showered upon them by visitors from other States. As the Banner said in the beginning of these historic events: "The Green Mountain Boys of 1887 will take rank with those of 1861 and 1777, although each must pass into renown in their respective spheres."

THE PROCESSION.

Precisely at the hour announced the grand procession formed. The Troy Times special places the number in line at 3,500 and the number of Masons in town at 1,000. The Chief Marshall, Col. Hooker, and Gen. Greenleaf had agreed that the head of the column start at one o'clock. Nothing could have been seen in the streets at that hour but a dense mass of people and mounted aids moving here and there.

At camp much the same order of things was apparent. Gen. Greenleaf, Col. Estey and Maj. Bond were coolly issuing their orders and awaiting the signal. When however the lines did move, the streets were cleared as if by magic, and the long and imposing column passed in review of thousands lining both sides of the streets until the site of the monument was reached. There was no delay or break anywhere and the procession was as well seen within a few rods of starting as farther down. It is safe to say that no finer line was ever seen in Vermont. Perhaps, there have been larger numbers, at the Centennial in 1877, for instance, but none more imposing and beautiful. The town presented a holyday appearance, nearly every house and place of business on the line of march and streets upon which the formations were made, being one line of flags and other decorations. On Pleasant street, the residence of Hon. A. B. Valentine, headquarters of Govnor Ormsbee, displayed a large flag tastefully hung in festoons. The waving of plumes, the flashing of swords, the glitter of shoulder straps and gilt accoutrements presented a pleasing spectacle. Time and space will not admit of an itemized report of the other and elaborate decorations."

PRELIMINARY TO THE CEREMONIES.

As the Fuller Battery reached Main street in Bennington Centre, it dashed rapidly up to the site of the old Continental storehouse where it unlimbered and fired a salute of thirteen guns, which announced the formal opening of the corner stone exercises. Seated on the speaker's stand around the monument were Ex Governor B. F. Prescott of New Hampshire, President of the Bennington Battle Association., Gov. Oliver Ames of Massachusetts, Gov. C. H. Sawyer of New Hampshire, and Gov. E. J. Ormsbee, Senator George F. Edmunds, Congressman John W. Stewart, orator of the day, and Congressman William W. Grout. A second stand was occupied by the staffs of the three governors and such well-known Vermonters as Horace Fairbanks, Ex Gov., Samuel E. Pingree, Ex Gov., John L. Barstow, Ex Gov., Frederick Holbrook, Ex Gov., Col. B. B. Small-ey, Gen. Wm. Wells, Judge H. H. Powers, Judge J. W. Rowell, Colonel Franklin Fairbanks, State Treasurer Dubois, Secretary of State Porter, Secretary of Finance Page, Gen. P. P. Pitkin, Col. John C. Stearns, Hon. James K. Batchelder, Gen. T. S. Peck, Gen. William H. Gilmore, Col. Albert Clarke, Col. F. S. Stranahan, Col. Wm. A. Crombie, Col. D. K. Hall, Col. S. M. Mansur, Col. R. E. Hathorn, Col. De May, Interstate Commissioner, A. F. Walker, Hon. Warren Gibbs, Honorable Daniel Roberts, Hon. B. D. Harris, Gen. H. K. Ide, and Col. T. C. Fletcher. Upon this stand were also seated the members of the Monument Association's Board of Directors, the Building and special committees.

The platform occupied by the Grand Lodge and Grand Commandery was situated just south of the corner stone.— This stone is 7 feet long, 3 feet wide and 2 feet 7 inches thick and will weigh more than 5 tons. The receptacle within it is 2 feet long, 1 foot wide and 8 inches deep. Within this receptacle was placed a copper box and in the box were placed the articles as read by the Grand Secretary and enumerated below.— Another stand had been erected just to the right of the second stand, on the south-east corner and upon this the monument committee had provided ample accommodations for the press, the First Regiment band and the vocalists of Bennington and Berkshire men.

After the discoursing of vocal and instrumental music by the singers and bands and prayer there followed the ceremony in Masonic order, the box within it containing the following :

Holy Bible, Gov. Hall's Early History of Vermont, Rev. Isaac Jennings Memorials of a Century, Rev. Isaac Jennings' Historical Account relating to the Battle Monument, Manuscript copy of the contract for the erection of the monument; Biographical Encyclopedia of the 19th century, Vermont; copies Bennington Banner, newspaper; copies Bennington Reformer, newspaper; other Vermont newspapers, Troy and New York newspapers, Printed laws relating to Monument, Battle of Bennington and Vermont Centennial: Forbes' Vermont Centennial, History of Odd Fellowship, Report of Masonic Grand Lodge of Vermont, 1887; Official programme of laying corner stone, Aug. 16th, 1887; Masonic ceremonies, laying cornerstone, Vermont, Centennial, Memorial Medal, Bank notes of the Banks in Bennington, Copper coins, Brigade order and roster, regimental order from Adjutant General's office for muster of 1887.

Of the above the medal was contributed by Dr. C. P. Thayer of Boston Mass.; copper coins by Thomas S. Miller of St. Albans and Mrs. S. M. Sibley. She also presented the Farmer's Almanac. The History of Odd Fellowship was written by H. L. Stillson and donated for this purpose by Vermont

Grand Lodge. Copy of the Banner contained cut of monument and Record History written by Chas. M. Bliss.

The rite being concluded, Most Worshipful Alfrid A. Hall, Grand Master of Vermont in behalf of the order, in an eloquent speech presented the monument to Gov. Ormsbee for the State, as "a tribute of Americans to American valor, and of Vermont to Vermont patriotism."

The address of Gov. E. J. Ormsbee was full of interest, a portion of which was as follows :

"And now, Sir, in the name of the State of Vermont, I receive this work so auspiciously begun, from your hands. I thus receive it, not alone for the State of Vermont, but also for and in behalf of our sister commonwealths, Massachusetts and New Hampshire, who have made such liberal contribution to the cause in memory of their sons who have sealed the cause of freedom and liberty with their blood; and for and in behalf of the General Government which has by more than liberal aid espoused the cause here commemorated, and thereby given to it a National character, and securing to all of her sixty millions of people a common property and interest in this offering to patriotism, this monument to the bravery and heroism of the never to be forgotten Allen, Stark, Warner and their brave and devoted followers.

And I should be remiss in acting my pleasure if not in the performance of my duty, should I fail to here and now, to make an entitled recognition of our obligation to and to pay just tribute of thankfulness to our sister States and the United States. for the interest manifested in and for the material aid furnished to this undertaking and therefore as the Executive of the State of Vermont, and in behalf of her people I tender to them through their honored and honorable representatives, who have so nobly come to us this day to pay further devotion by their presence and to give increased value to the gifts that had preceded them, our warmest thanks.

And having thus accepted the well laid foundation work of this monument to both valor and patriotism, from your hands, I now transfer it to the Bennington Battle Monument Association for completion.

Gentlemen of the Association; Upon you is now conferred a great responsibility; You are the chosen, trusted, servants of the State upon whom now rests the duty of taking up this work and carrying it on to completion. In the performance of your duties you are not alone the servants of Vermont, but also the custodians and trustees of the General Government, the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, and the State of New Hampshire. The honor and good faith of the State is pledged that this work shall proceed without delay, that it shall be completed as it has been begun, with stability and enduring qualities; this honor and good faith is also, in your keeping. We expect that you will give to this undertaking your individual and collective care and watchfulness and that under your supervision and direction the work will go on from base to apex, until we shall see before us completed and wholly finished a structure as your design calls for without blemish or defect and in keeping with the foundation before us. This we have a right to expect. Less than this would grieve and disappoint us. In full trust and confidence I now commit this work to your hands.

The work was accepted by Hon. B. F. Prescott of New Hampshire, on behalf of the Association, from whose address is copied :

Your Excellency :—As President of the Bennington Battle Monument Association and in its behalf, I accept from you, the Chief Magistrate of Vermont, this corner stone with its historic contents, now so well and appropriately laid. In doing this I feel that an important work has been well begun, and that the people of this republic will rejoice to know that an additional honor is to be paid to the patriots of the Revolution, who freely gave their lives for the establishment of the best government on earth.

The Association under the supervision of the chief architect will erect upon this imperishable foundation a monument beautiful and artistic in design, and massive in structure, which shall in the coming ages mark one of the most important localities in our land; made sacred by the blood and sacrifices of our heroic countrymen.

By the liberality of the States of Vermont, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, and the general government, which was made possible by the result of this battle, and the generosity of liberal and patriotic citizens, this monument is to be erected.

On that memorable day, August 16th 1777, without pre-arranged plans, in the heat of the battle, amid the groans of the wounded and dying, and over the prostrate forms of their fallen and dead comrades, the self sacrificing patriots of New Hampshire, Vermont and Massachusetts helped lay the corner stone of this free and enlightened republic which has stood a century and commands the respect, and has secured the admiration of enlightened mankind, everywhere.

We meet to-day to lay the corner stone to a monument which shall forever commemorate that event, and may it when completed remain as long as the work of man shall endure, and may all who behold it in coming centuries be inspired with increased devotion to their country which confers such inestimable blessings upon its people.

History records the valor of men.—When Leonidas led the Spartan band and held the pass of Thermopylæ against the invading army of Xerxes, in which struggle he sacrificed his own life, and the immortal three hundred under his command expired on the field, he showed no valor, displayed no heroism, loftier than John Stark and the immortal heroes under his command, who checked the march and successfully defeated an invading army upon this territory. Every soldier under him would have yielded his life had the occasion demanded it.

Our Republic is not ungrateful or unmindful of its obligation to those who established it and those who have defended it; and to you, veterans in the last great struggle in defense of the Constitution and the inseparability of these states, we owe a debt of gratitude we can never repay. You all have however the satisfaction of knowing that you preserved the best government on earth against the blow aimed at its existence, and now, with the largest liberty enjoy the blessings it confers.

This monument will be erected in honor of the mothers as well as of the fathers of the Revolution. When in those eventful and trying times, the wives and mothers in the valley of the Merrimack, and along those beautiful hillsides and upon the Berkshire hills of Massachusetts gave their husbands and sons a parting embrace, and bade them Godspeed to protect their homes against a ruthless and hostile invasion for the purpose of subjugation and booty;—when they placed their infants under the shade trees, while they reaped and harvested the grain, and offered up to God their prayers for the safe return of their loved ones and for the success of their arms, they displayed a heroism unsurpassed in the history of the world. If such do not deserve a monument at the hands of a grateful posterity to perpetuate their memory and patriotism, pray tell who on earth does?

The special exercises of the laying of the corner stone being completed, and music by the band had been enjoyed, the President of the day announced that the last thing prior to the benediction would be to listen to the ORATION OF EX-GOVERNOR STEWART, the orator of the day. It was quite lengthy, but every sentence teemed with well digested thought, and for the memorable occasion for which it was prepared it was worthy a place in the corner stone, and to be treasured as a most valuable production of one of the honored sons of the State.

The following are extracts

FROM THE ORATION:

“One hundred and ten years ago, this very hour, a little band of hardy pioneers, our fathers, kindred and countrymen were very busy on yonder hillside clearing the track for the on-coming of the great republic. They were men of action; and the time for action had come. Petition for redress, remonstrance against wrong, protest, argument, expostulation, had all been tried and had failed, and the question between the colonies and the mother-country had come to the dread arbitrament of war; and on that fateful day England sent her Hessian hirelings, with their tory and savage allies, to lay waste and pillage the peaceful homes which patient thrift and enterprise had made in this beautiful valley.

The brave pioneers met them on the border, nor did they await attack.—Their defense was in attack, and all that long day they confronted the disciplined invaders, and they fought as brave men fight for home and family and country, while in many a home within rifle-shot of where we stand there were gathered the mothers, sisters, and wives and children of the defenders, awaiting with beating and anxious hearts the issue of the battle and news of the loved ones who were braving its perils. Who can describe the awful suspense of that day to these families as they listen to the distant roar of the deadly guns? But the night draws on, and the day is won, and so becomes one of the most memorable in American history."

"From the number of designs submitted by different artists, the directors with entire unanimity and after careful deliberation selected the one designed by Mr. J. P. Rinn of Boston. It is believed that this design meets every required demand. Its realized embodiment, standing upon solid rock, will rise, graceful in outline, massive and majestic in proportion, to the imposing height of 300 feet; its summit commanding a view of the scenes so memorable. So standing, it will commend itself to the eye and judgment of future beholders as a fitting memorial and symbol, both of the great event it is designed to commemorate and the grand and heroic character of the men whose valor on that August day so long ago made possible the victory at Stillwater and the surrender at Saratoga in the succeeding October. And this brings me to notice very briefly the historical significance of the Battle of Bennington and the bearing it had directly upon the fate of Burgoyne's expedition, and more remotely, though not less certainly upon the result of the then pending struggle between the colonies and the mother country. I am not unaware that this is a well-worn theme. The story of the battle, in which so many of the citizens of this county took part is as familiar as a household word. Indeed, 'Bennington Battle' are to them household words.

The story has been oft told by sire to son and by grandsire to wondering grand-children gathered at his knee. It was from these homes about us that so many went out to meet and stay the invader. It is in many of these peaceful homes that their kindred and descendants now live. Here too, annually, as the years since 1777 have flown, the dwellers in this region have gathered and by appropriate ceremonies observed the anniversary of victory and deliverance.

It has been to them almost as sacred as the annual feast of the passover to the Jews. At each recurring anniversary the story has been rehearsed anew. It is a theme fruitful of impassioned oratory and an inspiration to the poet, and it has been embalmed by the historian. What can I say more or other than what has been spoken and written by your own, nay, our own Gov. Hall, whose interest in, and whose knowledge of the early history of this region was unmatched. We miss, indeed, his venerable and benignant presence here to-day, a day which more than any other he longed to see; and yet the impress and impulse and inspiration of his spirit has been felt at every step in the progress of this association, and abides with us to-day.

[For which—the account of the battle of Bennington—see with these papers, in the preceding pages, the account by Governor Hall.]

“Probably few, if any of those engaged in the battle began to measure the momentous consequences which hung upon its issue. It seemed to them simply a struggle for the capture or retention of a quantity of supplies, and so far important, but the far-reaching consequences of the result could not then be foreseen. Our fathers “builted better than they knew.” We estimate the value of their services in the light of subsequent events. But their want of foreknowledge does not detract in the slightest degree from the moral quality of their action. That lies in their ready, unselfish loyalty to perilous duty, and their prompt response to its call at the risk of life itself.

No race of men ever trod this planet who more than they revered and respected rightful authority, divine and human, and it was the rightness and righteous exercise of authority which commanded their respect and allegiance. Its abuse they knew was outside the functions of government, and therefore intolerable.”

“In common with other colonists they would have remained in willing allegiance to the English government, had the latter respected and secured to them those natural rights which are the gift of God, and not of governments.

These men saw clearly the true functions of government, and so gave new meaning to the term patriotism. Love of country is instinctive and universal and men have died for country in every age, but in every age until the English revolution, government and country have been convertible terms, and human history is not a history of the people, but almost to our time a continuous record of the follies and crimes and oppressions committed by kings and princes and nobles.

The great teacher and Saviour of the race declared the rights and dignity of the individual man, as man, nineteen centuries ago; but the grand truth was never recognized and formulated by any civil government until more than 1200 years later, the great charter of English liberty was wrung from a reluctant king. For centuries afterward it was practically disregarded, the seed sown in men's hearts slowly germinated and grew and became the tree of liberty under which our fathers gathered and which they watered with their blood.”

The heroic life, or heroic death in a just cause, though apparently hopeless, will sometime bear rich harvest in re-conversion into successful heroic action inspired by example. Such was the event and such the character of the actors therein, in reverent memory of which we are met on this anniversary day to perform this initial ceremony.

We begin now the erection of a majestic and enduring memorial which shall in some degree symbolize our conception of an event fraught with so great results, and wrought, too, by an ancestry whose heroic character and achievements must forever challenge our admiration and gratitude.

Let it rise majestic here, girt by these grand mountains, commanding views of unmatched natural beauty and overlooking the graves of the heroic dead. And so may it stand, mute but eloquent a memorial to all coming generations of the Battle of Bennington and of the valor and virtue of the men who crowned the day, whose anniversary we celebrate with glorious victory."

The patriotic little book opens:

"The conflict on the battle field at Bennington, August 16th, 1777, was prefaced so briefly by the martial note of warning to the patriot "minute-man," that the decisive and glorious victory there achieved seems all the more remarkable and brilliant, while each recurring anniversary adds lustre to the names and fresh laurels to the brows of the heroic dead. * * * Suffice it in this work to preface the history of Vermont's Centennial by a preliminary skirmish at this "outpost" of the Second Battle of Bennington, * * * *

"The echoes from the battle fields of Concord, of Lexington and Bunker Hill had died away nearly two years in the past, and the declaration of American Independence had been six months proclaimed at Philadelphia, when the new year 1777, dawned. With it there appeared on the eastern horizon, among the galaxy of States, the star that never sets. Even while all was seeming peace and content on the surface of this royal domain, along the Connecticut and among the green hills of the interior of the New Hampshire Grants, to the shores of the Champlain, in the mid-winter of 1777, when the Frost King—unlike King George of England—was monarch of all he surveyed, there assembled at the snow-bound hamlet of Westminster a convention of brave and hardy pioneers and freemen who declared their independence of Britain's king and laid the foundation for a free and sovereign republic to be known as Vermont. And as the advancing summer's sun unbound the icy fetters, and loosed the hold of the Arctic King on the Green Mountain slopes and fertile valleys of the new-born State, so the coming season witnessed the form and sceptre of royalty wave and disappear, while edicts from the King were scorned as chaff. Midsummer came, and the pioneers and patriots of the New Hampshire Grants assembled at Windsor and adopted a constitution for the new republic.— These were the victories of peace, even while the tramp of red coated regulars and the thunders of English artillery were heard within her borders. Six weeks later these same Green Mountain Boys, fresh from the farms and meadows, came down to Bennington with hunting gun and powder-horn, undisciplined and unused to war, to battle for the right to life, and liberty the pursuit of happiness, and in defense of their constitution and new born freedom, against the flower of the English army. It is gratifying to recall the fact that at Bennington, "the flag that waved a hundred years,"— the stars and stripes, received its baptism of fire, and was carried to victory for the first time on land. It was a worthy initiation of the national emblem that to-day is honored the wide world over.

Page 17: The Bennington Centennial being commemorative of the greatest military achievement of the Green Mountain Boys of the days of Allen and Warner, it was highly appropriate that the descendants in arms of those patriotic sires—the National Guard of Vermont, should muster on this ground made historic on the Centennial anniversary of that battle. Although no clash of arms from contending forces would again resound through this beautiful valley, yet the "pomp and panoply of war" that martialled here as conservators of peace, was in striking contrast to the militia of 1777 that contested royal troops with flint locks, and in home-spun dress. Instead of the midnight call by courier, the martial note of warning came to the National Guard from the printing press in

COL. PECK'S ORDER.

HEAD QUARTERS FIRST REGIMENT,
BURLINGTON, VT. JULY. 16, 1887.

* * * * *

1. This Regiment will go into camp at Bennington, Vt. on the morning of Saturday, August 11, 1887, for eight (8) days.

2. This camp will be known as Camp Stark.
(&c.)

"As the white canopied field of Camp Stark came into view with Mount Anthony's green slopes for a back-ground, the sight was refreshing to the military. An advance guard from each company had pitched the tents and put things in fine order for their comrades, now marching up to camp.

"The ground selected for the military encampments, and for the public exercises to take place on, was exceptionally beautiful in its location, and picturesque in its surrounding scenery. The forum is a fifty-acre field, sloping down from the wooded side of Mount Anthony in billowy ridges toward the valley where lies the village with its white houses like flakes of foam on a sea of green foliage. All around, save to the westward, are the steep slopes of the Green Mountains with dark cloud-shadows floating along their sides.— The grounds are some half a mile from the depot, between the centre and lower villages— The smooth and lawulike surface of the meadow, free from either stone or bush, presented a charming scene, bordered by the pretty camps of the National Guard and veteran soldiers, the rows of tents looking as white as snow drifts on the velvet green of the field. To the south of "Camp Ethan Allen" was erected the banquet tent, 410 feet in length by 50 wide. * * * west of the banquet tent were two pavillions running parallel, 150 feet long and 35 where the veteran soldiers took their meals. * * Head-quarter tents for the Presidents and Govenors * * On one side of the field 700 feet of track laid for the accommodation of the train of 18 Pullman cars which couveyed the Govenor, Council and Legislature of Massachusetts."

"His Excellency Horace Fairbanks, Govenor and Commander in Chief, came to Bennington Saturday; his staff came Monday [For names see Forbes, page 24.] The Staff were dressed in a fine, new uniform of black with gold trimming."

THE CENTENNIAL SUNDAY

"was spent in peace and rest at camp, broken only by guard mount in the morning and dress parade at sunset.—Morning and evening prayer was observed by the Chaplin, Rev. D. C. Roberts, at his headquarters, and were continued daily through the muster. In the churches of Bennington the services were of a patriotic Christian character, no less than eight clergymen preaching at once on war and its glories when waged in the cause of freedom. At St. Peter's the First Regiment Chaplin took his text from one of the victorious Psalms; at the Second Congregational, Burgoyne's invasion was hardly veiled by a line from Iasiah; at the First Church, the words of the mild St. John headed a sermon preached under the flaunting flags of all nations; at the Methodist, "Liberty" was the theme; at the Baptist, "He is my fortress," was the text; and so the round of the churches was made by the newly aroused spirit of one hundred years ago. It was a fitting opening of the week of the reminiscent warfare, like the prayer before battle; and with the red, white and blue in flags, and bunting, gracefully draped around the pulpits and depending from ceilings, with bouquets of choice flowers adding to the beauty of the decorations, the places of worship seemed to preach eloquent sermons in their very appearance. In the afternoon the Chaplain of the Regiment held a church service in the large banquet tent near the veterans' camp. The Regiment attended in a body. The singing was very fine. The Chaplain preached an eloquent discourse on—"Work and Soldiery." A service of song, or praise meeting was held at the First Congregational Church afterwards, which was largely attended.—The dress parade at six o'clock Sunday evening drew thousands of spectators to the review ground. The scene was a brilliant one to the assembled multitude, as standing at the lower edge of the green slope the National Guard were viewed as they came marching from camp into line, their gray coats and white pants, with banners waving and gun-barrels glistening with their precision of movement making a fine display."

"The first "boys in blue" to arrive were Col. George W. Hooker's Windham County veterans, who came marching up to Camp Ethan Allen with banners flying and bands of music playing. They were brown and dust covered by their march over the mountain. The story of their march was as follows:

The Brattleboro Cornet Band struck up a lively air as they lead Col. Hooker and his splendidly equipped Staff with a portion of the Windham County veterans' battallion Benningtonward from Brattleboro Monday morning, in the presence of a large crowd of Brattleborians. Ladies waved their handkerchiefs, men displayed flags, [etc.]

The march through Marlboro, Wilmington, Searsburg and Woodford was made the occasion for a perfect ovation to the old veterans. The entire populace, men and women, old and young, turning out en masse to salute and "God speed" the 1861 defenders of firesides and homes."

The Colonel's Staff comprised the first representative men of Windham County: Col. D. D. Wheeler, Gen. W. W. Lynde, Maj. H. R. Chase, Col. N. C. Sawyer. Majors R. M. Gould, B. R. Jenne, [etc. etc., Forbes, p. 26.]—The numerous, distinguished Staff—a fitting front for the brave "old vets," who with perfect step, steady tread and patriotic ardor followed their file leaders. "The fighting boys" of old Windham, in blue shirts, black pants, black hats, headed by their leaders made a fine appearance. The Brattleboro, Rockingham, Vernon, Dummerston, Putney, Newfane, Townshend, Wardsboro, Dover, Londonderry and Wilmington veterans are merged in this grand battalion. They were followed, before sundown by other battalions and soon the camp was occupied.

THE CENTENNIAL DAY

was opened at Bennington, August 15, 1887, at sunrise. The booming of the cannon of Fuller's Battery awoke the echoes among the surrounding hills, and the church bells rang out a peal of joy. The uniformed militia of Vermont New Hampshire and Connecticut and the army of veterans in Camp Ethan were early astir, and at half past nine marched to the foot of County St. where the procession was formed under the direction of A. B. Valentine, of Bennington."

"The duty of escorting the State officials and other civil dignitaries fell to the First Regiment, National Guards of Vermont, a splendid body of men 700 strong. * * Then came the Governor of this State, the Executive Committee of Bennington Battle Monument Association, the Vermont Centennial Commission and invited guests in fourteen carriages.

The Second Division was headed by the Putnum Phalanx of Hartford, Ct. in their picturesque uniform of the Revolutionary period, followed by the New Hampshire troops: Amoskeag veterans, Major Wallace; Portsmouth Heavy Artillery; State Capital Guards of Concord; Hinsdale Guards; Manchester War Veterans, escorting the State officials of New Hampshire: Governor Prescott, Ex-Govs. Harriman and Smyth; Gen. Nat Head, the Executive Council and State officers; Rev. Nathaniel Bouton, State Historian; Mason W. Tappan, Atty. Gen., Gen. Ira Cross; [etc.] the Legislature of New Hampshire—some 150 members; and the City Government of Manchester.

The Third Division, under Colonel Hooker of Brattleboro, with an imposing Staff of mounted officers, was the crowning feature of the procession, composed as it was of the war veterans of Vermont in their everyday attire, rough and ready for duty in the hour of their country's danger. The First Brigade embraced the southern county battalions numbered about 250 men; the second, Col. Butterfield, 300 strong; the Third, Col. Tracy from Rutland and Addison Counties, 125 men; and the Fourth, made up of the yeomanry of Washington, Orange, Lamoille, Orleans, Essex and Caledonia counties. 700 strong; total about 1300 men.

"At 9.30, the procession which had been formed upon the streets near the depot, began the line of march through the beautiful village. Every available seat upon the sidewalks, house-tops and limbs of trees was occupied by spectators. The waving of flags, the huzzas from the crowd, and the hearty welcome poured from old and young were acknowledged by the veterans in oft-repeated cheers for the ladies and patriotic decorations. Along School, Main, Silver, South and other streets, the completed and tasteful displays were almost innumerable. Upon every hand were to be seen flags of all nations, and arches bearing patriotic mottoes. The music from bands playing old-fashioned tunes as the pageant moved along resounded through the sides of the surrounding mountains.

This was the most imposing procession ever seen in Vermont. It was over three miles in length, numbered at a fair estimate 40,000 people, and was witnessed by 25,000 people. The noticeable parts of the procession were the marching of the First Regiment, N. G. of Vermont; the appearance of the Putnam Phalanx, composed of an elderly, solid class of men of Hartford, and the soldierly appearance of the New Hampshire troops and the Vermont veterans. These latter drew cheer after cheer, and the enthusiasm reached its climax when a body of 300 with a banner inscribed "Spunky Lamoille," made its appearance. When the veterans passed the triumphal arch, hearty cheers were given. An attractive feature, also, of the procession were the Amoskeag Veterans, who were as enthusiastically cheered by the citizens as were the home troops.

ARRIVAL AT CAMP STARK.

When the head of the column reached the entrance to Camp Stark, an immense throng were there to welcome it. Governor Fairbanks who occupied a ladeau, drawn by four magnificent horses, was welcomed. The barouche conveying Gen. Banks, Hon. Frothingham, Geo. B. Loring, and Hon. W. H. H. Bingham, was received with loud cheers. Also, the barouche conveying Governor Connor of Maine and General Cilley."

The Chief Marshall and Staff escorted His Excellency Horace, Fairbanks, Vermont's Centennial Governor and all distinguished guests to the place assigned them. * * The Orator's tent was nearly filled when the distinguished guests arrived. * * Hon. Wm. M. Evarts came in advance of the Presidential party, from his Windsor residence; Governor Fairbanks; Ex-Governors Hall, Fletcher, Stewart, Smith; Senators Edmunds and Morrill; Honorable L. P. Poland, E. W. Stoughton; Governors Prescott, Connor, Van Zandt; Generals Hawley, Banks and Robinson; with some fifty other prominent men occupied seats on the platform.

Hon. E. J. Phelps, President of the Vermont Centennial Commission and of the day, introduced Rev. Isaac Jennings, who offered the opening prayer. President Phelps then made an eloquent address to the invited guests.—He stated that the State of Vermont commemorated the one hundredth anniversary of her birth and the happy and prosperous termination of the first century of her existence as an independent State. To-morrow they would signalize one of the most important victories of the Revolution. To-day was devoted to the victories not less renowned—not less fruitful—the victories of peace. (Applause.) To all assembled there, whether as friends or strangers, to the distinguished guests, to all the children of Vermont, from near or far, gathered to honor the centennial birthday of their native land, he was charged to extend a kindly, a courteous, a generous welcome. (Applause.) Richer States might tender more splendid hospitalities, more imposing ceremonies—theirs were plain and simple as befitted the habits of their people. The day was consecrated to the memories of the men who have laid broad and deep foundations of free institutions. Not only were they there to honor the leaders, but the rank and file, who unheralded and unknown, gave to the State the best they had. Without their virtue and patriotism the master spirits would have planned and toiled in vain. That noble race have passed away, and some of their immediate descendants were among their welcome guests. The speaker, after paying an eloquent tribute to the valor of the sons of Vermont, concluded amid enthusiastic plaudits.

Mrs. Julia C. R. Dorr's fair poem, Vermont, followed the address, finely read by Professor J. W. Churchill of Andover[Mass.]; then the able orator of the day, Hon. Daniel C. Roberts of Burlington; after which brief addresses were made by Gens. Hawley and Banks; Ex-Govs. Harriman, Connor, Van Zandt, and others; letters were read from the Gov. Gen. of Canada, John G. Whittier, Gen. Sheridan, George Wm. Curtis, Rev. Dr. Chapin and others; the literary exercises being intermingled with music by the Band of Winooskie and the Fisherville, (N. H.) Band." Such was the glory of the day of the victories of peace.

EVE BEFORE THE SECOND DAY.

About half past three, the 1st Reg. N. G. Vt., Col. Peck, and the N. H. militia forming a brigade, Gen. J.M. Clough, commanding, marched down from Camp Stark, bands playing, colors flying, and were drawn in line at the depot to receive the President.

At Troy the President was met by Colonel George A. Merrill, Vermont Cen. Com. and Col. Harrington, who went down from Bennington in the morning. At Hoosack Junction, Adj. Gen. Peck greeted the President and in behalf of the Governor welcomed him to the State. At North Bennington, when the train pulled up at the station there were hundreds of people who came down from distant points back of the railroad to welcome the Chief Magistrate.

At 3.40, the long whistle announced the approach of the train at Bennington. The train stopped in front of the depot. The President stepped out upon the platform accompanied by Governor Fairbanks and passed to an open brouche drawn by four spirited horses. The troops saluted the President, who rose with uncovered head and acknowledged the greeting. Men cheered, ladies waved their handkerchiefs; the crowds were enthusiastic. Following the President came Mrs. Hayes and Miss Waite, escorted by Cols. Merrill and Harrington; Atty. Gen. Devens, Secretary McCrary, Postmaster General Key, Mr. Webb C. Hayes and the gentlemen, accompanying the President, all of whom entered carriages in waiting, which fell into line between the Vermont troops and New Hampshire militia. The column moved through River, North and Main streets to Bennington Centre, and halted at the residence of Rev. Mr. Tibbets, who entertained the President during his stay in Bennington.

About 9 o' clock, p. m. the President accompanied by Governor Fairbanks, arrived at the Walloomsac House and in the brilliantly lighted parlors surrounded by a detail of the National Guard, Col. Harrington, Aid, took position to receive the people. The Ransom Guard Band struck up a lively air, outside, the hotel and the impatient visitors from without were admitted. For two hours an almost endless crowd of people, old and young, rich and poor, crippled and infirm, passed before the President, heartily shaking his hand, while from without fireworks could be seen illuminating the heavens in almost every direction."— "Very many private residences were illuminated throughout the town." All was joyance. "It was nearly midnight when the distinguished visitors left for their abodes. Out of thirty thousand visitors that day, ten thousand people slumbered within the precincts of Bennington, while the neighboring towns were full.

MORNING OF THE BATTLE ANNIVERSARY.

"While darkness yet shrouded the historic Village of Bennington, a distinguished party, civic and military, from the old Bay State, arrived by special Pullman train at the Centennial grounds. On the 16th of Aug. 1777, this grand old Commonwealth was also at Bennington,—three hundred of her sturdy, Berkshire mountain patriots 'came up' while the Vermonters 'came down,'—as Sheridan did at Winchester—and drove back the invaders.—Massachusetts has a grateful remembrance of that great victory. Governor Rice sent his representative, Lt. Gov.

Knight, with about 200 of the legislature escorted by Boston Cadet Corps, the Governor's Body Guard for more than a hundred years; with their splendid band of 26 pieces.

The thunder of artillery reverberated through the valley of the Walloomsack at sunrise—from the four cannon taken from the British, fired by the Portsmouth artillery. The bells joined their voices. * * * Tibbets Corps of Troy, veteran soldiers, accompanied by Doring's celebrated Band arrived early in the day;" and the Burleigh Corps from Whitehall in time for the grand procession.

"Governor Fairbanks with a retinue of carriages drove from his headquarters on the centennial field out to the Mt. Anthony home of the American President. * * On the open grounds which make the pleasant little park between the Walloomsac House and the old burial grounds where heroes and Hessians have slept for a century side by side, Col. Peck's full Regiment of the National Guard of the State were in line, with arms at "present" to receive the Nation's Executive. There can be no better pageant produced in imagination than the march of the military escort accompanied by their distinguished guests, from the historic street of "Old Bennington Hill" down the hillside highway to the village in the Walloomsac valley where the cavalcade of thousands of soldiers, veterans and citizens were forming. * *—Chief Marshall Valentine "had massed in divisions" five thousand and more soldiers, citizens, bands, batteries and organizations, on foot, mounted and in carriages, who were to form the grandest cavalcade that ever passed through a New England city or village."

For a minute description of the grand procession, see Forbes' book, pages 47, 45, 46, 47, 48.

"From the depot the procession commenced its triumphal march through Bennington Main street. Over the street the festoonry of every description, triumphant arches, mottoes of welcome and the emblazonment of gorgeous and patriotic display met the marching thousands along its whole length. Nearly every house was decorated; every portico and every verandah was filled with welcoming guests, scattering bouquets and waving handkerchiefs. * * President Hayes rode with Governor Fairbanks, * * his reception in Vermont, and his ride in the procession partook of the nature of a triumph; enthusiasm ran wild, deafening cheers greeted him in a continuous roll along the entire route. As the day before, the crowd was thickest at the grand arch, the cheers most deafening. * * There were 3000 veterans in line to-day; as each company passed the triumphal arch the people raised their hats. Col. Hooker riding at the head of the Windham County Battallion, and Col. R. V. Randall in command of "Spunky Lamoille" veterans, drew attention second only to the Presidential party. Many officers in the service during the Rebellion were recognized and loudly applauded as they passed by. The Legislature of Vermont and New Hampshire walked the entire distance traversed by the procession which called out many reminiscences concerning the men who came on foot to the same spot a hundred years ago.

When the procession arrived at the centennial field it passed in review before the President. The President welcomed the procession, * * he congratulated the State of Vermont upon the felicitous beginning and progress of this centennial occasion. * * *

Mr. Key and Mr. McCrary were introduced by the President and spoke briefly; the President then introduced a grand-daughter and two great-grand-daughters of Gen. Stark, and Mr. Everts introduced Mrs. Hayes; and after were speeches, poems, music and toasts. The venerable Rev. Allen of North Woodstock, Ct., grandson of fighting Parson Allen," opened with prayer and the welcome address was by Governor Fairbanks, as follows:

"Mr. President, and Ladies and Gentlemen:— It is well, and we are glad that this memorable occasion should be honored by the presence of citizens and the chief executive officers of so many of our States, and especially by the President of the United States and his Cabinet. The heroic deeds of the hundred years ago were not done to achieve the independence or liberty of any one colony or State, but to achieve the liberties of America. Fellow citizens of this great Republic and patriot soldiers, lovers of human rights and liberties, in behalf of the State of Vermont, I bid you a most hearty and cordial welcome to these commemorative services and hallowed associations, well, will it be if from them we catch and carry away in some measure the same patriotic devotion to all freedom which inspired those brilliant heroes on yonder battle field, one hundred years ago."

Gov. Fairbanks was followed by the Orator of the Day, President S. C. Bartlett of Dartmouth College. [For extract see Forbes p. 53, for full address, official record by the Bennington Battle Monument Association.] After the oration came the poem of William Cullen Bryant and short speeches by the President and his Cabinet.

THE BANQUET:—Plates laid under a series of tents in form of a Greek cross for 3500 persons; tables loaded with meats, fruits, delicacies; ornamented with bouquets of brilliant flowers,—decorated with flags,—bunting, a huge American ensign over the presidential seat. President and party entered at 3.25: The President escorting Mrs. Gov. Fairbanks, Mrs. Hayes attended by Gov. Van Zandt of Rhode Island; E. J. Phelps, Esq., Pres. Ben. Bat. Monu. Asso., presiding; receiving, later, from President Hayes the compliment “for dignity, grace, culture and admirable wit, he excelled any presiding officer that he had ever met. The dinner was abundant and enjoyable; the tables were waited on by young ladies, their badge of office a pretty ribbon on which was inscribed “Mollie Stark.”

President Phelps lead with a brief opening speech, to the point, and read a letter of Lord Dufferin of Canada, of regret not to be there; a band played an English national anthem.

Mr. Evarts followed Mr. Phelps.—He “closed his speech by referring to the fact that had been brought to the notice of the people by a distinguished writer (Artemas Ward) who had declared himself willing to sacrifice on the altar of his country all of his wife’s relations, but John Stark went farther than that for, he declared himself willing to sacrifice his wife’s husband.” (Laughter.)”

Governor Prescott of New Hampshire followed, who spoke at length.

“We come,” he said, “with full numbers to this centennial occasion.”

Then, Hon. W. Stoughton, of New York: “If the men who fought Bennington Battle could have looked forward to this day and seen themselves enthroned in the affections of forty millions of people, they would have felt that all the sacrifices, all the slain, all that went to secure a victory that was dear to them on that field, was well repaid by this day.”

Governor Fairbanks, Senator Edmonds, Postmaster General Key, Atty. General Devens made short speeches.

Mr. Phelps then said in the absence of the Treasurer of the United States, who was probably like the king in the nursery song, “busy counting out his money,” and getting ready for special payment, he would call upon one who was fit to be treasurer, Senator Justin S. Morrill, and Mr. Morrill responded:

“I have always pitied one who was so unfortunate as not to be born in Vermont, and, especially, those not having a share in Bennington Battle. I trust that we shall all rally to every call as to the sound of the trumpet which calls us to commemorate these virtues of the people of our States.”

Speeches were also made by Thomas Allen of St. Louis, Lieut. Gov. Rice of Massachusetts and President Bartlett of Dartmouth College, and letters were read from the Governor of Texas, Arkansas, Georgia, Tennessee, Virginia, Kentucky, Mississippi, Indiana and North Carolina; Gen. Garfield of Ohio and some thirty others. It was past six p. m. when the banquet concluded by the rendering of a volunteer poem entitled “Parson Allen’s Ride,” by Wallace Bruce of Poughkeepsie.

After the banquet the Boston Corps, Thos. F. Edmunds, commanding, held a dress parade on the review grounds.

their precision of movement was admired by thousands. As soon as the dusk of night favored, camps Ethan Allen and Stark were illuminated by fires and torchlights, interspersed with thousands of Chinese lanterns, calcium lights, transparencies, etc. etc.; the camps of the veteran, Fuller's Battery, the Estey, Park and Ransom Guard brilliant in the extreme; and Hooker's headquarters was the object of universal admiration. In addition to the 500 Chinese lanterns, pyramids of light, and display of transparencies, which were the especially admired feature of the camp illuminations. Directly in front of the officers tents and parallel with the color lines, the triangular transparencies, stretching to the farthest camp location were the likenesses of Washington, Lincoln, Grant, Hayes, Stark, Ethan Allen, Evarts, Devens, Custar, Sedgewick, Sheridan, Sherman, Generals Baldy Smith and Brooks.

The evening was a very brilliant one in Bennington Village, every house was thrown open and nearly every house was illuminated with Chinese lanterns, transparencies, and patriotic devices. The midnight hour proclaimed from the church tower did not put a quietus on citizen or soldier. Illuminations and fireworks greeted the early dawn of Friday, as if protesting against the innovation of another day on a great anniversary occasion which had been so proud an one for Vermont; so replete with historic associations, and so fittingly and successfully commemorated for the past twenty-four hours.

During the night and early morning the veterans broke camp, Col. Hooker and his Windham County boys being the first to take up the line of march for "the seat of peace" at Brattleboro.

At Camp Stark the usual routine of duties to 11 a. m. when Fuller's Light Battery was reviewed by the Governor and his Staff who expressed the liveliest satisfaction with the Battery. They left for home at noon.

At 2 p. m. took place the annual review and inspection of the First Regiment, the National Guards of Vermont, Col. Peck commanding, by Gov. Fairbanks and his Staff, and the Colonel was highly complimented by the Governor on the increasing excellence the regiment was attaining year after year under his management and control. At the conclusion the Regiment held their daily dress parade before the Governor Friday evening,  witnessed and loudly applauded by a great concourse of people. Companies F I and G broke camp at an early hour Saturday, so as to hit the morning train to their homes; and the rest of the regiment left on a special train at 10 a. m.

[Thus far from Forbes. And it is due to the memory of the late Rev. Dr. Chapin of New York, who wrote years since to us that he sometimes felt almost as if he were a Vermonter; that the happiest years of his life were in Vermont, to inscribe here his tribute to Bennington Battle delivered on the steps of old Clio Hall when a student there, Aug. 16, 1837.

"BENNINGTON BATTLE."

BY EDWARD H. CHAPIN.

They came up at the battle's sound,
Stern, iron-hearted men,

They heard it as it thrilled along

The stream-side and the glen;

The dim, old mountains echoed back

That summons, wild and strong,

And the greenwood depths were stirred
As with a triumph song.

They came as brave men ever come,
To stand, to fight, to die;
No thought of fear was in the heart,
No quailing in the eye;
If the lip faltered, 'twas with prayer,
Amid those gathering bands,
For the sure rifle kept its poise
In strong, nntrembling hands.

They came up at the battle sound
To old Waloomsack height,
Behind them were their fields of toil
With harvest promise white;
Before them those who sought to wrest
Their hallowed birthright, dear,
While through their ranks went fearlessly
Their leader's words of cheer.

My men there are our Freedom's foes,
And shall they stand or fall?
Ye have your weapons in your hands,
Ye know your duty all;
For we this day will triumph o'er
The minions of the crown,
Or Molly Stark's a widowed one
Ere yonder sun goes down.

One thought of Heaven, one thought of home
One thought of hearth and shrine,
Then rock-like stood they in their might,
Before the glittering line.
A moment, and each keen eye paused
The coming foe to mark,
Then downward to his barrel glanced
And strife was wild and dark.

* * * * *

'Tis sixty years ago; and where
Are those brave yeomen now?
The clouds are heavy on the breast,
And dust is on the brow;
A few still linger with dimmed eyes,
And time-bleached locks of gray,
But they are passing one by one,
To their deep rest away.

The triumph of that conflict hour
With them will not depart,
The memory of that old red field
Is fresh within the heart.
'Twill live on very mountain side,
'Twill breathe in every glen,
And linger by the sepulchre
Where sleep those mighty men:

It needs no monumental-pile
To tell each storied name,
The fair green hills rise proudly up
To consecrate their fame;
True to their trust, Waloomsack long
The record bright shall bear
Of those who came up at the battle sound
And fought for freedom there.

A PORTRAIT OF GEN. STARK,

THE HERO OF THE BENNINGTON BATTLE, which has just come in from Springfield, Mass., from Mr. Clogston, from Mr. Eastman, "Sons of Vermont," for the 'Papers of Bennington Battle' in the Gazetteer. Thanks from the little office in Chicago: The Sons of Vermont do not lose their loyalty in the old Bay State, or in the Granite State. Welcome to valor! If any man ever had a right to a picture in Vermont History it is John Stark.—right here where he struck us will we place him,—that brave face in the glow of the Bennington Battle by Street.—See, just over in the midst of Street's Battle.

THE BATTLE OF BENNINGTON.

BY ALFRED B. STREET.

From Harper.

Famous the deeds by our fathers done!
List to the Battle of Bennington!

Stalwart in body and lion in heart,
The heroes that bore in that battle a part.

Oft did my grandsire tell the strife

Till the winter storms with the sounds grew rife.

The wind shrieked wild with tones of fear,
The hall was the musketry smiting my ear.

And the rusty old king's arm seemed to call
From the broad moose antlers against the wall.

'Twas at the close of a summer's day,
(One stormy night, I thus heard him say:)

All through the hours from early morn,
Had I been working in the corn;

And now I watched in the sunset glow
The shadows longer and stronger grow.

Leagues of forest that hid the day,
 Swept from my cabin of logs away.
 And naught of tidings e'er touched my ear
 From the wor'd lying dimly at distant sphere.
 I watched, as I said, by my cabin door,
 The sundown creeping the clearing o'er.
 A hawk was rounding a pine near by,
 Rousing the echoes with hoarsest cry.
 A deer was grazing down toward the brink
 Of the beaver dam brook for his sunset drink.
 My sire was leaving the lot on the hill;
 Of threescore and ten, but vigorous still;
 The household song of my wife rang free,
 Blent with my baby boy's frolic glee.
 All was contentment without alloy;
 I blessed the dear God in my grateful joy.
 What was the figure that just then broke
 Out from the shadow of a skirting oak?
 Hurried his footsteps and wild his air.
 Surely Hans Boorne was approaching there:
 "Rouse thee, John Arnold!" he panted quick,
 Swift were his gestures, his breath came thick—
 Thick with his haste, and he sank below;
 "Rouse thee, John Arnold, the foe, the foe!"
 We sat us down in the plumy brake
 And he told how Burgoyne had come up the Lake,
 Taken old Ti, and with two-fold might Won Hubbardton's desperate stand-up fight,
 And now was coming with bow and spear,
 To bring captivity far and near.
 As deep I listened my veins grew hot,
 And a battle field rushes o'er the sylvan spot
 The kine-bell changed to a weapon's clank,
 The rows of rye to the serried rank;
 And full in the midst was John Arnold's tread,
 With no fear in heart, but war's fever instead.
 Where shots blazed reddest his way he took,
 And his arm waxed weary with blows he strook.
 And I sprang to my feet with a ringing cry,
 "Hans Boorne, John Arnold will do or die;"
 I took the king's arm, the rust I cleared, Till its barrel like silver, smooth shining appeared;
 And left to my father the rifle, to slay
 The venison or panther chance prowling that way.

I clasped to my bosom my boy and wife,
 Then pointed my way toward the region of strife.
 Three days did I tramp by the moss on the bark,
 Three nights did my camp-fire jewel the dark.
 At last as the morning was beaming I won
 The beautiful meadows of Bennington.
 The little Walloomsack rippled along,
 Giving the wilderness song for song;
 And hasty trampling of men was there,
 The flag of my country high streaming in air.
 Old Stark was galloping to and fro,
 Wherever he hastened out-burst a glow:
 "There stand the red-coats! we'll smite them
 well
 And drive back the hounds to their kennels in hell.
 "None but cowards will slink away!
 Sons of the brave sires will fight to-day!
 For victory's banner shall fly o'er me
 Or Molly Stark's a widow, said he."
 A shout rolled upward of fierce acclaim;
 Each bosom burning with patriot flame,
 As blinked in the distance the red-coat ranks
 Our torrent of frenzy boiled over its banks;
 And we shook with our firing the valley's green lap;
 It was like one continuous thunder-clap.
 We stormed the heights where the Hessians stood,
 And made them red with their rascal blood.
 Not a cannon did give us aid
 As on us their deadliest batteries played.
 We swept the fierce Indian, a yelping pack—
 And sneaking Tory as leaves in our track.
 We beat them once and then Breyman up-bore;
 Brave rallied the foe and they fought us once more.
 But all in vain, for bold Warner too,
 Bore up, and for us, and we charged anew.
 Bear-skin helmet and plumed cap fell,
 Volley met volley, yell mixed with yell.
 The musket ball hissed and the rifle ball sang,
 And the screech of the cannon ball deafening rang.
 I saw through the black smoke the red-coats reel,
 And my heart at the brave sight grew harder than steel.

Engels, A. R. P. 1986

My Hiland Hall.

My trusty, old king's arm waxed heavy and hot,
And still I poured without stint my shot.
My wife seemed saying "John Arnold, fight on!"
And I heard through the conflict the voice of my son.

Still Stark went galloping up and down,
"Fight, fight the base red-coats, mean slaves of a crown!"

"Fight, fight my brave fellows, said he,
Or Molly, I tell ye, a widow shall be!"
With a shout that shook the sunset sky,
We dashed right on—it was conquer or die.
Where Stark's eye glittered, there withered our foes,

For there fell the might of our fearfulest blows.
The little Waloomsack blushed with red,
And hushed its song, for 'twas filled with dead.
And when night darkened, the air about,
hook with our victory's thundering shout.
Cannon and banners, and swords and guns.
And captives were tribute to Freedom's sons.
With the leader of all, bold Baum, who died,
As we rolled the loud cheers in our conquering pride.

Old Stark up-towered among us still,
"And Moll's no widow!" laughed he with a will.

And so, my boy, was the grim fight won,
Such was the Battle of Bennington.

HON. HILAND HALL.

BY HENRY D. HALL, ESQ.

Nathaniel Hall, the father of Hiland Hall, was a quiet, thrifty farmer and his wife, Abigail (Hubbard) Hall, a worthy and true help-meet. The emigrant ancestors of both were English. John Hall of the father and George Hubbard of the mother, after being over 15 years at Boston and Hartford, in 1750 became large landholders, and the first settlers of Middletown, Ct. In the old graveyard there may still be found the tombstones of some of their early descendants.

Nathaniel Hall was deacon of the old Baptist church at Bennington. He and his wife were both worthy and esteemed members of the church and respected members of society.

Dea. Nathaniel Hall came to Bennington in 1779. He was married to Abigail Hubbard at Norfolk, Ct., Oct. 12, 1794. Their children were:

HILAND, the oldest, subject of this sketch.

Phebe, died, 1860, aged 63.

Abigail, died, 1884, aged 85.

Nathaniel, died, 1846, aged 46.

Anna, died, 1869, aged 65.

Laura, died, 1854, aged 48.

Polly, the youngest, died in 1870, aged 62 years; all having married and leaving descendants.

Dea. Nathaniel Hall died in 1849, aged 86 years, and his wife in 1846, aged 78 years.

The early education of HILAND HALL was in the common schools of his neighborhood, and the better part of a three months term, one fall at the Academy in Granville, N. Y., which he would probably have rounded out, had he not been sick before the close of the term, the only sickness of his youthful days of which the writer remembers to have heard him speak, though he has heard him tell his children how his good mother, getting her children ready Sunday morning, and he making the excuse of not feeling well to stay at home, would seize the "picra bottle" and a tablespoon, and he would conclude to try to go to church. The sermons were in those days, two on every Sabbath, each at least, an hour or more in length.

The youth of Hiland Hall was spent on his father's farm in Bennington.

The following incident connected with his early schooling is from a memorandum by himself:

In the adjoining town of Shaftsbury, about a mile from my father's there was a Baptist meeting-house, and also a school-house in which schools were usually kept about three months in the winter by male teachers, and about as long in summer by females, for instruction in reading, writing and arithmetic, and for years no other branches had been taught. The teachers had generally been taken from the neighborhood, but when I was nine or ten years old, a winter teacher from abroad was employed, who on examining the progress I had made in those branches, told me I was forward enough to study grammar and advised me to do it. I had little idea what he meant by it, but supposed it would be right, and was willing to undertake it. He found another scholar, a girl 15 or 16 years old, who was spending the winter with her uncle, the Baptist minister, who wished also to pursue the study. The teacher said it would be necessary to have a book and gave me a memorandum of the title "Alexander's English Grammar," which was soon obtained at Troy, by my father who was going there with a load of wheat. The grammar was about the size of Webster's spelling-book and bound in boards like it; and we began the study. That branch of learning was new to the school-children and excited their attention and curiosity, and they went home to their parents full of information about the jargon of hard words that had been rattled off by the teacher and his two learners, such as nouns, pronouns, verbs, adverbs and others that they could not understand. This jumble of unmeaning words it was argued by some of the parents would greatly disturb the studies of the other scholars, and the question was raised, whether such teaching should be allowed in the school. There had been some dissatisfaction in the district at the employment of the stranger in preference to a local teacher who had applied for the place, and he with his friends seized upon this matter as the means of getting rid of a rival. They called a school meeting where the question of allowing grammar to be taught in the school was discussed. The minister with one or two others favored grammar, but the majority was against it, and it was voted that grammar should not be taught in the school, and that the teacher should be dismissed.

It went abroad that it was also voted that no teacher should be employed that understood grammar, but that was not true; no such vote as that was taken. The truth was disgraceful enough without this needless addition. The whole proceeding was, however, favorable to the progress of instruction in the district. The reaction of feeling by the pressure from without was irresistible. The opponents of grammar, themselves, became ashamed of what they had done, and the next year a teacher who was thought to be well qualified as a grammarian was employed, grammar was taught without objection, and no other ante-grammar outbreak was afterwards heard of."

He read when quite young all the books that he could find or borrow in the vicinity, his preference being for history and biography.

Mr. Hall, early in life, became interested in politics, favoring the Republican party. At eighteen, he was active in the formation of the "Sons of Liberty," a society of the young men of Bennington for a vigorous prosecution of the war with England—1812. He was one of the committee to draft the constitution of the Society and took a great interest in its meetings at which political questions were discussed. It continued in active life until after the war.

Among the patriotic acts of this society was the procuring from the ladies of the vicinity 158 pairs of mittens and 42 pairs of socks, which were in Jan. 1814. presented to the 11th Regiment of U. S. soldiers which had been largely recruited in Vermont, and was then stationed at Plattsburg, N. Y.

The Society existed during the war. Its record book, over 60 pages of foolscap size, is well preserved. Its last record is an account of its celebration of the Fourth of July 1815; at which there were an address, procession, dinner and 18 toasts, the number then of the States in the Union.

In 1824, 1828, Mr. Hall voted with the Republican party. In 1828, his party took the name of National Republican, which name was changed afterwards to Whig, to which party Mr. Hall belonged till in 1856, it was merged in the new Republican party, a name under which he begun his political life.

He studied law and was admitted to the Bennington County Bar, December, 1819. He established himself in practice in his native town, which he represented in the Legislature in 1827. He was Clerk of the Supreme and County Court for Bennington County, in 1828; was elected the State Attorney for the County in 1829, for which he was re-elected for the next three years.

Of a generous disposition, easily turned aside when collecting his own bills, thinking but little of money for its own sake, but using it freely for the necessary comfort of his family, at this time increasing in numbers; and by answering calls of the needy and unfortunate,—a distinctive trait of his kindly character, an inability to turn away those who appealed for help, although he hardly knew where the next dollar was to come from; resulting in early becoming involved in his pecuniary relations, and for years living in a home heavily mortgaged, but which he was enabled to clear up in middle life, having never settled a debt at less than 100 cents on a dollar.

And another trait which tended to lessen his yearly income was the conscientious expression to his clients of his opinion of their cases, that prevented or stayed a prosecution that in some hands would have brought return fees, adding much to the income of an attorney; but gave confidence to those for whom he was engaged, as they never had reason to fear he would be tampered with by opposite council, or their cases in any way be jeopardized by him for want of integrity.

And the opinion obtained to quite an extent, that the side he was engaged on would prevail from the inherent justice it was undoubtedly possessed of.

In January 1833, he was chosen a representative in Congress to supply the vacancy occasioned by the death of Hon. Jonathan Hunt, and took his seat the 21st of that month, during the extraordinary excitement growing out of Mr. Calhoun's South Carolina nullification ordinance, and witnessed the failure of that first serious effort at disunion.

At the same election, Mr. Hall was chosen a member to the 23d Congress, which commenced, December 1834.—The district then comprised the counties of Bennington and Windham with seven towns in Windsor County, viz: Andover, Baltimore, Cavendish, Chester, Ludlow, Springfield and Weston. This district, he represented in Congress for ten successive years, receiving as a National Republican and Whig, five different elections by large majorities. His congressional service terminated, Mar. 3, 1843, he having declined being longer a candidate.

In Congress, Mr. Hall was a working rather than a talking member, but occasionally made political speeches;—among them one in 1834, against General Jackson's removal of the government deposits from the United States Bank, and another in 1836 in favor of the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands among the states, which measure was in effect consummated at that session in the distribution of surplus revenue, by which nearly $700,000 were received by the State of Vermont and added to the school funds of the towns of the state. Both of these speeches were pamphleted and extensively circulated, and the former was reprinted in New York prior to the succeeding state election as a campaign document.

CONGRESSIONAL COMMITTEE SERVICE.

But the speaking of Mr. Hall in Congress was in general of a business character, to influence the votes of members on pending questions. His work on committees, first on that of the post-office and post-roads, after on revolutionary claims, was onerous and severe, his printed reports covering several volumes of public documents. In 1836, while a member of the post-office, he presented a minority report in opposition to the message of the President and report of the Post-Master-General which had recommended the enactment of a law making it a penal offence to transmit by mail into any of the Southern states, printed matter against the institution of slavery, termed "incendiary publications." * * Showing the great difficulty and danger of such legislation, the report of Mr. Hall took the ground that it would be an infringement of the liberty of the press, and a violation of the constitution, which had conferred no power on Congress to look into publications and prescribe what opinions should and what should not be admitted into the mails, or be the subject of mail transmission. The report was signed by Mr. Hall and the Hon. George N. Briggs, afterwards the Governor of Massachusetts, but as the majority of the committee failed to make their report, it did not become a public document. It was however printed in the National Intelligencer at Washington, in New York and other papers.

Mr. Hall's services were especially important in committees and also in debate, in exposing wasteful and extravagant expenditures. While on the postoffice committee, he took an active and prominent part in framing and procuring the passage of the act of July 2d 1836 which made a radical change in the organization of the post-office department and provided an effectual system for the settlement of its complicated accounts by which an alarming series of frauds that had caused a very great drain on the treasury was broken up, and an honest and economical administration of its affairs inaugurated and secured.

MEETING VIRGINIA CONGRESS CLAIMS.

His successful efforts in relation to one class of claims deserves a more particular notice, as well, for the large amount involved, as for the powerful influence and bitter opposition he was obliged to overcome in exposing their unfounded and fraudulent character.

For several years there had been passing through congress with little opposition, numerous claims founded on alleged promises of the legislature of Virginia, or of the Continental Congress, to Virginia officers of the Revolutionary army some of them denominated Commutation Claims, some half pay and some bounty-land claims, but all depending upon similar evidence to sustain them. In satisfaction of these claims there had already been drawn from the treasury over three millions, nearly all of which had been paid for supposed services of deceased Virginia officers, and still, were pending before congress claims to the amount of more than another million, and their number and amount were continually increasing. By a patient and laborious examination of the Revolutionary archives in the department at Washington, with some information he derived from the public records at Richmond, he became satisfied that the great mass of the claims already paid was unfounded and those that were still pending were, if possible, still more worthless. In order to bring the subject fully before congress, he obtained the appointment of a select committee of which he was made chairman. He prepared a report unfavorable to the claims, which was approved by the committee and presented to the House, Feb. 27, 1839, with the usual motion that it be laid on the table and printed. Contrary to the uniform practice in such cases, the printing the report was vehemently opposed by the Virginia deligation. After obstructing the action of the House during the morning hour of that day, by dilatory motions and debate, they found the members impatient to order the printing under the previous question, upon which, as a last resort, Mr. Wise of Virginia called for the reading of the report, which by strict rule he had a right to require before voting upon it. The reading of the report was commenced and was continued through the morning hours of Feb. 28th and Mar. 1st, within two days of the close of the session, when the pressure of other business prevented its being finished.

Mr. Wise's unexampled hostile call for the reading, had its designed effect of smothering the report for that congress.

The next session of Congress, Mr. Hall became a member of the committee of Revolutionary claims, and soon afterward its chairman. Apr. 24, 1840, he made a report from that committee on the bounty land and commutation claims of the Virginians, similar to the one which had been suppressed at the close of the previous congress, which showed by authentic documentary evidence that every one of those allowances was unfounded. The efforts of the Virginians to obtain Revolutionary allowances, especially for officers' bounties under an old law of their state, being still continued, Mr. Stanley of North Carolina, June 10, 1842, offered a resolution directing the committee of Revolutionary claims to examine and report on their validity, which resolution he afterward modified by substituting a select committee for that on Revolutionary claims. This was done on complaint that Mr. Hall, the chairman of the standing committee, was unreasonably and unjustly prejudiced and would not give the claimants a fair hearing. On the 16th of June, Mr. Hall, having obtained the floor spoke an hour in vindication of his course in regard to the claims, showing by undoubted documentary evidence that they were all, collectively and individually, either wholly fraudulent or clearly unfounded on any Revolutionary service to sustain them; and he closed his remarks by presenting a list of the names of 64 claimants, whose claims amounted to over $200,000, and comprised all of the latest of those claims that had been recommended for payment by the Executive of Virginia, and were included in the bill then pending in the House.

He said every one of them was bad, and offered to abandon his opposition to the claims if any member would satisfy the House that any single claim was well founded. His remarks were commented upon by many of the Virginians, and among them Messrs. Goggin, Goode and Gilmer, in speeches of an hour each, which were all highly laudatory of the patriotism of Virginians and her Revolutionary heroism, but none of them ventured any attempt to show the validity of a single claim.

The speech of Mr. Gilmer in particular was of an aggressive and extremely personal character towards Mr. Hall, and was sharply replied to by him, in which his attacks were effectually repelled. Whereupon, Mr. Hall made a further exposure of the claims and showed that Mr. Gilmer, who had been governor of Virginia, had originated them by inducing the legislature of the state to recommend their payment by congress when they were well known to be entirely worthless; that he had as agent of the half-pay claimants, whose claims were equally invalid, first presented them to congress, and that he was by a law of the state entitled to one per cent. on all that should be paid by the United States, on which he had already received over $12,000, and was entitled to a like allowance on all future payments. This debate occupied the morning hours of several days, and having the numerous delegation of Virginia on one side and a single member from another state on the other and being in a great degree of a personal character, attracted very general attention. The vindication of Mr. Hall, which was full and complete, and overwhelming to his assailants, was listened to with unusual interest, and was also the subject of general newspaper notice and comment.

Ex-president Adams, who was a member of the House at the time, mentions the debate in his diary as follows:

"June 16th 1842. Stanly moved the appointment of a select committee to investigate the expenditure on account of Virginia Military Bounty land warrants from which sprang up a debate, and Hiland Hall opened a hideous sink of corruption until he was arrested by the expiration of the morning hour.

June 21st. Gilmer growled an hour against Hall for detecting and exposing a multitude of gross frauds perpetrated in the claims relating to the Virginia land warrants.

"June 22d. Goggin scolded an hour against Hiland Hall, and W. O. Goode took the floor to follow him.

June 24th. W. O. Goode followed the Virginia pack against Hall. James Cooper moved the previous question, but withdrew it at the request of Mr. Hall, to give him opportunity to reply to the Virginia vituperation.

June 25th. Hiland Hall took the morning hour to flay Gilmer and the Virginia Military land warrants."

This thorough exposure of these claims, and the marked rebuff of their champions, followed as it soon after was by a full history and condemnation of them in detail in a report by Mr. Stanly's select committee, operated as a final extinguisher of them.— Mr. Hall was a member of the select committee, and the report had by direction of the committee, been prepared and made to the House by him.

* * * * *

For an account of the claims and correspondence in full, see report No. 485, second session, 27th Congress.— It is believed there were few or no further allowances by the department.

Mr. Hall was Bank Commissioner of Vermont for four years from 1843, Judge of the Supreme Court for the like period until 1850, when he was appointed Second Comptroller of the United States Treasury, his duties being to revise and "finally adjust" all accounts with the government of officers and others in the War and Navy departments after they had been stated and passed upon by the second, third and fourth auditors. A claim came before him founded on an expenditure that had been ordered by the head of a department which he thought was illegal, and the question arose whether he had authority to reject it. It was insisted in behalf of the claimant that the Secretary being his superior officer and representing the President, the comptroller was bound by his approval and had no power to disallow it. In support of this doctrine a labored written argument was presented, and it appeared to be sanctioned by the published opinion of three former attorney generals. On full examination of the statutes Mr. Hall came to the conclusion that judicial authority had been designedly conferred on the accounting officers as a check upon lavish expenditures in the departments, and it was as much their duty to disallow claims not sanctioned by a law, as it was of a court of justice. The question being one of importance, the opinion of the Comptroller was published in pamphlet and it is understood has since been accepted and followed in the several departments, as a just exposition of the law on the subject, and recently a second edition of the same has been printed for the use of the Departments.

In 1851, at the solicitation of President Fillmore, he accepted the office of Land Commissioner for California, his associates being Gen. James Wilson of New Hampshire and Judge Harry I. Thornton of Alabama. The duties of the commission were to adjust the claims to land under the treaty of Mexico, the titles of the owners as recognized by the Mexican laws having been guaranteed to them by that treaty. Mr. Hall was chairman of the commission and had charge of its funds, which he disbursed for its necessary expenditures which amounted to several hundred thousand dollars; all of which was duly accounted for at the Treasury Department.

The contested land claims brought into full use the fitting qualifications which his habits of thought and investigation through life had developed.

Among the cases brought before this commission many of which were of great importance was the famous Mariposa claim of Gen. J. C. Fremont, involving millions of dollars, and in the adjustment and settlement of which the application of law involved, included almost without exception all points that would be liable to arise in the adjudication of similar claims. The opinion of the commissioners was in this case written by Mr. Hall, and the points were so fully and clearly elucidated, that many eminent jurists have written him expressing their admiration of the document.

On the accession of President Pierce, new commissioners were appointed, and Mr. Hall at the solicitation of his son-in-law, Trenor W. Park of the firm of Halleck, Peachy, Billings and Park, then a prominent law firm in San Francisco, remained with them for a time as general adviser, and to assist in the preparation of briefs and other important law papers. In the spring of 1854, he returned to Vermont, and resuming his residence on the farm in Bennington on which he was born, retired from the further practice of his profession.

Mr. Hall was a member of the convention which met at Philadelphia in 1856 and gave the Republican Party a national character, by nominating candidates for the presidency and vice presidency. In 1858 and 1859 he was elected Governor of the State by that party by a large majority.

The Governor in his first message besides calling the attention of the legislature to the local affairs of the State, spoke in decided condemnation of the then recent attempt of the majority of the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, in furtherance of the wishes of President Buchanan and his advisers to fasten upon the country by judicial sanction the new and extraordinary doctrine that the constitution itself legalized slavery in the territories and that congress consequently had no power to prevent its introduction. — The language of the message in regard to this assumed action of the court was as follows:

"With a strong habitual reverence for judicial authority, when exercised within its appropriate sphere for the determination of individual rights, I confess, I have not a high regard for it, when sought to be extended to political questions. The history of our parent country furnishes many examples of judges, learned and eminent, whose extra judicial opinions were sought and obtained by the government for the purpose of crushing out the rising spirit of liberty among the people. Indeed for the character of the judicial ermine it is to be lamented, that judges of distinguished legal attainments have often been found giving countenance to oppression and wrong by ingenious and fanciful constructions and that English liberty has been fixed upon its present firm foundations, not by the aid of judicial efforts, but by overcoming them. There is reason to hope that the extra-judicial opinions of the judges in the Dred Scott case, contrary as they are to the plain language of the constitution, to the facts of history and to the dictates of common humanity, will meet the fate which has attended those of the judges of the parent country, and that liberty will be established in spite of them."

In his last message in 1859, he thus announces his determination to retire from further public service:

"In closing this my last annual message, I cannot withhold the expression of my grateful thanks to the freemen of the State for the confidence which they have on all occasions so generously manifested towards me; and I beg to assure them that in retiring from public life at the end of the present political year, I shall carry with me the warmest and most heartfelt wishes for the continual prosperity of the State, and for the welfare and happiness of its people."

He, however, consented to act as one of the commissioners to the fruitless "Peace Congress" which on the call of Virginia assembled in Washington in February 1861, on the eve of the Rebellion, and was chairman of the delegation from Vermont.

On the breaking out of the Rebellion in 1861, he felt it his duty to do all in his power to uphold the integrity and unity of the government, and his time, energies and means, to a large extent, were from the first devoted to aid in crushing it.

He at once favored the speedy forwarding of men, and assisted in the formation of companies, volunteering assistance to some families which would be left behind in needy circumstances, drawing the pay; taking care of money coming from or being sent to soldiers, and when bounties were paid, in the placing in the safest manner such money that it should best meet the wants of the enlisting party; all showing a deep interest in the preservation of the Union, the value of which in his estimation was increased, no doubt, by intimate association for a long period in Congress with such statesmen as Webster, Clay, Adams, Giddings, Stevens and a host of others, when the doctrine of nullification or disunion was being advocated by Calhoun and his associates, that slavery and state rights might be sustained and perpetuated. His anxiety continued during the war and not until the surrender at Appomattox Court House, did he feel that his or the vigilance of any other man should in the least relax.

One of his sons, Nathaniel B., was Major of the 14th Regiment of Volunteers, and in the Battle of Gettysburg. He sent substitutes for four other sons and himself when the need for men seemed imminent, and the bounty had reached $400. each, besides the State pay and bounty.

In American history, Mr. Hall had a deep interest, and especially in that connected with the territory and State of Vermont.

He was for 6 years from 1859, President of the Vermont Historical Society and was afterwards active in the preparation and the arrangement of materials for the two published volumes of its collection, and in otherwise promoting its usefulness and success.—He has read several papers at meetings of the Society which have been published, among them, one in 1869, in vindication of Col. Ethan Allen as the hero of Ticonderoga, in refutation of an attempt made in the Galaxy Magazine to rob him of that honor.

He has contributed papers to the New York Historical Magazine, to the Vermont Historical Gazetteer, to the Philadelphia Historical Record, and also to the New England Historic Genealogical Register. His contribution to the Vermont Gazetteer, made in 1860, being a summary history of his native town, Bennington.

In 1860 he also read before the New York Historical Society a paper showing "Why the inhabitants of Vermont disclaimed the jurisdiction of New York, and established a separate government."

In 1868, his "Early History of Vermont," a work of over 500 pages was published by J. Munsill, Albany, in which the controversy of its early inhabitants with New York, and their struggle for the establishment of their state independence, as well as their valuable services in the cause of their common country during the Revolutionary war, are largely treated, and the necessity of their separation from the government of New York, in order to maintain the title to their land and preserve their liberty is very freely shown.

Governor Hall was very prominent in his exertions to have a suitable celebration of the Battle of Bennington and for the erection of a creditable monument to the heroes of the victory, and in securing for both the favorable action of the state legislature, and also in subsequently promoting their successful accomplishment. A few months before the celebration in 1877, he prepared a clear and full description of the battle with an account of its important consequences which was extensively published in newspapers and pamphlets, a copy of which has a place in the official account of the Centennial Celebration.

The University of Vermont in 1859 conferred on him the degree of L L. D. He was a life member and Vice President for Vermont of the New England Historic Genealogical Society, honorary member of the Buffalo and corresponding member of the New York Historical Societies.

THE GOLDEN WEDDING

of the HON. MR. & MRS. HILAND HALL was celebrated at North Bennington, October 27, 1868, from 2 to 5, P. M. Golden Wedding Geusts, about three hundred present: An early teacher of Mr. Hall, aged 85 years; two who were present at the first wedding, respectively aged 73 years, 69 years.— It appears Mr. Hall's was the fourth generation to which successively had been permitted a golden wedding by a kind Providence.

Rev. Isaac Jennings was present, offering a prayer and reading Proverbs the 31st chapter from the 10th verse "with personal reference to Mrs. Hall, the beautiful appropriateness of which was warmly accorded by those present, an illustration of verses 19 and 20, being the scores of socks knit by her from yarn spun by herself and sent in the packages with other comfortable things to the soldiers in front during the war.

The sixtieth anniversary of their wedding came Sunday, October 1878, their ages being respectively 83 and 86. Crowned with another decade of years since the grand anniversary, still more venerable and happy, this precious anniversary was observed by attendance on divine services at the Congregational Church in North Bennington of which Mrs. Hall was a member. A very beautifully arranged basket of flowers was upon the table in front of the pulpit, the gift of very dear friends. At the close of the sermon allusions were made to the unusual length of time they had been permitted to live together, and fitting remarks were made, tending to impress the sacredness of the marriage relation.

The parents of Mrs. Hall, Henry Davis and Mary Tuttle lived together sixty years, less three days.

Mrs. Hall had patriotic blood in her veins. Her father was a Revolutionary hero. He enlisted before he was seventeen into the Revolutionary service. He was at the Battle of Bunker Hill under Colonel Stark, at the line of fence where the enemy were repeatedly repulsed with great loss and also, served at West Point at the time of Arnold's treasonable attempt to surrender it to the enemy; serving in the Revolutionary war over three years.

Mrs. Hall, as a woman, was remarkable for strength of mind and personal beauty, and in company drew attention by her high social qualifications. She enjoyed the confidence and esteem of her neighbors and friends, and richly deserved the approbation she received for her successful management in the raising so large a family, mostly boys, her husband during the formation period of their lives, being so much absent upon public, official business. She never grew old in her feelings, but entered into the sports of her children with a zest which carried them with her in the object in which she considered such pastimes should be indulged in, though a dignity was always maintained in the most familiar recreations which tended to elevate.

The wants of the needy received her attention, and by her benevolence and uniform efforts she did much to enhance the comfort and happiness of others. For nearly fifty years she was an exemplary member of the Congregational church in Bennington, and died confidently trusting in the Christian's hope.

THE NINETIETH BIRTHDAY (July 20, 1885.)

of the now very venerable Governor was celebrated at the residence of his grand-daughter, Mrs. J. G. McCullough and her husband, Gen'l. McCullough, there being present fifty-one of his descendants, while five more were detained from the pleasant gathering.

The difference in the ages of the oldest and the youngest was 89 years and 8 months. The Bennington Banner of July 23d says of the occasion:

"None seemed to enjoy themselves more than he whose birthday anniversary was thus celebrated. Although having reached this advanced age, he still retains his bodily health and vigor, with all his mental faculties unimpaired.

Congratulations flowed in, in large numbers, in many instances accompanied by floral offerings, a great portion coming from friends at Bennington Centre, where the recipient spent the larger part of his business and public life. These offerings, seemed specially grateful to him, coming as they did from his old neighbors and their descendants. An elegant basket of fruit and flowers from a niece in Boston was specially admired. Tables were spread in the spacious dining-room and hall, and all were seated and entertained with a banquet which did credit to the well-known hospitality of the host and hostess, the venerable Governor presiding at the board, and enlivening it with his humorous remarks. At each plate were cards whereon a skillful and loving hand had sketched in water colors a faithful picture of the old homestead, and its annexes still standing, and upon each card a striking photographic likeness of the common ancestor.

The repast being ended, the Governor addressed his assembled descendants with an interesting talk which will ever be remembered by them, and which brought the sons and grandsons, by blood and marriage, one after another to their feet, in a lively encounter of wit and fun. The evening closed with pleasant chat and social enjoyment, when the guests departed, every one feeling that it was good to be there, and wishing that the useful and honored life of their beloved ancestor might be long spared to them and to his many friends."

Governor Hall died in Springfield, Mass. at the home of his son, Charles, with whom he was spending the winter, Dec. 18, 1885. He retired, apparently, in usual health on the night of the 17th and was heard in the morning to open the register for more warmth as was the custom, when a fall attracted the attention of the family; on going to the room, he was unable to rise, but gave directions for the caring for himself. He lived about two hours, the machinery of the body seemingly having worn out, he being in his 91st year. His remains were taken to Bennington and interred in the cemetery at Centre Bennington, where he had for years previously, a lot prepared, where his beloved wife and most of his descendants, deceased, have been buried.

H. D. H.

FROM THE BENNINGTON BANNER of the following week,—after the funeral of Governor Hall,—omitting generally, what has already been given in the biography.—Ed.

"Within a day or two" of his death, "autograph letters had been received by the family here, and that morning, his grand-daughter in New York, Mrs. Gen. J. G. McCullough, was in receipt of one stating that he expected to be at her house, as usual, on Christmas day. In the postscript, he humorously announced the birth of his 22d great-grand-child." "The day before his death, he visited his son's store"—in Springfield, Mass.—and in the evening he wrote concerning business. On Saturday," the 19th, "his remains were brought to North Bennington. On Monday morning, the obsequies were attended from the residence of Gen. McCollough . . . a large number going over to North Bennington on a special train, and people from all the surrounding towns and from Rutland being present. The Bar of the County attended his funeral in a body; the Rev. Isaac Jennings officiated. The hymns were sung by Mr. and Mrs. N. B. Hall and John V. Hall. The four sons acted as bearers and laid the remains carefully and tenderly away in the confident expectation of a blissful resurrection.

"Henry Clark of Rutland contributes: "In all the relations Gov. Hall has sustained to the country or state he has acquitted himself with credit.— As a judge, he was learned, upright and impartial; as member of the Mexican claims in California, he saved the government millions of dollars . . . He retired, as he supposed, to his farm in Bennington in 1854. When the Republican party was born, 1854, 1856, Governor Hall's retirement came to a sudden end, and he represented Vermont in the first National Convention of the Republican party, which assembled in Philadelphia in 1856 and placed in nomination its first presidential ticket "Fremont and Dayton." He entered into the campaign with a will and was elected governor of this State in 1858, by the young party which was created to shape the destiny of this Republic during the crucial period of its history. . . In his first message to the State Legislature, it appeared as it had shone before in his public utterances, he had "views" upon the famous Dred Scott case, [page 96,] and was not like many others, afraid to utter them, although a Governor of a state could not officially effect anything other than to create public opinion. This was, moreover, a subject which was shunned by professional politicians." 'Throughout his whole career,' he was:

"Amid the faithless, faithful found,
In times that tried men's souls."

"In the death of this venerable and extraordinary man, Vermont loses one of its most honored in public life and most useful of her citizens. In all that pertained to the history of our State, there was not his equal living: in ability to use these vast stores of research, he had no superior. Having been in public life more than half a century, and constantly associated with the leading men of the nation, his school of observation was vast and varied. His early taste for local history was a passion through life, and his ever active and retentive memory made his mind a vast store-house of historic knowledge. He was acknowledged to be among the leading historians in New England.

Men will speak of his death, not as one of unexpected occurrence, nor with the feeling that such events usually inspire. Long has he been a living link between the past and the present, with one foot planted in eternity and one uplifted for a waiting step into the spirit-land,—while they have been glad at the lingering delay they have also waited for it in a kind of willing expectation, till they will go as pilgrims to his tomb with no wailing of broken hopes, but to cast the laurels of perpetual gratitude into his sepulchre."

Governor Hall's "Early History of Vermont" . . . is an almost invaluable work. It is and will continue to be in some form the standard text-book of Vermont's early times. The modest preface says: His aim has been to embody facts, and to state them with his views in intelligible language without making any pretensions to literary merit." Some of these "views" were to champion Ethan Allen, and to affirm the national importance of the Battle of Bennington, since conceded by all historians. Governor Hall wrote the record of Bennington in Mrs. Hemenway's Gazetteer of Vermont, and in that work there is a steel engraving of him in his prime. He also wrote for the Bennington Banner a "History of Bennington Battle" which was published during the centennial celebration and which is with contemporary portrait in Vermont's official pamphlet of the centennial. . . . A complete collection of his writings would form a valuable work.

Of his manhood's days is said: His life when not on official duty abroad was passed in his Bennington home, the centre of an unostentatious hospitality which embraced the judges and chief men of the State, as the old-time country living used to do. His associates on the Supreme Bench of Vermont, were Judges: Stephen Royce, Isaac F. Redfield, Milo L. Bennett, Daniel Kellogg, Charles Davis and Luke P. Poland.—The family residence is situated upon the original Hall farm [of Thomas, of Hiland Hall,] and both the present mansion and the former unpretentious cottage have witnessed many notable gatherings; we mention three: the golden wedding . . . to which all the elderly people in the vicinity were invited; the sixtieth anniversary, and the birthday reunion, July 20th of this year. [See before.]

The Bennington County Bar held an "In Memoriam" meeting at their Court House on the evening of his death. Several members spoke briefly and feelingly. They voted to attend his funeral as a body and appointed a committee of six to draft resolutions of respect to be submitted to a meeting to be held at Manchester, at the call of the Chair, during the June term. The Committee of Resolutions were:—Hon. Tarrant Sibley of Bennington Centre, Hon. A. L. Miner of Manchester, Hon. James K. Batchelder of Arlington, Hon. Loveland Munson of Manchester, Wm. B. Sheldon, Esq. of Bennington, Thos. E. Brownell, Esq. of Pownal.

OF THE FUNERAL SERMON

The Rutland Review said:

"Rev. Dr. Jennings, the intimate and long time friend of the deceased, delivered a markedly interesting discourse, reviewing his life, services and character. He briefly sketched his ancestry, the struggles of his youth—noting his public services in varied relations—and concluded with touching allusion to the beautiful home life with his children, grand-children and great-grand-children as he sat a patriarch among them. . . . The address was relieved of over-wrought eulogy, it was the simple narrative, descriptive of an eminent man—coming from the heart of an appreciative friend who stood as among the sincerest mourners there.—The eulogy could have come no more fittingly than from the heart and lips of Doct. Jennings, who knew Governor Hall's public and private life so well. At the conclusion of the discourse, a fervent, affectionate, tender prayer was offered."

MEMORIAL RESOLUTIONS

OF THE BENNINGTON HISTORICAL SOCIETY.

DRAFTED BY REV. ISAAC JENNINGS.

READ, AND ACCEPTED, AUG. 30, 1886.

Our duty as appointed to draft resolutions expressive of the loss sustained by this Society in the death of its President, Ex-Gov. Hiland Hall suggests to us affectingly at the first a special reference to his rare social characteristics. His intense individuality of judgement and conscience was combined to a remarkable degree with kind and friendly attentions to all. valuing friendship, grateful to others, incessant and unsparing in those things which go far to make up the warm and true relationship of mutual affection, esteem and love.

Secondly. That he was an instructive example to all of tireless and well-directed industry, without which he could not have accomplished all that he did. We direct attention to his unflagging exertions that we may have good reading for our youth, and for our readers in general; to his unwearied labors in arranging and supplying and preserving and perfecting as far as possible our important early local history—so rich in incidents so grand in action, and occupying so commanding a place in the formation and preservation of the National government.

Thirdly. The ethical spirit was a dominating principle in him. It lead him to love the right and the true as he understood it, and to take his position for the same, and to maintain it. In political life, in Congress, and in historical controversies, in the heat of debate, he did indeed shun the bitterness of the time, but he had strong conclusions of his own arrived at by a research which left no stone unturned, no nook or corner uninvestigated; and he did his duty accordingly. It was admirable and impressive to see his characteristic modesty and childlikeness of spirit, and yet, the indomitable purpose of truth, and duty rising with the occasion, growing more and more tenacious, unyielding and determined. But especially did the responsibilities and potencies of the civil state have a deep-felt power and charm for him. This fitted him so well for civil, public life, and lead him into it and onward and upward in it to the exalted public places of honor and trust in the gift of the State. This fitted him for making history as well as writing it.—We cannot doubt that had he lived in the days of Adams and Jefferson and Richard Henry Lee, he would have been an able and appreciated coadjutor with them in the use of his pen and of his earnest and inflexible voice and judgement in public councils for the cause of American independance; for he had the sentiment, penetration and the nerve and the heart of fire if need be for the patriot's supreme responsibility.

The duty of these resolutions is to note in the briefest compass, certain controlling elements in the character and life of the distinguished subject of them. We call special attention:

Fourthly, to his historic spirit. Governor Hall was a born historian—and it may be added with still more emphasis, a born Bennington and Vermont historian. In these words we have suggested what was pre-eminently the theme and passion of his studies, of his correspondence and other intercourse with intelligent and scholarly men and publishers and authors; the object of his visits to historical localities; the controlling subject of his thoughts, his researches and his literary life. This drew him to the meetings of historical bodies, to the libraries of the land where historical information suited to his purpose could be obtained. It made him the president and remarkably successful chief manager of the Vermont Historical Society for so many years. It gave him prestige and authority with historical societies elsewhere; notably, those of Boston, New York, and Washington.

His keen eye saw and his instinctive judgement comprehended the connection between the past, the present and the future; between principles adopted and their effect on the character and life of the community, the commonwealth and the nation for generations and ages to come. With the practised understanding and the patient and persevering interest of the true scholar, he studied the past. He possessed a true and absorbing interest in our leading men; in our solemn public crises; in our heroic undertakings; in our grand achievements; in our serious public questions and controversies and momentous issues.

We have felt justified in classing our illustrious fellow-citizen with the great men of our revolutionary period, who helped and did so much to make our National history. There is another resemblance, as it is marked, to two of them, namely, in that his life was protracted to an extreme old age which was passed in much happiness and comfort. The words used concerning them in this respect could be applied with propriety to the closing years of Governor Hall. Says Mr. Webster, respecting Mr. Jefferson or Mr. Adams, true alike:

"From the time of his final retirement from public life, Mr. Jefferson lived as became a wise man surrounded by his affectionate friends, his ardor in the pursuit of knowledge undiminished. With uncommon health and unbroken spirits he was able to enjoy largely the rational pleasures of life, and to partake of that public prosperity which he had so much contributed to produce.

There was that in them which office did not give and which the relinquishment of office did not and could not take away. In their retirement in the midst of their fellow citizens, they enjoyed as high regard and esteem as when filling the most important places of public trust."

We need not say how beautiful and appropriate these words of Mr. Webster are if taken out of their immediate connection in which he used them and applied to Hiland Hall. This it is that is the sad thought of his death, it has removed one whose long life up to its prime and far beyond was the fitting itself more and more for the invaluable tasks imposed upon it. But we bow without one complaining word to the over-ruling behests of an all wise and all righteous God, and desire humbly to record our gratitude for the remarkable preservation of the faculties of our friend—for the bright close of his life's day, whose sun went down at length full orb'd and unobscured.

REV. ISAAC JENNINGS.

BY HENRY D. HALL, ESQ.

(Compiled and arranged from notices in the Bennington Banner and other sources.)

The Venerable and most worthy Subject of this biography was born at Trumbull, Fairfield County, Ct., July, 24, 1822; while yet a mere lad, he removed to Derby in that State, and there his youth was passed.

He was educated in the old New England manner,—an admirable system by the way,—common school, preparatory and collegiate course, graduating from Yale in the class of 1837. The thoroughness of this education is apparent in all his future life. In the class of '37 were such men as the Hon. Wm. M. Evarts of New York, Chief Justice Morrison R. Waite of the United States Supreme Court, Hon. Edwards Pierpoint, the late Samuel J. Tilden and others. The fiftieth anniversary of this class this year was an occasion of note in college circles.—Mr. Jennings attended. The thoughtfulness of the pastor for his people appeared even amid the festivities of that occasion. His health was not good; expressions of doubt, as to his ability to endure the fatigue induced him soon after arriving in New Haven, to write the Editor of the Banner that his friends here might know . . . that he was feeling well and also to give an outline of what was to be the enjoyments of the commencement week.

As a key-note to Mr. Jennings future career, from the point of his entry upon active life; we copy here some rules of living with an explanatory note from one of his sons:

"The longer I live the more I feel the importance of adhering to the rules I have laid down for myself in relation to such matters:

1st. To hear as little as possible to the prejudice of others.

2d. To believe nothing of the kind till I am absolutely forced to it.

3d. Never to drink in the spirit of one that circulates an ill report.

4th. Always to moderate as far as I can, the unkindness which is expressed against others.

5th. Always believe that if the other side were heard a very different account would be given of the matter."

(The foregoing is a copy of a time-worn newspaper cutting which has been pinned up on one of Mr. Jennings' book cases, in his study, ever since his family can remember; probably for more than twenty years. and the rules there stated have always, it is believed been followed by him and are as characteristic as almost any other thing.—F. B. J.)

With collegiate honors fresh upon him, Mr. Jennings taught school in Washington, Conn. in 1837, '38. He had charge of the Hopkins Grammar School in New Haven, in 1839, 40. In this school, one of the students was Dr. Timothy Dwight, now the revered President of Yale University. Teaching as a profession was not so much thought of in this country at that day and therefore, Mr. Jennings soon left that calling for his preparation for the Christian ministry, studying theology at New Haven, and Andover, graduating at Andover Theo. Sem. in 1842.—We believe though earnest in his church work, he never lost his interest in schools. In Akron, O. where he commenced his ministry, becoming pastor of the Second Congregational Church of that city, June 14, 1843, the question of better schools was then being agitated. Coming from New England to this then comparatively new Western state, the young and energetic pastor was pained at the low state of the common schools of Ohio. He set about reform, and to his efforts were largely due the good results—the system inaugurated, that of the graded schools, now so common everywhere. In Akron he left so much of an impress upon their system of public education that he has since been styled in the Annual Reports of the Board of Education of that city, "The Father of our schools."

He was several years superintendent—to the satisfaction of all—of the schools for the town of Bennington. — In his annual report, Apr. 1, 1876, he gives the condition of each school building and the year's progress in every district. As a key-note to his high ideal of a teacher as the main instrumentality for the greatest improvement, we quote :

"The teacher is the main thing, more than school-house, more than wall-maps, globes and other appliances for illustration and other aid, though these are more than the house. Solve the problem of how to teach morality, by the teacher who is selected and employed. Let the teacher be conspicuous and influential in goodness, in refinement and honor, and conscience. How the memory of such teachers abides with us. They are bright spots in the retrospect of our childhood days, and the days of our early youth. There was a power in their intelligence, and goodness and kindness to us that made them to be treasured in our memories, and we ever love to think of them."

Feb. 17, 1847, Mr. Jennings was married to Miss Sophia Day, just prior to his removal to Stamford, Ct., where he had received a flattering call to an important church in his native State. Mrs. Jennings, who survives her husband, was born in Mansfield, O., July 31, 1826, and was married from the home of her parents, Mr. & Mrs. Matthias Day. Mr. Day was a native of New Jersey, his wife, Sophia, a daughter of Judge Loomis of Thetford, Vt. This union of two families was a happy one. In all her husband's life work, Mrs. Jennings has taken a lively interest and rendered most efficient help.

Mr. Jennings was installed in Stamford pastor of the first church where he remained 6 years and came to Bennington. Here the remainder of his life was passed.

His long pastorate in this town forms a beautiful picture of church life, where a people have been lead out and in like a shepherd and his flock, in a typical "hill-side New England parish," as we have heard Mr. Jennings, himself say of other churches and other societies. With repeated opportunities to go to larger fields, and no doubt, with offers of larger financial gains, he steadily refused to leave his people in historic Bennington, preferring to live and die among them. In so doing his life as a minister of the Gospel illustrates the possibilities for good consequent upon a more fixed tenure of the pastoral relation,—with our bustling and changing American life an idea almost blotted out; the true one in our estimation, shown by the exceptions, among which the present is most marked.

He succeeded such pastors as Rev. Drs. Absalom Peters, Daniel A. Clark, and Edward W. Hooker, among whom in culture and influence, he shone with lustre; and had for many years as associates, in the near village of Bennington, Rev. C.H. Hubbard, E.G. Reed and C. B. Halbert, D. D. with whom he ever sustained the most helpful and kindest Christian relations.

Mr. Jennings travelled in Europe in 1859. . . . He returned with fresh vigor and enlarged powers to his life work. As a clergyman he was a model pastor to an eminent degree. It takes a remarkable man to be the loved pastor of a Bennington church for a third of a century, and at its close, to retain he hold he had even then upon his people.

The "Memorials of a century" is probably the best known of any of Mr. Jennings writings. It will go down to posterity as a history of Bennington as well as that of the Old First Church. The pains-taking character of the historian is shown in the large amount of detail in the work. Genealogies are proverbially difficult to obtain, and many errors will invariably creep in, but the great value of the Memorials largely lies in this very characteristic, which is divested of mistakes to a wonderful degree. The sketches of the early settlers therein are written fearlessly and judiciously, and it is to be regretted that a revised edition was not published during the life time of the author.

Mr. Jennings was a frequent contributor to the religious press of his denomination, and a not unknown visitor in the local sanctum. The last writing he did was to prepare "An Abstract of Officials' Acts and Proceedings," of the Battle Monument Association, which was placed in the corner stone.

The people of all this vicinity have gathered in the Old Church to hear anniversary discourses from its pastor.

[One of the most remarkable pulpit efforts of Mr. Jennings was his Centennial Discourse delivered in the Old Church on its one hundredth anniversary, Jan. 4, 1863. The edifice was crowded to its utmost capacity. Singers from the several churches in town, assisted . . . and notwithstanding the discourse occupied more than two hours in its delivery, and when one hour had elapsed invitation was given by the speaker for those who might wish to retire from the audience, to do so, not an individual left the house until the conclusion. G. W. R.—]

HIS RELATIONS TO THE BENNINGTON BATTLE MONUMENT.

From the inception of the enterprise to erect a suitable battle monument, Mr. Jennings took great interest. He was a member of the Association and secretary of the Board of Directors.

HIS LAST PUBLIC ACT.

On the 16th of August, 1887, as the rays of the western sun shone out from cloud-rifts which had threatened rain, facing the east, "the source of light," a solemn stillness came over an immense throng of people as an aged clergyman stepped to the front to pronounce the benediction which was to close the ceremonies of the laying of the corner stone of the Bennington Battle Monument. The face was a familiar one to many of the thousands who thus paused to receive his last blessing. The picture will be engraved upon the minds of multitudes as they read these lines for it was the last public utterance ere those lips were sealed and the freed spirit sped away to Paradise. The occasion will be memorable. . . . This benediction closed the ceremonies of a Fraternity which inculcates the immortality of the soul and the resurrection of the body. All that had preceded the last act had been based upon this fundamental principle of the Christian religion. The halo of the rays of the departing sun was prophetic of the end so soon to come to one of the participators in this historic event. The ground upon which he stood was historic; that upon which the first 16th of August orator stood in 1778. Noah Smith was also a graduate of Yale. He had at that early day predicted that succeeding generations would know of the importance of the conflict of the then previous year, and in coming time would suitably mark the spot.

HIS LAST PASTORAL ACT was the marriage of one of his flock. September 6, 1853, he married James Manning and Jane E. Robinson, his first marriage in Bennington; Aug. 19, 1887, he married Harriet L. Morgan and A. Buel Sibley, his last pastoral act. His first funeral was that of Mrs. Pliny Dewey of Bennington Centre, who died, June 2, 1853, aged 72 years; the last that of Mrs. Benj. R. Sears, July 5, 1887.

THE CHILDREN of the Rev. Isaac Jennings family; six of whom and Mrs. Jennings, survive the death of Mr. Jennings.

Isaac Jr. born in Stamford, Ct., Apr. 30, 1848; graduated at Williams College. 1871; married to Mary E., daughter of Rev. Stephen C. Leonard, D. D. of Rushville, N. Y., Dec. 13, 1871; installed pastor of first Presbyterian church, Elmira, N. Y., Dec. 4, 1884.

Walter Loomis, born in Stamford, Ct., July 6, 1850, died in Stamford, Ct. Oct. 16, 1850.

Sophia Day, born in Stamford, Ct., Aug. 4, 1851; died in Bennington, Jan. 11, 1861; a bright and interesting child whose death was a sad affliction to her parents.

Frederick Beach, an attorney, born in Bennington, Aug. 6, 1854; graduated at Williams College, 1872; and married to Laura H., daughter of Hon. Trenor W. Park, July 27, 1880.

Matthias Day, born in Bennington, Jan. 8, 1857; died in Bennington, Dec. 25, 1860.

Charles Green Rockwood, physician, born in Bennington, Nov. 17, 1859; graduated at Harvard College, 1879; married to Mary Jeannette, daughter of Hon. A. Gardner, Sept. 8, 1885.

Robert Gould, born in Bennington, Mar. 28, 1862.

Philip Burton, born in Bennington, Dec. 7, 1865.

William Bigelow, born in Bennington, July 20, 1871.

THE DEATH OF REV. ISAAC JENNINGS occurred, Aug. 25, 1887. He was not confined to his bed but a few days before his death, but had been a great sufferer at times for months prior from a stone of large dimensions in the bladder. The stone was removed by Dr. Cabot of Boston, the afternoon before his death. He rallied for about two hours and then sank under it. Thus at the age of 72 years and one month, with the vigor of life scarcely abated—terminating a ministry of 34 years and three months in the Old First Church—has passed to his eternal rest, one who had endeared himself to the town. . . Voice through the press from BENNINGTON CENTRE,—SEPT. 1.

Our Village has been shrouded with gloom the past week, because of the death of the beloved pastor, who has gone in and out before us these many years. He broke for us the bread of life; he baptised our children; he had united our young men and maidens in marriage; he had stood beside the graves of a whole generation, and given to stricken friends such consolation as the gospel of Christ alone furnishes, in the kindest and most sympathetic manner. He had lived a life of singular honesty and purity and Christian fidelity, and become a great factor in the life of the people and possessed the love and confidence of all without regard to age, race or sect. He has gone, his prayers are ended, and all are ready to say: "How is the strong staff broken and the beautiful rod!" Many would be ready to despair if they did not remember how often they had heard him say: "Let not your heart be troubled."

The funeral was attended Saturday morning, the 26th from the Old First Church which was draped, very tastefully by those that loved him;—the pulpit covered with black cloth looped up with purple asters—in the background the motto in immortelles between the dates 1853 and 1887, covering the period of his ministry, "Faithful unto death." The pulpit chair was trimmed with white flowers sprayed with ferns and surmounted by a beautiful crown. The baptismal font held a flower-anchor and white dove. very beautiful. The choir gallery was also heavily draped

At 10 o'clock, after prayer at the parsonage by Dr. Pratt, the casket was brought to the church—the five sons of the deceased with the three deacons, bearers. The remains laid in state until 11 o'clock, viewed by a large number of sorrowing friends. At eleven, the mourners seated, the choir sang:

"Cast thy burden on the Lord"

Scripture selections read and a touching prayer by Rev. J. L. Harrington: Hymn:

"Asleep in Jesus, blessed sleep!
From which none ever wake to weep."

Funeral sermon by Rev. Dr. P. S. Pratt of Dorset, a long-time and loved friend of Mr. Jennings; text, ps. LXVII, vi. The address an able analysis of the character of the deceased and a loving tribute to his memory.

After the sermon, hymn:

"Servant of God, well done!
Rest from thy loved employ."

A beautiful and tender prayer by Rev. Dr. A. B. Lambert of Rupert.—And after the leave-taking of the dear departed he was carried amid the tears of strong men to the cemetery and laid in the grave lined with evergreens and covered with beautiful flowers, there to rest till the dawning of that eternal Sabbath day, when he shall be re-united with the loving ones gone before and with those who shall come after, who are now in the thick of the cares and duties of life.

The committal service at the grave was by Dr. Pratt; the benediction by Rev. Z. Marten of the Baptist church.

Mr. Jennings was the second of the long line of pastors who have ministered to the First church to be buried here. "Parson Dewey," the first minister, died nearly 109 years ago.

After the death of Mr. Jennings and during the funeral services the flag of the monument was kept at half staff, and the resident members of the Monument Association attended the funeral in a body.

A. R.

"There are times when with bowed heads and hushed voices we recall the words, "Be still and know that I am God." Such a time has come to the Old First Church. Upon the earth-side how dark it is! A broken household a stricken church; hearts often bereaved aching with a new sorrow.

We have had a beautiful summer, it is true, there has been extreme heat, but frequent showers kept vegetation as fresh as in spring time, foliage as luxuriant. Several weeks ago, we noticed the approach of autumn. Golden rod threw out its banner along the highway; upon the mountain side an occasional bright leaf whispered its prophecy of the gorgeous beauty which will soon cover them. Our beloved pastor had reached his autumn, but the long, beautiful summer of life had so ripened and mellowed so gently, that even the lambs of his flock did not realize that it had past. His smile was so full of sunshine, his words so replete with cheerful hope. Thirty-four years ministry have left an impress upon very many lives and hearts, his work is not ended, though he is absent from us. The example of his earnest life, loving counsel, his tender unfailing sympathy and faithful prayers will linger like a benediction through coming years. . .

RESOLUTIONS:

BENNINGTON BATTLE MONUMENT
ASSOCIATION.

August 27, A. D. 1887.

Introduced by John V. Hall, Unanimously adopted.

WHEREAS: The Rev. Isaac Jennings has, from the inception of the monument enterprise, been one of its most active promoters, a member and secretary of the Board of Directors, and was at his decease Vice President of the Association, and has been ever ready to aid by his wise counsels, his large influence, his earnest labors and liberal contributions, in accomplishing the objects of the Association, which efforts on his part have been interrupted only by his death.

Therefore: Resolved that this Board testifies most heartily to the appreciation in which he was ever held by this body, and to the irreparable loss which the Association has sustained in his death; and that it will ever be a pleasant memory to us that his last public utterances were given to the work so dear to him, and which rendered him additionally dear to us; and that by invoking the benediction of Almighty God upon this work and upon the assembled people, he most fittingly closed, at once, the imposing ceremonies at the laying of the monument's corner stone and his own public life.

Resolved: That the Board of Directors and officers of the Association will attend the funeral services in a body.

Resolved: That the foregoing minutes be engrossed and presented to the widow of the deceased, and that copies be furnished to the local papers for publication.

FROM OBITUARY NOTICE

BY REV. C. B. HULBERT, D. D.

[In the Religious Herald, Hartford, Ct., after a summary of his life.]

"A pastorate at such an important centre, and of the oldest church in the State and prolonged for so many years, is itself the highest commendation.—

In person, he was short and stout; had a face in which intelligence, amiability, wit and good fellowship contended for the supremacy. In manner and voice, he was gentle, sympathetic and winning. As a preacher, his rank among ministers was high; but at this point in comparison with his extraordinary pastoral service, he suffered. In his personal contact with men and in the homes of his people, he was a power. He was a model husband and father. His home was an ideal one. He filled it with sunshine. . . . During his pastorate an event occurred that gave Mr. Jennings an opportunity to disclose his gifts as a historian. In 1863, his church celebrated its Centennial. The historical discourse given by the Pastor, at the time, overflowed its bounds and soon after appeared in an ample volume, giving the early history of the town and of the celebrated battle. In this important service, Mr. Jennings showed himself an accomplished historian.

It is an interesting and felicitous incident that the last public service of this revered and venerable pastor and historian should have been to pronounce the benediction at the recent service of laying of the corner stone of the towering monument now ascending on the sacred spot. All who have known him as a man and a pastor, all who will read his history in coming time, will recall his character as having in it something of the solidity and beauty of the ponderous shaft with which it is unalterably associated."

VERMONT:

BY MRS. JULIA C. R. DORR.

I.

O, WOMAN-FORM, majestic, strong and fair,
Sitting enthroned where in upper air
Thy mountain peaks in solemn grandeur rise,
Piercing the splendor of the summer skies,—
Vermont our mighty mother crowned to-day
In all the glory of thy hundred years,
If thou dost bid me sing, how can I but obey?
What though the lips may tremble, and the verse

That fain would grandly thy grand deeds rehearse

May trip and falter, and the stammering tongue

Leave all unrhymed the rhymes that should be sung?

I can but do thy bidding, as is meet,
Bowling in humble homage at thy feet—
Thy royal feet—and if my words are weak,
O crowned One, 'twas thou didst bid me speak.

II.

Yet what is there to say,
Even on this proud day,
This day of days, that hath not oft been sung?
What song is there to sing
That hath not oft been sung?
What laurel can we bring,
That Ages have not hung
A thousand times above their glorious dead?
What crown to crown the living
Is left us for our giving?
That is not shaped to other brows
That wore it long ago?

Our very vows but echo vows
Breathed centuries ago!
Earth has no choral strain,
No sweet or sad refrain,
No lofty pen swelling loud and clear,
That Virgil did not know,
Or Dante wandering slow
In mystic trances did not pause to hear.

When gods from high Olympus came
To touch old Homer's lips with flame,
The morning stars together sung
To teach their raptures to his tongue.
For him the lonely ocean moaned
For him the mighty winds intoned
Their deep-voiced chanting, and for him
Sweet flower-bells pealed in forests dim.
From earth and air and sky he caught
The spell of their divinest thought,
While yet it blossomed fresh and new
As Eden's rosebuds wet with dew!
Oh! to have lived when earth was young
With all its melodies unsung!
The dome of Heaven bent nearer then
When gods and angels talked with men,—
When song itself was newly born,
The Incarnation of the Morn!
But now, alas! all thought is old,
All life is but a story told,
And poet-tongues are manifold;
And he is bold who tries to wake
Even for God, or country's sake
In voice, or pen, or lute or lyre
Sparks of the old Promethæan fire!

III.

And yet, — O Earth, thank God! — the soul of song

Is as immortal as the eternal stars!
O, trembling heart, take courage and be strong.

Hark! to a voice from yonder crystal bars:—

"Did the roses blow last June?

Do the stars still rise and set?

And over the crests of the mountains
Are the light clouds floating yet?

Do the rivers run to the sea

With a deep, resistless flow?

Do the little birds sing north and south

As the seasons come and go?

Are the hills as fair as of old?

Are the skies as blue and far?

Have you lost the pomp of the sunset?

Or the light of the evening star?

Has the glory gone from the morning?

Do the wild winds wail no more?

Is there now no thunder of billows Beating the storm-lashed shore?
 "Is Love a forgotten story?
 Is Passion a jester's theme?
 Has Valor thrown down its armor?
 Is Honor an idle dream?
 Is there no pure trust in woman?
 No conquering faith in God?
 Are there no feet strong to follow
 In the paths the martyrs trod?
 "Did you find no hero graves
 When your violets bloomed last May—Prouder than those of Marathon,
 Or 'old Plataea's day?
 When your red, white and blue
 On the free winds fluttered out,
 Were there no strong hearts and voices?
 To receive it with a shout?

Oh! let the Earth grow old!
 And the burning stars grow cold!
 And if you will declare man's story told!
 Yet pure as faith is pure,
 As sure as death is sure,
 As long as love shall live shall song endure!"

IV.

When one by one the stately, silent Years Glide like pale ghosts beyond our yearning sight,
 Vainly we stretch our arms to stay their flight
 So soon, so swift they pass to endless night!
 We hardly learn to name them,
 To praise them, or to blame them,
 To know their shadowy faces,
 Ere we see their empty places!
 Only once the glad spring greets them
 Only once fair summer meets them;
 Only once the autumn glory
 Tells for them its mystic story;
 Only once the winter hoary
 Weaves for them its robes of light!
 Years leave their work half-done; like men, alas!
 With sheaves ungathered to their graves they pass,
 And are forgotten. What they strive to do Lives for awhile in memory of a few;
 Then over all Oblivion's waters flow—
 The years are buried in the long ago!
 But when a Century dies what room is there for tears?
 Rather in solemn exaltation let us come,
 With roll of drum,
 (Not muffled as in woe,)
 With blare of bugles and the liquid flow

Of silver clarions and the long appeal
 Of the clear trumpets ringing peal on peal,
 With clash of bells and hosts in proud array
 To pay meet homage to its burial day!
 For its proud work is done. Its name is writ
 Where all the ages that come after it Shall read the eternal letters blazoned high
 On the blue dome of the impartial sky.
 What ruthless fate can darken its renown,
 Or dim the lustre of its starry crown?
 On mountain-peaks of time each century stands alone:
 And each, for glory or for shame, hath reaped
 what it hath sown.

V.

But this — the one that gave thee birth
 A hundred years ago, O beauteous mother!
 This mighty century had a mightier brother,
 Who from the watching earth Passed but last year! Twin-born indeed were they,—
 For what are twelve months to the womb of time
 Pregnant with ages? — Hand in hand they climbed
 With clear, young eyes uplifted to the stars,
 With great strong souls that never stopped for bars,
 Through storm and darkness up to glorious
 day!
 Each knew the other's need; each in his breast
 The subtle tie of closest kin confessed;
 Counted the other's honor as his own;
 Nor feared to sit upon a separate throne;
 Nor loved each other less when — wondrous fate!—
 One gave a Nation life, and one a State!

VI.

Oh! rude the cradle in which each was rocked,
 The infant Nation, and the infant State!
 Rough nurses were the centuries that mocked
 At mother-kisses and for mother-arms Gave their young nurselings sudden, harsh alarms,
 Quick blows and stern rebuffs. They bade them wait,
 Often in cold and hunger, while the feast was spread for others, and, though last not least,
 Gave them sharp swords for playthings, and the din
 Of actual battle for the mimic strife

That childhood glories in!
 Yet not less they loved them. Spartans they,
 Who could not rear a weak, effeminate brood.
 Better the forest's awful solitude,
 Better the desert spaces where the day
 Wanders from dawn to dusk and finds no life.

VII.

But over all the tireless years swept on,
 Till side by side the centuries grew old,
 And the young Nation, great and strong and bold,
 Forgot its early struggles in triumphs later won!

It stretched its arms from East to West;
 It gathered to its mighty breast
 From every clime, from every soil,
 The hunted sons of want and toil;
 It gave to each a dwelling-place;
 It blent them in one common race;
 And over all from sea to sea,
 Wide flew the banner of the free!
 It did not fear the wrath of kings
 Nor the dread grip of deadlier things—
 Gaunt famine with its ghastly horde,
 Dishonor sheathing its foul sword,
 Nor faithless friend, nor treacherous blow,
 Struck in the dark by stealthy foe;
 For over all its wide domain,
 From shore to shore, from main to main,
 From vale to mountain-top, it saw
 The reign of plenty, peace and law!

VIII.

Thus fared the Nation, prosperous, great and free,

Prophet and herald of the good to be;
 And on its humbler way in calm content,
 The lesser State, the while, serenely went.
 Safe in her mountain fastnesses she dwelt,
 Her life's first cares forgot, its woes unfelt,
 And thought her bitterest tears had all been shed,

For peace was in her borders and God reigned overhead.

IX.

But suddenly, over the hills there came
 A cry that rent her with grief and shame—
 A cry from the Nation in distress,
 Stricken down in its mightiness!
 With passionate ardor, up she sprang,
 And her voice like the peal of a trumpet
 rang,—

What ho! what ho! brave sons of mine,
 Strong with the strength of the mountain pine!

To the front of the battle, away! away!
 The Nation is bleeding in deadly fray,
 The Nation it may be is dying to-day!
 On, then, to the rescue, away! away!

Ah! how they answered let the ages tell,
 For they shall guard the sacred story well!
 Green grows the grass, to-day, on many a battle-field;

War's dread alarms are o'er; its scars are healed;

Its bitter agony has found surcease;
 A re-united land clasps hands in peace.
 But, Oh! ye blessed dead whose graves are strewn

From where our forests make perpetual moan,

To those far shores where smiling Southern seas

Give back soft murmurs to the fragrant breeze,—

Oh! ye, who drained for us the bitter cup, Think ye we can forget what ye have offered up?

The years will come and go, and other centuries die,

And generation after generation lie Down in the dust; but long as stars shall shine,

Long as Vermont's green hills shall bear the pine,

As long as Killington shall proudly lift
 Its lofty peak above the storm-cloud's rift,
 Or Mansfield hail the blue, o'erarching skies,

Or fair Mount Anthony in grandeur rise
 So long shall live the deeds that ye have done,

So deathless be the glory ye have won!

XI.

Not with exultant joy
 And pride without alloy,

Did the twin Centuries rejoice when all was o'er.

What though the Nation rose Triumphant o'er its foes?

What though the State had gained
 The meed of faith unstained?

Their mighty hearts remembered the dead that came no more!

Remembered all the losses,

The weary, weary crosses, Remembered that earth was poorer for the blood that had been shed.

And knew that it was sadder for the story it had read!

So clasping hands with somewhat saddened mien,

And eyes uplifted to the great Unseen
That rules alike o'er centuries and men, Onward they walked serenely towards the end!

XI.

One reached it last year, Ye remember well,
The wondrous tale there is no need to tell—How the whole world bowed down beside its bier,

Heaping their treasures on its mighty pall—
Never had kingliest king such funeral!
Old Asia rose and girding her in haste,
Swept in her jeweled robes across the waste,
And called to Egypt lying prone and hid
Where waits the sphinx beside the pyramid;
Fair Europe came with overflowing hands,
Bearing the riches of her many lands;
Dark Afric, laden with her virgin gold,
Yet laden deeper with her woes untold;
Japan and China in grotesque array,
And all the enchanted Islands of Cathay!

XIII.

To-day the other dies,
It walked in humbler guise,
Nor stood where all men's eyes
Were fixed upon it.
Earth may not pause to lay
A wreath upon its bier,
Nor the world heed to-day
Our dead that lieth here!
Yet well they loved each other—
It and its greater brother.
To loftiest stature grown,
Each earned its own renown;
Each sought of Time a crown,
And each has won it.

XIV.

But what to us are centuries dead,
And rolling years forever fled,
Compared with thee, O! grand and fair
Vermont—our goddess-mother?
Strong with the strength of thy verdant hills,
Fresh with the freshness of mountain rills,
Pure as the breath of the fragrant pine,
Glad, with the gladness of youth divine,
Serenely thou sittest throned to-day
Where the free winds that round thee play
Rejoice in thy waves of sun-bright hair,
O! thou, our glorious mother!
Rejoice in thy beautiful strength and say
Earth holds not such another!

Thou art not old with thy hundred years,
Nor worn with toil, or care, or tears;
But all the glow of the summer-time
Is thine to-day in thy glorious prime!
Thy brow is fair as the winter-snows,
With a stately calm in its still repose;
While the breath of the rose the wild bee sips
Half-mad with joy, cannot eclipse
The marvellous sweetness of thy lips;
And the deepest blue of the laughing skies
Hides in the depths of thy fearless eyes,
Gazing afar over land and sea
Wherever thy wandering children be!

Fold on fold,

Over thy form of grandest mould,
Floweth thy robe of forest green,
Now light, now dark, in its emerald sheen.
Its brodered hem is of wild flowers rare,
With feathery fern-fronds light as air,
Fringing its borders. In thy hair
Sprays of the pink arbutus twine,
And the curling rings of the wild grape-vine;
Thy girdle is of silver streams;
Its clasp with the opaline lustre gleams
Of a lake asleep in the sunset beams;

And half-concealing

And half-revealing,

Floats over all a veil of mist

Pale tinted with rose and amethyst.

XV.

Rise up, O! noble mother of brave sons,
Worthy to rank among earth's mightiest ones
And daughters fair and beautiful and good,
Yet wise and strong in loftiest womanhood, Rise from thy throne, and standing far and high

Outlined against the blue, adoring sky,
Lift up thy voice and stretch thy loving hands
In benediction o'er the waiting lands!
Take thou, our fealty, at thy feet we bow,
Glad to renew each oft-repeated vow!
No costly gifts we bring to thee, to-day;
No votive wreaths upon thy shrine we lay;
Take thou, our hearts, then! hearts that fain would be

From this day forth, O goddess, worthier thee.

[Space promised Gov. Hall on Bennington doubled,—we suspend—while the large volume of Bennington Town History under the happy auspices of their Historical Society is being finished up—withdraw to NOTES BY THE PATH OF THE GAZETTEER, Vol. II. issued about quarterly—now, therein at the old Gov.
